The private, a man of wisdom and prudence, who was all along adverse to the introduction of the liturgy, represented to the king the state of the nation: the Earl of Traquair, the treasurer, set out for London, in order to lay the matter more fully before him; every circumstance, whether the condition of England or of Scotland were considered, should have engaged him to desist from so hazardous an undertaking: yet was Charles inflexible. In his whole conduct of this affair, there appear no marks of the good sense with which he was endowed: a lively instance of that species of character is found in the frequent instance where there are found parts and judgment in every discourse and opinion; in many actions indiscretion and imprudence. Men's views of things are the result of their understanding alone: their conduct is regulated by their understanding, their temper, and their passions.

A.D. 1638. To so violent a combination of a whole 10th. Feb. kingdom, Charles had nothing to oppose but a proclamation; in which he punished all past offenders, and exhorted the people to be more obedient for the future, and to submit peaceably to the use of the liturgy. This proclamation was instantly encountered with a public protestation, presented by the Earl of Hume and Lord Lindsay. This was the first time that men of quality had appeared in any violent act of opposition. But this proved a crisis. The insurrection, which had been advancing by a gradual and slow progress, now blazed up at once. No disorder, how indurate it extended. On the contrary, a new order immediately took place. Four tables, as they were called, were formed in Edinburgh. One consisted of nobility, another of gentry, a third of ministers, a fourth of burgesses. The table of gentry was divided into many subcommittees, according to the different counties. In the hands of the four tables, the whole authority of the kingdom was placed. Orders were issued by them, and every where obeyed, with the utmost regularity.2 And amongst all of their government was the production of the Covenant.

The covenant. This famous covenant consisted first of a renunciation of popery, formerly signed by James in his youth, and composed of many inventors, fitted to inflame the minds of men against their fellow-creatures, whom Heaven has enjoined them to cherish and to love. There followed a bond of union, by which the subscribers obliged themselves to resist religious innovations, and to defend each other against all opposition whatever: and all this, for the greater glory of God, and the greater honour and advantage of their king and country:2 the people, without distinction of rank or condition, of all subcommittees, agreeing to the signs of this covenant, few, in their judgment, disapproved of it; and still fewer durst openly condemn it. The king's ministers and counselors themselves were, most of them, seized by the general course of the rebellion but rebels to God, and traitors to their country, it was thought, would withdraw themselves from so sanguinary and so pious a combination. The treacherous, the cruel, the unreeling Philip, accompanied with all the terribleness of Spanish iniquity, was not less, during the preceding century, opposed in the Low Countries with more determined fury, than was now, by the Scots, the mild, the humane Charles, attended with his inoffensive liturgy.3

The king began to apprehend the consequences. He sent the Marquis of Hamilton, as commissioner, with authority to treat with the covenanters. He required the covenant to be renounced and recalled: and he thought, that on this part he had made very satisfactory concessions, when he offered to suspend the canons and the liturgy, till, in a fair and legal way, they could be received; and so to model the high commission, wherein certain exceptions were to be made, that general declarations could not well give content to any, much less to those who carried so much higher their pretensions. The covenanters found themselves secured by a real and whole thing. The tables were assembled in a tumultuous manner in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood. Charles possessed so regular forces in either of his kingdoms. And the discontents in England, though secret, were believed so violent, that the king, it was thought, would find it very difficult to employ to such a cause the power of that kingdom. The more, therefore, the popular leaders in Scotland considered their situation, the less apprehension did they entertain of royal power, and the more rigorously did they insist on entire satisfaction. In answer to Hamilton's demand of renouncing the covenant, they plainly told him, that they would sooner renounce their baptism. And the clergy invited the commissioners. He was not to be met with, where there are found parts and judgment in every discourse and opinion; in many actions indiscretion and imprudence. Men's views of things are the result of their understanding alone: their conduct is regulated by their understanding, their temper, and their passions.

Hamilton returned to London: made another fruitless attempt; obtained no concessions, to Edinburgh; returned again to London; and was immediately sent back with still more satisfactory concessions. The king was now willing entirely to abolish the canons, and regulate the liturgy. He was even resolved to limit extremely the power of the bishops, and was content if on any terms he could retain that order in the church of Scotland.3 And to insure all these gracious offers, he gave Hamilton authority to summon first assembly, then a parliament, where every national grievance might be redressed and remedied. These successive concessions of the king, which yet came still short of the rising demands of the malcontents, discovered his own weakness and the inconstancy of his purpose. The offer, however, of an assembly and a parliament, in which they expected to be entirely masters, was willingly embraced by the covenanters.

Charles, desiring what advantage his enemies had reapprised from their covenant, resolved to have a covenant on his side; and he ordered one to be drawn up for that purpose. It consisted of the same violent renunciation of popery above mentioned; which, though the king did not approve of it, he thought it safest to adopt, in order to remove all the suspicions entertained against him. As the covenanters, in their bond of mutual defence against all opposition, had been careful not to except the king; Charles had formed a bond, which was annexed to this renunciation, and which expressed the duty and loyalty of the subscribers to his majesty.2 But the covenanters, perceiving that this new covenant was only meant to weaken and divide their interests, and that its ultimate aim seemed to detestation, and without delay they proceeded to model the future assembly, from which such great achievements were expected.4

The genius of that religion which prevailed in Scotland, and which, every day, was secretly gaining ground in England, was far from inculcating deference and submission to the ecclesiastics; it was raised up as a wage army to resist God, and traitors to their country, it was thought, would withdraw themselves from so sanguinary and so pious a combination. And amongst all of their government was the production of the Covenant.

The Covenant's. This famous covenant consisted first of a renunciation of popery, formerly signed by James in his youth, and composed of many inventors, fitted to inflame the minds of men against their fellow-creatures, whom Heaven has enjoined them to cherish and to love. There followed a bond of union, by which the subscribers obliged themselves to resist religious innovations, and to defend each other against all opposition whatever: and all this, for the greater glory of God, and the greater honour and advantage of their king and country:2 the people, without distinction of rank or condition, of all subcommittees, agreeing to the signs of this covenant, few, in their judgment, disapproved of it; and still fewer durst openly condemn it. The king's ministers and counselors themselves were, most of them, seized by the general course of the rebellion but rebels to God, and traitors to their country, it was thought, would withdraw themselves from so sanguinary and so pious a combination. The clergy of Scotland, though such tumult was excited about religious worship and discipline, were both poor and in small numbers; nor are they in general to be considered, at least in the beginning, as the ringleaders of the sedition which was raised upon the non-conformity, the imprudence, the lassitude, apprehending, from several instances which occurred, a spirit of moderation in that order, resolved to dominate entirely in the assembly which was summoned, and to hurry on the ecclesiastics by the same furious zeal with which they were carried on in England. It had been usual, before the establishment of prelacy, for each presbytery to send to the assembly, besides two or three ministers, one lay-commissioner; and, as all the ministers and assessors, of any kind, had men of affairs and men of weight among them, they were also sent. The number of assessors, on the other hand, was fixed by the assembly, and in 1638 was 76. This was doubtless intended to equalize the ecclesiastical court nearly equally the ecclesiastics. Not only this institution, which James, apprehensive of zeal in the cause, had abolished, was now revived by the covenanters: they also introduced an innovation, which served still further to reduce the clergy to subjection. By an edict of the tables, whose authority was supreme, an elder from each parish was ordered to attend the presbytery, and to give his voice in the choice of both of the commissioners. But ministers who should be deputed to the assembly. As it is not usual for the ministers who are put in the list of candidates, to claim a vote, all the elections, by that means, fell into the hands of the clergy; yet more serious, the more to overawe the clergy, a new device was fallen upon, of choosing to every commissioner, four or five lay assessors, who though they could have no voice, yet might influence the election. This was done to indemnify the church, to which, in their last assembly, they had been defeated, by a tumultuous combination, inflamed with bigotry for religious trites, and faction without a reasonable object. The assembly met at Glasgow: and, besides a great concourse of the people, all the nobility and gentry of any family or interest were present, either as members, assessors, or spectators; and it was thought, that the resolutions taken by the covenanters, could here meet with no manner of opposition. A firm determination had been entered into, of utterly abolishing episcopacy; and as a preparative to it, there was laid before the presbytery of Edinburgh, and solemnly read in all the churches of the kingdom, an accusation against the bishops, as guilty, all of them, of heresy, simony, bribery, perjury, cheating, incest, adultery, fornication, common swearing, drunkenness, gaming, breach of the sabbath, and every other crime that had occurred to the accusers. The bishops sent a protest, declining the authority of the assembly; the commissioner, too, protested against that court, as illegally constituted, and selected; and, in his majesty’s name, dissolved it. This measure was foreseen, and little regarded. The court still continued to sit, and to finish their business. All the acts of assembly since the accession of James VI. had been, upon pretty reasonable grounds, declared null and invalid: and not only a parliament which affected ecclesiastical affairs were supposed, on that very account, to have no manner of authority; but such a measure was perceived as an innovation, which might subject the whole nation. The assembly, though with the commotion, the articles of Perth, the canons, and the liturgy, were abolished and declared unlawful; and the whole fabric, which James and Charles, in a long course of years, had been rearing with so much care and policy, fell at once to the ground. The covenant likewise was ordered to be signed by every one, under pain of excommunication.

The independence of the ecclesiastical establishment, upon a Presbyterian principle, which had been zealously adopted at the Reformation, and which, though James and Charles had obliged the church publicly to disclaim it, had secretly been adhered to by all ranks of people. It was commonly asked, whether Christ or the king were superior? And as the answer seemed obvious, it was inferred, that the assembly, being Christ’s council, was superior in all spiritual matters to the parliament, which was only the king’s. But as the covenanters were considered, though it seemed to them irrefragable, would not be assented to by the king; it became necessary to maintain their religious tenets by military force, and not to trust entirely to supernatural assistance, of which, however, they held themselves well assured. They cast their eyes on all sides, abroad and at home, whence ever they could expect any aid or support.

After France and Holland had entered into a league against Spain, and framed a treaty of partition, by which they were to conquer and to divide between them the Low Country provinces, England was invited to preserve neutrality between the contracting powers, and the French and Dutch should attack the maritime towns of Flanders. But the king replied to De Estrades, the French ambassador, who opened the proposal, that he had a sufficient army ready, and could cut off the French with an army of 15,000 men, in order to prevent these projected conquests. This answer, which proves that Charles, though he expressed his mind with an imprudent candour, had at last acquired a just idea of national interest, irritated Cardinal Richelieu; and in revenge, that politic and enterprising minister carefully fomented the first commotions in Scotland, and secretly supplied the covenanters with money and arms, in order to encourage them in their opposition against their sovereign. But the chief resource of the Scottish malcontents was in themselves and in their own vigour and abilities. No regular established commonwealth could take just measures; great measures, or execute them. The more to overawe the clergy, a new device was fallen upon, of choosing to every commissioner, four or five lay assessors, who though they could have no voice, yet might influence the election. This was done to indemnify the church, to which, in their last assembly, they had been defeated, by a tumultuous combination, inflamed with bigotry for religious trites, and faction without a reasonable object. The whole kingdom was in a manner engaged; and the ministers and covenanters, of families of the first rank, of which their family interest enabled them to maintain. The Earl of Argyle, though he long seemed to temporise, had at last embraced the covenant; and he became the chief leader of that party; a man equally capable and inflexible, cautious and determined, and entirely qualified to make a figure during a factious and turbulent period. The Earls of Rothes, Cassilis, Montrose, Lothian, the Lords Linsey, Loudon, Yester, Balmerino, distinguished themselves in that party. Many Scotch officers had acquired reputation in the German wars, particularly under War. Gustavus; and these were invited over to assist their country in her present necessity. The command was intrusted to Lesley, a soldier of experience and abilities. Forces were regularly enlisted and disciplined. Arms were commissioned and imported from foreign countries. A few castles which belonged to the king, being unprovided with victuals, ammunition, and garrisons, were soon seized. And the whole country, except a small party, where the Marquis of Huntley still adhered to the king, being in the hands of the covenanters, was in a very little time put into a tolerable posture of defence. The fortifications of Edinburgh were begun, and carried on with great rapidity. Besides the inferior sort, and those who laboured for pay, incredible numbers of volunteers, even noblemen and gentlemen, put their hand to the work, and deemed the most abject employment to be dignified by the sanctity of the cause. Women, too, of rank and condition, forgetting the delicacy of their sex, and the decorum of their character, were intermingled with the lowest rabble; and carried on their shoulders the rash business requisite for completing the fortifications. We must not omit another auxiliary of the covenanters, and no inconsiderable one; a prophetess, who was much followed and adored by the people. She was Michelsinn, a woman full of wisdom, partly hysteric, partly religious; and inflamed with a zealous concern for the ecclesiastical discipline of the presbyterians. She spoke at certain times only, and had often interruptions of days and weeks; but when she began to renew her exertions, warning of the happy event was conveyed over the whole country, thousands crowded about her house, and every word which she uttered was received with veneration. The reason, as the most obvious one, was that the prophetess was an invener... tion of Satan. When she spoke of Christ, he usually gave him the name of the Covenanting Jesus. Rollo, a popular preacher, and zealous covenant, was her great favourite; and passed her, on his part, no less veneration.

Being desired by the spectators to pray a prayer, and to speak to her, he answered, " That is not right, not, that it would be ill manners in him to speak, while his master Christ was speaking in her ot.

Charles had agreed to reduce ecclesiastical authority so much as the people of Scotland had long been of any service to support the crown; and this sacrifice of his own interests he was willing to make, in order to attain public tranquility and peace. But he could not consent entirely to abdication, which he fealt far better than what is usual of a Christian church, as his Scottish subjects deemed it incompatible with that sacred institution. This narrowness of mind, if we would be impartial, we must either blame or excuse equally on both sides; and thereby antici-

The Scottish army was as numerous as that of the king, but inferior in cavalry. The officers had more reputation and experience; and the soldiers, though disciplined and ill-arm’d, were animated as well by the national aversion, and the dread of becoming a province to their old enemies, as by an unsurmountable fervour of religion. The pulpits had already assisted the officers in leving recruits, and had thundered out anathemas against all who should not to an end the Lord against the mighty? Yet so prudent were the leaders of the mal-cents, besides that the prelacy must be sacrificed to their religious prejudices, such a check would be given to royal authority, which had, very lately, and with much difficulty, been thoroughly established in Scotland, that he must expect to lose his kingdom through this check rather than the appearance of majesty. The great men, having proved, by so sensible a trial, the impotence of law and prerogative, would return to their former licentiousness: the preachers would retain their innate arrogance and the people, used to the privileges of justice, would retain their authority than that which they found to domineer over them. England also, it was much to be feared, would imitate so bad an example; and having already a strong propensity of the people to domineer over the crown, they would expect, by the same sedulous practices, to attain the same indulgence. To advance so far, without bringing the rebels to a total submission, at least to reasonable con-

On the other hand, Charles considered that Scotland was never before, under any of his ancestors, so united, and so animated in its own defense; yet had often been able to foal or elude the force of England, combined heartily in one cause, and imured by long practice to the use of arms. How much greater difficulty should he find at present, to persuade the people to an abdication, on any religious prejudices; while he could only oppose to them a nation endued by long peace, and lukewarm in its service, or, what was more to be dreaded, many of them engaged in the same party with himself for a while. Should the war be ever ended beyond a considerable time (he could expect to finish it in that period) his treasuries would fail him; and for supply, he must have recourse to an English parliament, which, by fatal experience he had already found the crown had been in his time more to supply the necessities of the crown. And what if he receive a defeat from the rebel army! This misfortune was far from being impossible. They were engaged in a national cause, and the nobles and gentlemen would rally on the king's side.

His army was retained entirely by pay, and looked on the quarrel with the same indifferency which naturally belongs to mercenary troops, without possessing the discipline by which such troops are commonly distinguished. And the consequences of a defeat, while Scotland was engaged and England discontented, were so dreadful, that no motive should persuade him to hazard it.

It is evident that Charles had fallen into such a situa-

The malcontents had been very industrious in repre-

braced. So far, therefore, from being willing to second the king in subduing the free spirits of the Scots; they rather pitied that unhappy people, who had been pushed to those extremes: and they thought that the example of Ireland and France should be offered as a model. An English monarch could, perhaps, be persuaded, in some time, to be more advantageous to England, and encourage her to recover, by a vigorous effort, her violated laws and liberties. The gentry and nobility, who, without attachment to the assembly, were prepossessed against the Scotch, had made before a detachment of the Scotch, caused all their hostilities to blaze up at once: and the king, whose character was not sufficiently vigorous or decisive, and who was apt, from facility, to embrace hasty counsels, suddenly assented to a measure which was recommended by all about him, and which favoured his natural propensity towards the misguided subjects of his native kingdom.

Charles, having so far advanced in pacific measures, ought not to have recommended them, and have submitted to every tolerable condition demanded by the assembly and parliament; nor should he have recommenced hostilities, but on account of such enormous sums. The king of Traquair had laid down a prudent cause, if possible, to the whole English nation. So far, indeed, he adopted this plan, that he agreed not only to confirm his former concessions of abrogating the canons, the liturgy, the high commission, and the articles of Perth; but, in the opportunity of the Scottish parliament, he had so zealously contended. But this concession was gained by the utmost violence which he could impose on his disposition and prejudices: he even secretly retained an intention of seizing favourable opportunities, in order to recover the ground which he had lost. And one step further he could not prevail with himself to advance. The assembly, when it met, paid no deference to the king's prepossession: they were determined to do otherwise. They voted episcopacy to be unlawful in the church of Scotland: he was willing to allow it contrary to the constitutions of that church. They stigmatized the liturgy and canons as popish: he agreed simply to abolish them. They denounced the high commission, tyranny: he was content to set it aside. The parliament, which sat after the assembly, advanced preconceptions which tended to diminish the civil power of the monarchy, to put the country in debt; and, what was worse, they were proceeding to ratify the acts of assembly, when, by the king's instructions, Traquair, the commissioner, prorogued them. And on account of these measures, which, if once foreseen, was the war renewed with great advantages on the side of the covenanters, and disadvantages on that of the king.

No sooner had Charles concluded the pacification without conditions, than the necessity of his affairs and his want of money obliged him to disband his army; and as the soldiers had been held together solely by mercenary views, it was not possible, without great trouble, and expense, and loss of time, again to assemble them. The more prudent covenanters had concluded, that their pretensions being so contrary to the interests, and still more to the inclinations, of the king, it was likely that they should again be obliged to support their cause by arms; and that they were therefore careful in distinguishing their treachery: to preserve nothing but the appearance of a pacific disposition. The officers had orders to be ready on the first summons: the soldiers were warned not to think that they were now supported by an English invasion: and the religious zeal which animates all ranks of men, made them immediately fly to their standards as soon as the trumpet was sounded by their spiritual and temporal leaders. The crown, which in their last expedition they had acquired, by obliterating their past errors and pretensions, gave courage to every one in undertaking this new enterprise. a

The king, with great difficulty, found means to draw together an army; but soon discovered, that all savings being gone, and great debts contracted, his revenue would be insufficient to support them anent, therefore, his uneasiness was such and unkind and irremediable, must now, after above eleven years' intermission, after the king had tried many irregular methods of taxation, after much forced revenue, and after the courtier's excessive efforts to satisfy all the most pressing necessities of the crown.

As the king resolved to try, whether this House of Commons would be more propitious than his predecessor, and grant him supply on any reasonable terms; the time appointed for the meeting of parliament was late, and very near the time allotted for opening the campaign against the Scots. After the past experience of their ill humour, and of their encroaching disposition, he thought that he could not in prudence trust them with a long session, till he had seen some better proofs of their good intentions: the urgency of the occasion, and the little time allowed for debate, were reasons which he reserved against the malcontents in the House: and an incident had happened, which, he believed, had now furnished him with still more cogent arguments.

He had intercepted a letter written to the King of France by the Scottish malcontents; and had conveyed this letter to the king. Charles, partly repenting of the large concessions made to the Scots, partly disgusted at their fresh insolence and pretensions, seized on it with glee. He conducted Traquair, now Earl of Loudon, commissioner from the covenanters; one of the persons who had signed the treasonable letter. And he now had the matter before the parliament, whom he hoped to inflame by the resentment, and alarm by the danger, of this application to a foreign power. By the mouth of the lord keeper, Finch, he discovered his wants, and informed them that he had been able to assemble his army, and, from his numbers and distance, which he possessed, but by means of a large debt of above 300,000 pounds which he had contracted, and for which he had given security upon the crown-lands. He represented, that it was necessary to grant supplies for the immediate and urgent demands of his military armaments: that the season was far advanced, the time precious, and none of it must be lost in deliberation: that though his coffers were empty, they had not been exhausted by unnecessary pence, or unnecessary expenses, but that all was of a kind of magnificence: that whatever supplies had been levied on his subjects, had been employed for their advantage and preservation, and like vapours rising out of the earth, and gathering into a cloud, had fallen in sweet and refreshing showers on the same fields from which they had been at first exhaled: that though he desired such immediate assistance as might prevent for the time a total disorder in the government, he was far from any intention of precluding them from their right to inquire into the state of the kingdom, and to offer him petitions for the redress of their grievances: that as much as was possible of this season should afterwards be allowed them for that purpose: that as he expected only such supply as present as the current service necessarily required, it would be requisite to assemble them again next winter, when they should have full leisure to conclude whatever business had this session; and that business was therefore so urgent among them: that the parliament of Ireland had twice put such trust in his good intentions, as to grant him, in the beginning of the session, a large supply, and had ever experienced good effects from the confidence reposed in him; that, in every circumstance, his people should, forsworn and such as was calculated to promote an entire harmony between prince and parliament.

However plausible these topics, they made small impression on the House of Commons. By some illegal, and several suspicious, measures of the crown, and by the courageous opposition which particular persons, amidst dangers and hardships, had made to them; the minds of men, throughout the nation, had taken such a turn, as to ascribe every honour to the refractory opposers of the king and the ministers. These were the only patriots, the only lovers of their country, the only heroes, and perhaps, too, the only true Christians. A reasonable compliance with the court was slavish dependence; a regard to the king, secret flattery; the breach of his confidence was evidence of his perfidy, shame, and prostitution. This general cast of thought, which has, more or less, prevailed in England, during near a century and a half, and which has been the cause of much good and much ill in this world, never prevailed more than during the reign of Charles. The present House of Commons, being entirely composed of country gentlemen, who came into parliament with all their native prejudices about them, and whom the crown had no means of influencing, could not fail to contain a majority of these stubborn patriots.
Affairs likewise, by means of the Scottish insurrection,
and the general discontents in England, were drawn so near to a crisis, that the leaders of the House, sagacious and persevering, began to foresee the consequences, and to hope, that the time, so long wished for, was now come,
when royal authority must fall into a total subordination under popular assemblies, and when public liberty must acquire a firm and stable foundation. By reducing the crown to its natural circumstances, they had hitherto found, that the king had been pushed into violent counsels, which had served extremely the purposes of his adversaries; and by multiplying these necessities from prodigality, they, having examined on all sides, must, at last, be overthrown, and be no longer dangerous to the privileges of the people.
Whatever, therefore, tended to compose the differences between king and parliament, and to preserve the government uniformly in its present channel, was zealously opposed by these popular leaders; and their past conduct and sufferings gave them credit sufficient to effect all their purposes.

The House of Commons, moved by these and many other obvious reasons, instead of taking notice of the king's complaints against his Scottish subjects, or his applications for supply, entered immediately upon grievances; and a speech which Pym made them on that subject, was much more heartened to, than that which the lord keeper had delivered to them in the name of their sovereign. The subject of Pym's harangue has been sufficiently explained above; where we have an account of all the grievances, imaginary in the church, more real in the state, of which the nation, at that time, so loudly complained.4

The House began with examining the behaviour of the speaker the last day of the former parliament; when he had refused to pay the king's demand, to put the question; and they declared it a breach of privilege. They proceeded next to inquire into the imprisonment and prosecution of Sir John Eliott, Hollis, and Valentine; the affair of ship-money was canvassed;
and plentiful subject of inquiry was suggested on all hands. Grievances were regularly classed under three heads; those with regard to privileges of parliament, to the property of the subject, and to religion.5 The king, seeing a large and inextricable field opened, pressed them again for supply; and finding his message inef-factual, he came to the House of Peers, and desired their good offices with the Commons. The peers were sensible of the king's urgent necessities; and thought that supply, on this occasion, ought, both in reason and in decency, to go before grievances. They ventured to represent their sentiments to the Commons; but their interference did harm. The Commons had always claimed, as their peculiar province, the granting of supplies; and though the Peers had here gone no further than offering advice, the lower House immediately thought properly to deprive those to whom they should belong, of their breach of privilege.6 Charles, in order to bring the matter of supply to some issue, solicited the House by new messages: and finding that ship-money gave great alarm and distress to the lower classes, he was never inter ested in making a constant revenue of it, that all the money levied had been regularly, with other great sums, expended on supplying the navy; he now went so far as to offer them
a total abolition of that obnoxious claim, by any law which the Commons should think proper to present to him. In return, he only asked, for his necessities, a supply of twelve subsidies, about six hundred thousand pounds, and that payable in three years; but at the same time, he let them know, that considering the situation of the nation, he had no money to spare.7 The king, though the majority was against him, never had more friends in any House of Commons; and the debate was carried on for two days, with great zeal and warmth on both sides.

It was urged by the partisans of the court, that the happier occasion, which the fondest wishes could suggest, was now presented, for removing all disgusts and jealousies between king and people, and for reconciling their soveigns for ever to the use of parliaments. That if they,
on their part, laid aside all enormous claims and preten-sions, and provided, in a reasonable manner, for the public necessities; they needed entertain no suspicion of any insoluble or illegal usurpation in the crown. That though due regard had not always been paid, during this reign, to the rights of the people, yet no invasion of them had been altogether deliberate and voluntary; murb Shrews, a matter of accident, being a rash, impudent, less, of a formed design to subvert the constitution. That to repose a reasonable confidence in the king, and generously to supply his present wants, which proceeded neither from the desire of extorting, nor from an ill-intention of the king, he would by no means, but an act of gaining on his generous nature, and extorting, by gentle violence, such concessions as were requisite for the establishment of public liberty. That he had promised, not only on the word of a prince, but also on that of a gentleman, the expression which he had been pleased to use, that after the supply was granted, the parliament should still have liberty to continue their deliberations: could it be suspected, that any man, any prince, much less such a one, whose word was but as yet, scanty and invalid, would for so small a motive forfeit his honour, and, with it, all future trust and confidence, by breaking a promise so public and so solemn? That even, if the parliament should be deceived in repose this confidence in him, they never lost any thing, nor incurred any danger; since it was evidently necessary, for the security of public peace, to supply him with money in order to suppress the Scottish rebellion. That he had so far suited his first demands to their prejudices, that he only asked a supply for a few months, and was willing, after so short a trust from them, to fall again into dependence, and to trust them for his further support and subsistence. That if he now seemed desirous of such a supply, it was a matter of necessity and policy, and, besides, he made a considerable offer, and was willing, for the future, to depend on them for a revenue, which was quite necessary for public honour and security. That the nature of the English constitution supposed a mutual confidence between king and parliament; and if they should refuse it on their part, especially with circumstances of such outrage and indignity; what could be expected but a total dissolution of government, and violent factions, followed by the most dangerous convulsions and intestine disorders?

In opposition to these arguments, it was urged by the malcontent party, that the court had discovered, on their part, but few symptoms of patriotism or good-will, for which they now so kindly invited the Commons. That eleven years' intermission of parliaments, the longest that was to be found in the English annals, was a sufficient indication of the jealousy entertained against the people;
or rather of designs formed for the suppression of all their liberties and privileges. That the ministers might well plead necessity, nor could any thing, indeed, be a stronger proof of some insinuable necessity, than their embracing a moral, and a corporal, and a personal punishment; that their aversion, as the assembling of an English parliament.
That this necessity, however, was purely ministerial, not national: and if the same grievances, ecclesiastical and disputable, under which they themselves laboured, had gushed
the Scots to extremities; was it requisite that the English should forge their own chains, by imposing chains on their unhappy neighbours? That the ancient practice of parliament was to give grievances the precedence of supply; and that it ought to stand as a rule to an assembly of men, that the course of the precedents should not be followed, formed on a jealousy inherent in the constitution, and was never interpreted as any peculiar difficulty of the present sovereignty. That a practice, which had been upheld, during times, by the most delicate liberty, might not, in common prudence, be departed from, where such undeniable reasons for suspicion had been afforded. That it was ridiculous to plead the advanced season, and the urgency of supply; when it plainly appeared, that in order to afford security for the present, and to reduce the Commons, great political contrivance had been employed. That the writs for elections were issued early in the winter; and if the meeting of parliament had not purposely been delayed till so near the commencement of military operations, there had been leisure sufficient to have redressed all national grievances, and to have proceeded afterwards to an examination of the King's occasion for supply. That the intention of so gross an artifice was to engage the Commons, under pretence of necessity, to violate the regular order of parliament; and a precedent of that kind being once established, no inquiry into public matters, would afterwards be practicable; because, any argument more unanswerable could be pleaded for supply, than an offer to abolish ship-money; a taxation the most illegal, and the most dangerous, that had ever, in any reign, been imposed upon the nation: and that, by bypassing the Commons, the King might, in a manner, ratify the authority by which it had been levied; at least, give encouragement for advancing new pretentions of a like nature, in hopes of resigning them on like advantageous conditions.

These reasons, joined to so many occasions of ill-humour, seemed to sway with the greater number: but to make the matter worse, Sir Harry Vane, the secretary, told the Commons, that without any authority from the king, nothing less than twelve subsidies would be accepted as a compensation for the abolition of ship-money. This assertion, proceeding from the indiscretion, if we are not rather to call it the treachery, of Vane, displeased the House, by showing a stiffness and rigidity in the king, which, in a claim so ill-grounded, was deemed inexcusable. We are informed likewise, that some men, who were thought to understand the state of the nation, affirmed in the House, that the amount of twelve subsidies was a greater sum than could be found in all England. Such were the happy ignorance and inexperience of those times, with regard to taxes.

The king was in great doubt and perplexity. He saw that his friends in the House were out numbered by his enemies, and that the same counsels were still prevalent, which had ever bred such opposition and disturbance. Instead of hoping that any supply would be granted him to carry on war against the Scots, whom the majority of the House regarded as their best friends and firmest allies; he expected every day that they would present him an address for making peace with those rebels. And if the House met again, a vote, was informed, would certainly pass, to blast his revenue of ship-money; and thereby rene all the opposition, which, with so much difficulty, he had surrounded in levying that taxation. Where great events can all succeed it is difficult to follow the best conduct, and nor is it any wonder, that the king, whose capacity was not equal to situations of such extreme delicacy, Disolution. should hastily have formed and executed the resolution of dissolving this parliament: a measure however of which he soon after repented, and which the subsequent events, more than any convincing reason, inclined every one to condemn. The last parliament, which ended with such vigour and violence, had yet, as it first creased their intentions with greater appearance of moderation than this parliament had hitherto assumed.

An abrupt and violent dissolution naturally excites disputes among the people, who usually put entire confidence in their representatives, and expect from them the redress of all grievances. As if there were not already sufficient grounds of complaint, the king persevered still to act with such oppression. In those counsels, which, from experience, he might have been sensible were so dangerous and unpopular. Bellasis and Sir John Hotam were summoned before the council; and refusing to give any account of their conduct to parliament, were committed to prison, for the petitions and complaints, which had been made to the public authorities, or were demanded from Crew, chairman of the commitee, and on his refusal to deliver them, he was sent to the Tower. The studies, and even the pockets, of the Earl of Warwick and Lord Brooke, before the expiration of privilege, were searched, in expectation of finding treasurable papers. These acts of authority were interpreted, with some appearance of reason, to be invasions on the right of national assemblies. But the king, after the first provocation which he met with, over sufficiently respected the privileges of parliament; and by his example, he further confirmed their resolution, when they should acquire a support, to pay like disregard to the prerogatives of the crown.

Though the parliament was dissolved, the convocation was still allowed to sit; a practice, of which, since the Reformation, there was but few instances, and which was allowed for the reason that it would be illegal to grant to the king a supply from the spirituality, and framing many canons, the convocation, jealous of like innovations with those which had taken place in Scotland, imposed an oath on the clergy, and the graduates in the universities, by which every one swore to maintain the established government of the church by archbishops, bishops, deans, chapters, &c. These steps, to the present; the chief advantage of which, was to extend the subsidies deemed illegal; because not ratified by consent of parliament, in whom all authority was now supposed to be centred. And nothing besides could afford more subject of ridicule, than an oath, which contained an et cetera in the midst of it.

The people, who generally abhorred the Dissolution in convocation as much as they revered the parliament, could scarcely be restrained from insulting and abusing this assembly; and the king was obliged to give them guards in order to protect them. An attack too was made during the night upon Laud, in his palace of Lambeth, by above 500 persons; and he found it necessary to fortify himself for his defence. A mark was given of two thousand sectaries, entered St. Paul's, where the high commission then sat; tore down the benches; and cried out, No bishop, no high commission. All these instances of discontent were pressages of some great revolution; had the court possessed sufficient skill to discern the danger, or sufficient power to provide against it.

In this disposition of men's minds, it was in vain that the king issued a declaration, in order to convince his people of the necessity, which he lay under, of dissolving the last parliament. The chief topic, on which he insisted, was, that the Commons imitated the bad example of all their predecessors of late years, in making continual encroachments on his authority, in crowning his whole administration and conduct, in discussing every circumstance of public government, and in their indirect bargaining and contracting with their king for supply; as if nothing ought to be given him but what he should purchase either by quitting somewhat of his royal prerogative, or by diminishing and lessening his standing revenue. These practices, he said, were contrary to the maxims of their ancestors; and these practices were totally incompatible with monarchy.
The king, disappointed of parliamentary subsidies, was obliged to recourse to other expedients, in order to supply his urgent necessities. The ecclesiastical subsidies were most unsatisfactory; and it was known that the clergy should contribute to a war, which was in a great measure of their own raising. 1 He borrowed money from his ministers and courtiers; and so much was he belabored among the people, that it is said, 30,000 pounds were lent to the king in a few days; though nothing but treachery could be more disagreeable to a prince, full of dignities, than to be a burden on his friends, instead of being a support to them. Some persons thought the king inclined towards forming a party from the court, yet still repelled by the spirit of liberty, which was now become unconquerable. 2 A loan of 40,000 pounds was extorted from the Spanish merchants, who had built in the Tower, exposed to the risk of insolvency, and of course of prejudice from the soldiery, levied on the counties; an ancient practice, 3 but supposed to be abolished by the petition of right. All the pepper was bought from the East India Company upon trust, and sold, at a great detriment, for very meagre and most unprofitable land; covering two or three thousand pounds of base money. 4 Such were the extremities to which Charles was reduced. The fresh difficulties which, amidst the present distress, did not fail of being added to the present load of step-money, obliged him to exert continual acts of authority, augmented the discontent of the people, and increased his indigence and necessitines. 5 To these arts, however, the king added the public service, though with great difficulty, to march his army, consisting of 19,000 feet, and 2000 horses. The Earl of Northumberland was appointed general: the Earl of Stratford, who was the vice-regent of Ulster in Ireland, became general of the horse; and Lord Conway, general of the foot. A small fleet was thought sufficient to serve the purposes of this expedition. 6

Great were the effects of zeal and unanimity, that the Scottish army, though somewhat less ready than the king's; and they marched to the borders of England. To engage them to proceed, besides their general knowledge of the secret discontents of that kingdom, Lord Laisthe had forged a letter to the king of Scots, and undertook the negotiation of a treaty at Hip.

The Scots upon whom, the king agreed in a treaty, and named sixteen English noblemen, who met with eleven Scottish commissioners at Rippon. The Earl of Herbert, the Earl of Devon, Lord Bolingbroke, and the bishop of London, Newburn, Bristol, and Berkshire, the Lords Kencott, Wharton, Dunsmore, Pake, Broke, Savile, Poulte, and Howard of Exeter, were chosen by the king; all of them popular men, and well known to the people of Scotland, in order to prevent any rotation taken, against such an expedition. In order to secure the meetings of the parliament, the king renewed the lease of the castle of the Tower, and the new subsidy, and the extension of the privileges conferred on the church. 7

On the 20th August, the king, by a detachment of 4500 men under Conway, was supposed to determine with respect to the passage of the river. The Scots first entrenched, with great civility, not to stop the people that would go down, and then attacked them with great bravely, killed several, and chased the rest from their ground. Such a panic seized the whole English army, that the Earl of Newburn, the queen's brother, fled to the side of Durham; and not yet thinking themselves safe, they deserted that town, and retreated into Yorkshire. 8

The Scots took possession of Newcastle; and though sufficiently strong to have maintained it for their victory, but they were weak in discipline, and persevered in their resolution of paying for every thing, in order still to maintain the appearance of an amicable correspondence with England. They also depatched messengers to the queen, who arrived in York; and they took care, after the advantage which they had obtained, to redouble their expressions of loyalty, duty, and submission to his person, and they even made apologues, full of sorrow and contrition, which spoiled all the occasion. 9

The nation was universally and highly discontented. The army was discouraged, and began likewise to be discontented, both from the conventicle of general disgust, and as an excuse of their extraordinary situation, when deserting rather than want of will than of courage to fight. The treasury too was quite exhausted, and every expedition for supply had been tried to the utmost. No event had happened which might have been rendered authoritative, at least as very probable; yet such was the king's situation, that no provision could be made, nor was even any resolution taken, against such an exigency. 10

In the 20th of the month, the Earl of Devon proposed a treaty at Hip; the Scots upon whom, the king agreed in a treaty, and named sixteen English noblemen, who met with eleven Scottish commissioners at Rippon. The Earl of Herbert, the Earl of Devon, Lord Bolingbroke, and the bishop of London, Newburn, Bristol, and Berkshire, the Lords Kencott, Wharton, Dunsmore, Pake, Broke, Savile, Poulte, and Howard of Exeter, were chosen by the king; all of them popular men, and well known to the people of Scotland, in order to prevent any rotation taken, against such an expedition. To engage them to proceed, besides their general knowledge of the secret discontents of that kingdom, Lord Laisthe had forged a letter to the king of Scots, and undertook the negotiation of a treaty at Hip.

The Scots upon whom, the king agreed in a treaty, and named sixteen English noblemen, who met with eleven Scottish commissioners at Rippon. The Earl of Herbert, the Earl of Devon, Lord Bolingbroke, and the bishop of London, Newburn, Bristol, and Berkshire, the Lords Kencott, Wharton, Dunsmore, Pake, Broke, Savile, Poulte, and Howard of Exeter, were chosen by the king; all of them popular men, and well known to the people of Scotland, in order to prevent any rotation taken, against such an expedition.

all things the House of Commons, and who expected no supply from them on any reasonable terms, thought, that in his present distresses, he might be enabled to levy supplies by the authority of the peers alone. But the employing the army to a necessity which appeared distant and doubtful, rendered it impossible for him to avail himself of a necessity which was now at last become real, urgent, and inevitable.

By Northumberland's sickness, the command of the army had devolved on Strafford. This nobleman possessed more vigour of mind than the king or any of the council. He advised Charles rather to put all to hazard, than to throw the issue of the necessity which appeared imminent into the hands of the army. His opinion therefore was, that the king should push forward, and attack the Scots, and bring the affair to a quick decision; and if he were ever so unsuccessful, nothing worse could befall him, than what, from his inactivity, he would certainly be exposed to. To show how easy it would be to execute this project, he ordered an assault to be made on some quarters of the Scots, and he gained an advantage over them. Necessity of arms had as yet been agreed to during the treaty at Ripon; yet great clamour prevailed, on account of this act of hostility. And when it was known that the officer who conducted the assault, was a violent outcast was raised against the king, for employing that hated sect to the murder of his protestant subjects.

It may be worthy of remark, that several mutinies had arisen among the English troops, when marching to join the army; and some officers had been murdered, merely on suspicion of their being papists. The petition of right had abolished all martial law; and by an inconvenience which naturally attended the plan, as yet new and unformed, these martial laws were made absolutely impossible for the generals to govern the army, by all the authority which the king could legally confer upon them. The lawyers had declared, that martial law could not be executed, except in the presence of an enemy; and because it had been found necessary to execute a mutineer, the generals thought it advisable, for their own safety, to apply for a pardon from the crown. This weakness, however, was executed by the king, and by the council. Conway said, that if any lawer were so unwise to attempt to discover the secret to the soldiers, it would be necessary instantly to refuse him, and to hang the lawyer himself by sentence of a court-martial.

An army thus undisciplined, frightened, sedition, ill-paid, and governed by no proper authority, was very unfit for withstanding a victorious and high-spirited enemy, and retaining in subjection a discontented and zealous nation.

Charles, in despair of being able to stem the torrent, at last determined to yield to it; and as he foresaw, that the great council of the peers would advise him to call a parliament, he told them in his first speech, that he had already taken this resolution. He informed them likewise, that the queen, in a letter which she had written to him, had very earnestly recommended that step to him. This good prince, who was extremely attached to his consort, and who passionately wished to render her popular in the nation, forgot not, amidst all his distress, the interests of his domestic tenement.

In order to subjoin both armies, (for the king was obliged, in order to save the northern counties, to pay his enemies,) Charles wrote to the city, desiring a loan of 200,000 pounds. And the peers at York, whose authority was now much greater than that of their sovereign, even joined in the same request. So low was this price already fallen in the eyes of his own subjects!

As many difficulties occurred in the negotiation with the Scots, it was proposed to transfer the treaty from Rippon to London: a proposal willingly embraced by that nation, who were now sure of treating with advantage, in a place where the king, they foresaw, would be in a manner a prisoner, in the midst of his implacable enemies and their determined friends.

Meeting of the long parliament—Strafford and Laud impeached—Lush and Wharton by—Great authority of the Commons—The bishops attacked—Lomond and powicock—Ordered till—Strafford's trial—Bill of attainder—Execution of Strafford—High commission and star-chamber abolished—King's journey to Scotland.

The causes of distrust which, for above thirty years, had been daily multiplying in England, were now come to full maturity, and threatened the kingdom with some great revolution or convulsion. The uncertain and undefined limits of prerogative and privilege had been eagerly disputed during that whole period; and in every controversy between prince and people, the question, however doubtful, had always been decided by each party in favour of its own pretensions. Too lightly, perhaps, moved by the appearance of necessity, the king had even assumed powers incompatible with the principles of limited government, and had rendered it impossible for his most zealous partisans entirely to justify his conduct, except by topics so unpopular, that they were more fitted, in the present position of men's minds, to inflame than to appease the general discontent. Those great supports of public authority, law and religion, had likewise, by the unbounded compliance of judges and prelates, lost much of their influence over the people; or rather, had in every respect been identified with the law and religion, authorized the spirit of opposition and rebellion. The nobility, also, whom the king had no means of retaining by offices and preferments suitable to their rank, had been persuaded with the general discontent, and unwarily threw themselves into the scale which already began too much to preponderate. Sensible of some encroachments which had been made by royal authority, men entertained no jealousy of the Commons, whose enterprises for the acquisition of power had ever been covered with the appearance of public good, and had hitherto gone no further than some disappointment efforts and endeavours. The progress of the Scottish malcontents reduced the king to an entire dependence for support upon the people, and in England brought great accession of authority to the latter: the near prospect of success roused all latent murmurs and pretensions, which had hitherto been held in check violent constraint, and the talk of revolution and opinion ran so strongly against the court, that the king was in no situation to refuse any reasonable demands of the popular leaders, either for defining or limiting, the powers of his prerogative. Even many extravagant claims, in his present situation, would probably be made, and must necessarily be complied with.

The triumph of the malcontents over the church, was not yet so immediate or certain. Though the political and religious partisans mutually lent assistance to each other, there were many who joined the former, yet declined all connexion with the latter. The hierarchy had been embarrassed in England, ever since the Reformation: the Romish church, in all ages, had carefully maintained that form of ecclesiastical government: the ancient fathers, too, bore testimony to episcopal jurisdiction: and though charity may seem at first to have had place among Christian pastors, the period during which it prevailed, was so short, that few undisputed traces of it remained in history. The bishops, and their more zealous partisans, inferred thence the divine indefeasible right of prelacy: others regarded that institution as venerable and useful: and if the love of novelty led some to adopt the new rites and discipline of the puritans, the reverence to antiquity retained many in their attachment to the liturgy and government of the church. It behaved, therefore, the zealous innovators in... parliament to proceed with some caution and reserve. By promoting all measures which reduced the powers of the crown, they hoped to disarm the king, whom they justly regarded, from private, but with the object of controlling policy, to be the determined patron of the hierarchy. By declaring against the supposed encroachments and tyranny of the prelates, they endeavoured to carry the nation from a hatred of their persons, to an opposition against their office and character. And when the means to effect this were difficult, they thought, to lead them, by degrees, into many measures, for which they formerly entertained the greatest aversion. Though the new sectaries composed not, at first, the majority of the nation, they were inflamed, as is usual among innovators, with extreme zeal for their opinions. Their unaccountable passion, disguised to themselves, as well as to others, under the appearance of holy fervour, was well qualified to make proselytes, and to seize the minds of the ignorant multitude. And one furious enthusiast was able, by his active industry, to surround the indolent efforts of many sober and reasonable antagonists.

When the nation, therefore, was so generally disconsolate, and little suspicion was entertained of any design to subvert the church and monarchy; so wonder that almost all elections ran in favour of those who, by their bugbear, morality, to poetry and politics, had encouraged the national prejudices. It is a usual compliment to regard the king's inclination in the choice of a speaker; and Charles had intended to advance Gardiner, recorder of London, to a place of importance. It was not the least interest of the crown at that time possess in the nation, that Gardiner was disappointed of his election, not only in London, but in every other place where it was attempted. And the king was obliged to make the choice of speaker fall on Lenthall, a lawyer of some character, but not sufficiently qualified for so high and difficult an office.

The eager expectations of men with regard to the long-dispatched, to a parliament, summoned at so critical a period, during such general dissensions; a parliament which, from the situation of public affairs, could not be abruptly dissolved, and which was to execute every thing left unfinished by former parliaments; these motives, so important and interesting, engaged the attendance of all the members; and the House of Commons was never observed to be, from the beginning, so full and numerous. Without any interval, therefore, they entered upon business, and, by unanimous consent, they immediately struck a blow which may in a manner be regarded as decisive.

The Earl of Strafford was considered as chief minister, both of the credit which the king possessed with his master, and of his own great and uncommon vigour and capacity. By a concurrence of accidents, this man laboured under the severe hatred of all the three nations which composed the British monarchy. The Scots, whose authority now ran extremely high, looked on him as the capital enemy of their country, and one whose counsels and influence they had most reason to apprehend. He had engaged the parliament of Ireland to advance large subsidies, in order to support a war against them; he had levied an army of 9000 men, with which he had menaced all their western coast: he had obliged the Scots, who lived under his government, to renounce the covenant, their national idol: he had, in Ireland, proclaimed the Scottish covenanters rebels and traitors, even before the king had issued any such declaration against them in England; and he had ever dissuaded his master against the late treaty and alliance with the arms, which had been most dishonourable. So avowed and violent were the Scots in their resentment of all these measures, that they had refused to send commissioners to treat at York, as was first proposed; because, they said, the Lieutenant of Ireland had, in a manner, been the capital enemy, being general of the king's forces, had been the chief command and authority. Strafford, first as deputy, then as lord lieutenant, had governed Ireland during eight years with great vigour, activity, and order: he was, but with very little popular the nation so averse to the English government and religion, these very virtues were sufficient to draw on him the public hatred. The manners too and character of this great man, though to all full of courtesy, and to his friends full of affection, and to his enemies of contempt, and liberty, and toleration, could not be concealed. His authority and influence, during the time of his government, had been unlimited; but no sooner did adversity seize him, than the concealed aversion of the nation blazed at once, and the Irish parliament used every expedient to aggravate his fall. It would not be easy, it was observed, to extricate him.

The universal discontent which prevailed in England against the court, was all pointed towards the Earl of Strafford; though without any particular reason, but because he was the minister of state whom the king most favoured and most trusted. His extraction was honourable, his paternal fortune considerable: yet envy attended his sudden and great elevation. And his former associates in popular counsels, finding that he owed his advancement to the desertion of their cause, represented him as the great apostate of the commonwealth, whom it believed them to sacrifice as a victim to public justice.

Strafford, sensible of the load of public services under which he laboured, would gladly have declined attendance in parliament; and he begged the king's permission to withdraw himself to his government of Ireland, at least to remain at the head of the army in Yorkshire; where indeed his council, had encouraged him to believe, from the reason of his distance, to elude the attacks of his enemies. But Charles, who had entire confidence in the earl's capacity, thought that his counsels would be extremely useful during the critical moments, and that it was time to make him acquit himself of his duties. Strafford still insisted on the danger of his appearing among so many enraged enemies, the king, little appreciative that his own authority was so suddenly to expire, promised him protection, and assured him, that not a hair of his head should be touched by the parliament.

No sooner was Strafford's arrival known, than a concerted attack was made upon him in the House of Commons. Pyn, in a long studied discourse, drew into many heinous things, and enumerated all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and, from a complication of such oppressions, inferred, that a deliberate plan had been formed of changing entirely the frame of government, and subverting the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom.

Could any thing, he said, increase our indignation against so enormous and criminal a project, it would be to find, that during the reign of the deepest of princes, the constitution had been endangered by the worst of ministers, and that the virtues of the king had been seduced by wicked and pernicious counsel. We must inquirer, who had possessed himself with these bitterest thoughts; and though doubtless many civil counselors will be found to have contributed their endeavours, yet is there one who challenges the infamous pre-eminece, and who, by his courage, enterprise, and capacity, is entitled to the first place among these betrayers of their country. He is the Earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, and president of the council of York, who in both places, and in all other provinces where he has been intrusted with authority, has raised ample monuments of tyranny; and will appear, from a survey of his actions, to be the chief promoter of every arbitrary counsel. Some instances of imperious expressions, as well as actions, were given by Pyn; who, after having entered into the manner, and the character of that minister, and endeavoured to expose his whole character and manners. The austere genius of Strafford, occupied in the pursuits of ambition, had not rendered his heart less susceptible to such sensible inferences, and secured him from the dominion of the fear; and in that sullen age, when the irregularities of pleasure were more reproachful than the most odious crimes, these weaknesses were thought worthy of being mentioned, together with his terrors. These things being so related, the whole, the orator concluded, that it belonged to the House to provide a remedy proportionable to the disease, and to prevent the further mischiefs, justly to be apprehended from the wicked power, requisite over the measures and counsels of their sovereign.
Sir John Clotworthy, an Irish gentleman, Sir John Hot-ham of Yorkshire, and many others, entered into the same topics: and, after several hours spent in bitter invective, when the doors were locked in order to prevent all discovery of their purpose; it was moved, in consequence of the resolution secretly taken, that Strafford should immEDIATELY be impeached of high treason. This motion was received with universal approbation; nor was there, in all the debate, one person that opposed it, to stop the torrent of any testimony in favour of the earl's conduct. Lord Falkland alone, though known to be his enemy, modestly desired the House to consider, whether it would not better suit the king's maxims of procedure, to leave it to the committee many of those particulars which had been mentioned, before they sent up an accusation against him. It was ingeniously answered by Pym, that such a delay might probably blast all their hopes, and put it out of their power to proceed any further in the prosecution: that when Strafford should learn, that so many of his enormities were discovered, his conscience would dictate his condemnation; and, so great was his power and credit, he would immediately prejudice the dissolution of the parliament, or attempt some other desperate measure for his own preservation: that the Commons were only accusers, not judges; and it was the province of the Peers to determine whether Strafford should, by a verdict of death, and, if so, to which person, did not amount to the highest crime known by the law. Without further debate, the impeachment was declared; Pym was chosen to carry it up to the Lords: most of that body were in the same opinion with the Speaker,
and Strafford, who had just entered the House of Peers,
and who little expected so speedy a prosecution, was immEDIATELY, upon this general charge, ordered into custody, with several symptoms of violent prejudice in his judges,
and as a traitor to his sovereign.

Laud impeached.

In the inquiry concerning grievances, and in the censure of past measures, Laud could not long escape the severe scrutiny of the Commons;
who, in this instance, felt the interest of their prelate, as well by their prejudices against his whole order, as by the extreme antipathy which his intemperate zeal had drawn upon him. After a deliberation, which scarcely lasted half an hour, an impeachment of high treason was voted against this subject, the first, both in rank and in favour, throughout the kingdom. Though this incident, considering the example of Strafford's impeachment, and the present disposition of the commons, and the necessity, needed be no pursuit to him; yet was he betrayed into so much passion, when the accusation was presented. The Commons themselves, he said, though his accusers, did not believe him guilty of the crimes with which they charged him: an insinuation which, on the very day, upon more mature deliberation, he desired leave to retract: but so little favourable were the Peers, that they refused him this advantage or indulgence. Laud also was immediately, upon this general charge, sequestered from parliament, and committed to custody.

The capital article insisted on against these two great men, was the design which the Commons supposed to have formed, of subverting the laws and constitution of England, and introducing arbitrary and unlimited authority into the kingdom. Of all the king's ministers, no one was so obnoxious in this respect as the lord keeper Fennel, whose voice in the king's council, and the parliament, had left the chair, and refused to put the question, when ordered by the House. The extra-judicial opinion of the judges in the case of ship-money, had been procured by his intrigues, persuasions, and even menaces.
In all unpopular and illegal measures, he was ever most active; and he was even believed to have declared publicly, that while he was keeper, an order of council should always, with him, be equivalent to a law. To appease the rage of the commons, and put an end to the clamour heard at their bar. He prostrated himself with all humility before the House; but this submission availed him nothing.
An impeachment was resolved on; and, in order to escape their fury, he thought proper secretly to withdraw and retire into Holland. As he was not esteemed equal to Strafford, or even to Laud, either in capacity or in fidelity to his master, it was generally believed that his escape had been connived at by the popular leaders. This impeachment, however, in his ab-sees, was carried up to the House of Peers.

Sir Francis Windebank, the secretary, was a creature of Laud's; a sufficient reason for his being extremely noxious to the Commons. He was secretly suspected too of the crime of popery; and it was known that, from compliance to the queen, and indeed in compliance with the king's maxims of procedure, he granted many indulgences to catholics, and had signed warrants for the pardon of priests, and their delivery from confinement.
Grinstone, a popular member, called him, in the House,
the very pander and broker to the whore of Babylon.
Finding that the scrutiny of the Commons
was pointed towards him, and being sensible Windebank that England was no longer a place of safety for men of his character, he suddenly made his escape into France.

Thus, in a few weeks, this House of Commons, not opposed, or rather seconded, by the Peers, had produced such a revolution in the government, that the two most powerful and most favoured ministers of the king were thrown out of the land and the court, to be tried for their life; two other ministers had, by flight alone, saved them-changes from a like fate: all the king's servants saw that no protection could be given them by their master; a new Government was established in the counties, and a new tribunal all those trembled, who had before exulted most in their credit and authority.

What rendered the power of the Commons more formidable was, the extreme influence which they had been derected. Not content with the authority which they had gained by acquiring these great ministers, they were resolved to render the most considerable bodies of the nation obeysions to them. Though the aid of the great authority people, they determined, for the support of the Commons, likewise with terrors, and to overawe those who might still be inclined to support the falling ruins of monarchy.

During the late military operations several powers had been exercised by the lieutenants and deputy-sheriffs of counties; and these powers, though necessary for the defence of the nation, and even warrantcd by all former precedent, yet not being authorized by statute, were now voted to be illegal; and the persons who had assumed them, declared delinquents. This term was newly come into vogue, and expressed a degree or species of guilt not exactly known or ascertained. In consequence of that determination, many of the nobility and prime gentry of the nation, while out ofNoving, as they justly thought, the legal powers of magistracy, unexpectedly found themselves involved in the crime of delinquency. And the Commons reaped this multiplied advantage by their vote: they dis-turned the crown; they established the maxims of rigid and liberty; and they spread the terror of their own authority.

The writs for ship-money had been directed to the sheriffs, who were required, and even obliged, under severe penalties, to assess the sums, upon individuals, and to levy them by their authority. Yet were all the sheriffs, and all those who had been employed in that illegal serv-
vice, tried, by a very rigorous sentence, to be delinquents.
The king, by the maxims of law, could do no wrong; his ministers and servants, of whatever degree, in case of any violation of the constitution, were alone culpable.

All the farmers and officers of the customs, who had been employed during so many years in levying tonnage and poundage, and the new impositions, were likewise declared criminals, and were afterwards glad to compound for a pardon by paying a fine of 130,000 pounds.

Every discretion and probability common in the star-chamber and high-commission courts, which, from their very constitution, were arbitrary, underwent a severe scrutiny: and all those who had concurred in such sentences, were voted to be liable to the penalties of law. No minister of the king, no member of the council, but found himself exposed by this decision.

The judges who had given their vote against Hambden, in the trial of ship-money, were accused before the Parliaments and obliged to find sureties for their appearance. Berkeley, a judge of the King's Bench, was seized by order of the House, even when sitting in his tribunal; and all men saw with an assurance the irresistible authority of their jurisdiction.

The sanction of the Lords and Commons, as well as that of the king, was declared necessary for the confirmation of this sentence. And if this judgment, it might be confessed, however reasonable, at least useful, it would have been difficult to justify by any precedent. But the present was no time for question or dispute. That decision which abolished all legislative powers, except that of parliament, was requisite for completing the new plan of liberty, and rendering it quite uniform and systematized. Almost all the bench of bishops, and the most considerable of the inferior clergy, who had voted in the late convention, found themselves exposed by these new principles to the imputation of delinquency.

The most unpopular of all Charles's measures, and the least justifiable, was the revival of monopolies, so solemnly and especially prohibited by the newly generated and reformed parliament. Sensible of this unlaudy measure, the king, had of himself recalled, during the time of his first expedition against Scotland, many of these oppressive patents; and had then repeatedly annulled by a recent act of parliament. But the receipt of every one who was concerned in them declared delinquent. The Commons carried so far their detestation of this odious measure, that they assumed a power which had formerly been seldom practised, and they expelled all their members who were monopolists or projectors: an artifice, by which, besides increasing their own privileges, they weakened still further the very small party which the king secretly retained in the House. Maldon, a notorious monopolist, was hearing associated himself with the ruling party, was still allowed to keep his seat. In all questions, indeed, of elections, no steady rule of decision was observed; and nothing further was regarded than the affections and attachments of the parties. Men's passions were too much heated to be shocked with any instance of justice, which served ends so popular as those which were pursued by this House of Commons. The whole sovereign power being thus in a manner transferred to the Commons, and the government, without any seeming violence or disorder, being changed in a moment from a monarchy almost absolute, to a pure democracy; the more evident weakness now visible in the executive, the parade of liberty roused; and agreeably to the spirit of free government, no less indignation was excited by the view of a violated constitution, than by the ravages of the most enormous tyranny.

This was the time when genius and capacity of all kinds, freed from the restraint of authority, and nourished by unbounded hopes and projects, began to exert themselves, and to distinguish by the public. Then was celebrated the superiority of Pyon, more fitted for ultrasound ornament, matured, not chilled, by his advanced age and long experience: then was displayed the mighty ambition of Hambden, taught disguise, not moderation, from former constraint; supported by courage, conducted by prudence, embellished by modesty: but whether founded in a love of power or zeal for liberty, is still, from his untimely end, left doubtful and uncertain: then too were known the dark, and debasing character of Tyrannical government: the imperious spirit of Hollis, violent and sincere, open and entire in his counsels and in his friendships; the enthusiastic genius of young Vane, extravagant in the ends which he pursued, sagacious and profound in the means which he employed; incited by the appearances of religion, negligent of the duties of morality.

So little money would be received for past measures, so contagious the general spirit of discontent, that even men of the most moderate tempers, and the most attached to the church and monarchy, exerted themselves with the utmost vigour against the redress of grievances, and in searching the authors of them. The lively and animated Digby displayed his eloquence on this occasion, the firm and undaunted Capell, the modest and candid Palmer. In this high tone and spirit are found the virtuous names of Hyde and Falkland. Though in their ultimate views and intentions, these men differed widely from the former; in their present actions and discourses, an entire concurrence and unanimity was observed.

By the daily harangues and invectives against illegal usurpations, not only the House of Commons inclined themselves with the highest animosity against the court: the nation caught new fire from the popular leaders, and seemed now to have made the first discovery of the many supposed disorders in the government. While the law in several instances seemed to be violated, they went no further than some secret and calm murmurs; but mounted up into a public tumult, because they now thought to be restored to its former integrity and vigour. The capital, especially, being the seat of parliament, was highly animated with the spirit of mutiny and disaffection. Tumultuous meetings of the people of parliament were frequently raised; and every man, neglecting his own business, was wholly intent on the defence of liberty and religion. By stronger contiguity, the popular affections were communicated from town to town, in this place of general redemptive and society.

The harangues of members, now first published and dispersed, kept alive the discontent against the king's administration. The pulpits, delivered over to puritanical preachers and lecturers, whom the Commons arbitrarily settled in all the considerable churches, resounded with faction and fanaticism. Vengeance was fully taken for the long silence and constraint, in which, by the authority of Laud and the high commission, these preachers had been retained. The press, freed from all fear or reserve, swarmed with productions dangerous by their sedentary zeal and fulminance more than by any art or elegance of composition. So little restraint was there, that the whole public charity which, during this tumult of various prejudices and passions, could be heard or attended to.

The sentence which had been executed against Prynne, Basset, and Barrow, had produced less effect in the House of Commons, without the instance of them. These libellers, far from being tamed by the rigorous punishments which they had undergone, showed still a disposition of repeating their offences; and the ministers were again set to work by further ennuimensions, and still further inflame the prevailing discontents. By an order, therefore, of council, they had been carried to remote prisons; Basset to Scilly, Prynne to Jersey, Burton to Guernsey; all access to them was denied; and the use of books, and of pens, ink, and paper, was refused them. The sentence for these additional punishments was immediately reversed in an arbitrary manner by the Commons: even the first sentence, upon examination, was declared illegal, and the judges ordered to make reparation to the sufferers. When the prisoners landed in England, they were received and entertained with the highest demonstrations of affection, were attended by a mighty concourse of compassion; and the charges were borne with great magnificence, and liberal presents bestowed on them. On their approach to any town, all the inhabitants crowded to receive them, and welcomed them with cries and acclamations. Their tum still increased, as they drew nigh to London. Some miles from the city, the zeals of their party met... them in great multitudes, and attended their triumphant entrance: boughs were carried in this tumultuous procession: the roads were strewed with flowers, and amidst the highest exultations of joy, were intermixed loud and virulent invectives against the pretenders, who had so cruelly persecuted such godly personages. The more ignoble these men were, the more sensible was the insult upon royal authority, and the more dangerous was the spirit of division and mutiny, which it discovered among the people.

Lilburne, Leighton, and every one that had been punished for seditious libels during the preceding administration, were placed in this dilemma, and were deemed dangerous from the judges and ministers of justice.

Not only the present disposition of the nation insured impunity to all libellers: a new method of framing and dispersing libels was invented by the leaders of popular discontent. Petitions to parliament were drawn, charging redress against particular grievances; and when a sufficient number of subscriptions was procured, the petitions were presented to the Commons, and immediately published. These petitions became secret bonds of association among the subscribers, and seemed to give undoubted sanction and authority to the complaints which they contained.

It is permitted by historians favourable to the royal cause to encourage their own party in a declaration, that a most disingenuous or rather criminal practice prevailed, in conducting many of these addresses. A petition was first framed; moderate, reasonable, such as might please or please any particular interest. The names were afterwards torn off, and the petition was considered as an instrument which had served the purposes of the popular faction. We may judge of the wild fury which prevailed throughout the nation, when so scandalous an imposture, which affected to represent the sense of the people, were purchased, without drawing infamy and ruin upon the managers.

So many grievances were offered, both by the members, and by petitions without doors, that the House was divided into various committees, charged, each of them, with the examination of some particular violation of law and liberty, which had been complained of. Besides the general committees of religion, trade, privileges, laws; many subdivisions of these were formed, and a strict scrutiny was every where carried on. It is to be remarked, that, before the beginning of this century, when the Commons assumed less influence and authority, complaints of grievances were usually presented to the House by members, and they were willing to have the facts observed by them. These general committees, which were a kind of inquisitorial courts, had not then been established; and we find that the king, in a former declaration, complained of their multiplication; the present number is a violation of royal authority. But never was so much multiplied as at present, the use of these committees; and the Commons, though themselves the greatest employers, employed the usual artifice of complaining against innovations, and pretending to recover the ancient and established government.

From the reports of their committees, the House daily passed votes, which mortified and astonished the court, and inflamed and animated the nation. Ship-money was declared illegal and arbitrary; the sentence against Hampden cancelled; the court of York abolished; compositions for knighthood stigmatized; the enlargement of the forests condemned; patents for monopoles annulled; and every late measure had particular opposition in the camp and the courts. To-day, a sentence of the star-chamber was excused against: to-morrow, a decree of the high-commission. Every discretionary act of council was represented as arbitrary and tyrannical; and the general inference was still ascertained, that a formed design had been laid to subvert the laws and constitution of the kingdom.

From necessity, the king remained entirely passive during all this eventful period: he had no friends, no courtiers, who continued faithful to him, were seized with astonishment at the rapid progress made by the Commons in power and popularity; and were glad, by their unactive and inoffensive behaviour, to compound for impunity. The torrent rising to so dreadful and unexpected a height, despaired all those, who from interest or habit were most attached to monarchy. And as for those who maintained their duty to the king, merely from respect to the constitution, they seemed by their concurrence to swell that inundation which began already to deluge every thing. "You have taken the whole machine of government in pieces," declared the Commons. It was a practice frequent with skilful artists, when they desire to clean the wheels from any rust which may have grown upon them. The engine, continued he, may again be restored to its former use and mien, provided it be given entire; so as not a pin be wanting. But this was far from the intention of the Commons. The machine, they thought, with some reason, was encumbered with many wheels and springs, which retarded and crossed its operations, and destroyed its utility. Happy had they proceeded with moderation, and been contented, in their present plenteous of power, to remove such parts only as might justly be deemed superfluous and incongruous.

In order to maintain that high authority which they had acquired, the Commons, besides confounding and overawing their opponents, judged it requisite to inspire the people with an impression and subservience; particularly into the Scots, and the religious partisans, to whose assistance and good offices they were already so much beholden.

No sooner were the Scots masters of the northern counties, than they laid aside their first professions, which they had been affected to support; and in order to prevent the destructive egress of plunder and free quarters, the country consented to give them a regular contribution of 850 pounds a day, in full of their subsistence. Part of the parliament, that might relieve the northern counties from so grievous a burden, agreed to remit pay to the Scottish, as well as to the English army; and because subsidies would be levied too slowly for so urgent a purpose, they was afterwards continued from the citizens upon the security of particular members. Two subsidies, a very small sum, were at first voted: and as the intention of this supply was to indemnify the members, who, by their private, and at the same time, credit, this pretence was immediately laid hold of, and the money was ordered to be paid, not into the treasury, but to commissioners appointed by parliament: a practice which, as it diminished the authority of the crown, was willingly embraced, and was afterwards continued by the Commons, with regard to every branch of revenue which they granted to the king. The invasion of the Scots had evidently been the cause of assembling the parliament, and the army raised to protect the nation; and to that total subjection in which he was now held: the Commons, for this reason, openly professed their intention of retaining these invectors, till all their own enemies should be suppressed, and all their purposes effected. We cannot yet spare the Scots, said Strode plainly to the House, the use of Zeruiah are still too strong for us: an allusion to a passage of Scripture, according to the mode of that age. Eighty thousand pounds a month were requisite for the subsistence of the two armies; a sum much greater than the subject had ever been accustomed, in any former period, to pay to the public. And though several subsidies, together with a poll-tax, were from time to time voted, yet it was always understood that the time to care to be in debt, in order to render the continuance of the session the more necessary.

The Scots being such useful allies to the malcontent party in England, no wonder they were courted with the most unlimited complaisance and the most important services. The king having, in his first speech, called them rebels, observed that he had given great offence to the parliament; and he was immediately subject to certain and even retrench the expression. The Scottish commissioners, of whom the most considerable were the Earl of Rothes and Lord Loudon, found every advantage to conducting their treaty; yet made no haste in bringing it to an issue. They were lodged in the city, and kept an intimate correspondence, as well with the magistrates, who were extremely dissatisfied, as with the popular leaders in the House of Commons. The church was assigned them for their devotions; and their chaplains, here, began openly to practise the presbyterian form of worship, which, except in foreign languages, had never hitherto been allowed as any form of toleration. So violent was the propensit\' towards this new religion, that multitudes of all ranks crowded to the church. Those, who were so happy as to find access early in the morning, kept their places by subscription; those who were seldom able to get in, to the doors or windows, in hopes of catching, at least, some distant murmur or broken phrases of the holy rhetoric. All the eloquence of parliament, now well refined from pedantry, united with the spirit of liberty, and employed in the most important interests, was not attended to with such inveterate avidity as were these lectures, delivered with righteous cant, and a provincial accent, full of burlesque and of ignorance.

The most effectual expedient for paving court to the zealous Scots, was to promote the presbyterian discipline and worship throughout England, and to this innovation, the popular leaders among the Commons, as well as their more serious cousins, were extremely inclined. The puritans party, whose progress, though secret, had hitherto been gradual in the kingdom, taking advantage of the present disorders, began openly to profess themselves, and to make a stand for the reformed religion. The prevalence of that sect in the parliament discovered itself, from the beginning, by insensible but devious symptoms. Marshall and Burgess, two puritanical clergymen, were chosen to preach before the House, and entertained them with discourses seven hours in length. It being the custom of the House always to take the sacrament before they enter upon business, they caused a particular service, which was assigned to them, and entertained them with discourses seven hours in length. When, the clerk of the House always to take the sacrament before they enter upon business, they caused a particular service, which was assigned to them, and entertained them with discourses seven hours in length. It being the custom of the House always to take the sacrament before they enter upon business, they caused a particular service, which was assigned to them, and entertained them with discourses seven hours in length.

Every meeting of the Commons produced some vehement harangue against the usurpations of the bishops, against the high commission, against the late convocation, against the new canons. So disgraced were all lawyers of civil liberty at the doctrines promulgated by the clergy, that these invectives were received without control; and no distinction, at first, appeared between such as desired only to repel the exorbitances of the haughty, and such as pretended totally to subvert episcopal jurisdiction. Encouraged by these favourable appearances, petitions against the church were framed in different parts of the kingdom. The epithet of the ignorant and vicious priesthood, was common applied to all churchmen, addicted to the established discipline and worship; though the episcopal clergy in England, during that age, seem to have been, as they are at present, sufficiently learned and exemplary. An address against episcopacy was presented by twelve clergymen to the committee of religion, and pretended to be signed by many hundreds of the puritanical persuasion. But what made most noise was, the city petition for a total alteration of church government. In 15,000 subscribers were annexed, and which was presented by Alderman Pennington, the city member. It is remarkable that, among the many ecclesiastical abuses there complained of, an allowance, given by the licensers of books, to publish a translation of Ovid's Art of Love, is not forgotten by these rustic censors.

Notwithstanding the favourable disposition of the people, the leaders in the House resolved to proceed with caution. They introduced a bill for prohibiting all clergymen the exercise of any civil office. As a consequence, the bishops were to be deprived of their seats in the House of Peers; a measure not unacceptable to the zealous faction of toleration. So anxious was the government devoted attachment of that order to the will of the monarch. But when this bill was presented to the Peers, it was rejected by a great majority; the first check which the Commons thereby gave to their project was a remarkable prognostic of what they might afterwards expect from the upper House, whose inclinations and interests could never be totally separated from the throne. But, to show how little they were discouraged, the Commons boldly brought in another bill for the total abolition of episcopacy; though they thought proper to let the bill sleep at present, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity of reviving it.

Among other acts of regal executive power, which the Commons were every day assuming, they issued orders for demolishing all images, altars, crucifixes. The zealous Sir Robert Carne, in his petition to these orders, was committed, removed all crosses even out of streets and markets; and from his abhorrence of that superstitious figure, would not any where allow one piece of wood or stone to lie over another at right angles.

The Bill for enclosing common land, which was attacked on account of innovations. Cozens, who had long been obnoxious, was exposed to new censures. This clergyman, who was Dean of Peterborough, was extremely popular in his diocese; he was known to his clergy to break the communicants to break the sacramental bread with their fingers; a privilege on which the puritans strenuously insisted; he would not so much as allow it to the clergymen in his diocese. A crated knife must perform that sacred office, and must never afterwards be profaned by any vulgar service.

Cozens likewise was accused of having said, The king has no such authority in ecclesiastical matters, than the dog who barks my horse's heels. The expression was violent; but it is certain, that all those high churchmen, who were so industrious in reducing the lathy to submission, were extremely fond of their own privileges and independency, and were desirous of exempting the nation from all subjection to the crown. A committee was elected by the lower House, as a court of inquisition upon the clergy, and was commonly denominated the committee of scandalous ministers. The politicians among the Commons were apprised of the great importance of the pulpit for guiding the people; the legislators were enraged against the prelatical clergy; and both of them knew that no established church could be overthrown by strictly observing the principles of justice, equity, or clemency. The proceedings, therefore, of this famous committee, which continued for several years, were cruel and arbitrary, and made great havoc both on the church and the universities. They began with harassing, imprisoning, and molesting the clergy; and ended with sequestrating and ejecting them. In order to join constant to cruelty, they gave the sufferers the epithet of scandalous, and endeavoured to render them as odious as they were miserable. The greatest vices, however, which were to be reproached to a great part of them, were, bowing at the name of Jesus, placing the communion table in the east, reading the king's oratory on Sunday, and other practices, which the established government, both in church and state, had strictly enjoined them.

It may be worth observing, that all historians, who lived near that age, or what perhaps is more decisive, all authors who have casually made mention of those public transactions, still represent the civil divisors and convulsions as proceeding from religious controversy, and consider the political disputes about power and liberty, as entirely subordinate to the other. It is true, had the king been able to support government, and at the same time to abstain from all invasion of national privileges, it seems not probable he would ever have required royal authority as to overturn the whole constitution; yet so entire was the subjection into which Charles was now fallen, that had not the wound been poisoned by the in-fighting of his courtiers, the government might have been easily remedied. Houses of parliaments, imprisonments and prosecution of members, ship-money, an arbitrary administration; these were loudly complained of: but the grievance which was most clamorous and constant, especially latter, were the surfeits, the rates placed about the altar, the bows exacted on approaching it, the liturgy, the breach of the sabbath, embroidered cope, lawn sleeves, the use of the ring in marriage, and the cross in baptism. On account of these, were the popular leaders content to throw the government into such violent convulsions; and, to the disgrace of that age, and of this island, it must be acknowledged that the disorders in Scotland entirely, and those in England mostly, proceeded from so mean and contemptible an origin.6

Some persons, partial to the patriots of this age, have ventured to put them in balance with the most illustrious characters of antiquity and modern times, as Pym, Hampden, Vane, as just parallel to those of Cato, Brutus, Cassius. Profound capacity, indeed, untainted courage, extensive enterprise; in these particulars, perhaps, the Roman do not much surpass the English worthies: but it will ever be observed that in their conversation, and private as well as public behaviour of both are inspected1 Compare only one circumstance, and consider its consequences. The leisure of those noble ancients was totally employed in the study of Greek eloquence and philosophy; is the cultivation of polite letters and civilized society: the whole discourse and language of the moderns were polluted with mysterious jargon, and full of the figures and wordy hypocrisies of their times.

The laws, as they stood at present, protected the church, but they exposed the catholics to the utmost rage of the puritans; and these unhappy religious, so obnoxious to the prevailing sect, could not hope to remain unmolested. The voluntary contribution which they had made, in order to assist the king in his war against the Scottish covenanters, was inquired into, and represented as the greatest enormity.2 By an address from the Commons, all the money that had been paid, or might be paid, into the sanctuary, and application was made to the king for seeing two-thirds of the lands of recusants; a proportion to which, by law, he was entitled, but which he had always allowed them to possess at his pleasure. In this composition of the law, the severe and bloody laws against priests was insatiate on; and one Goodman, a jesuit, who was found in prison, was condemned to a capital punishment. Charles, however, accrescent to his principles, scrupled to sign the warrant for his execution; and the Commons expressed great resentment on the occasion.8 There remains a singular petition of Goodman, begging to be hanged, rather than prove a source of contention between the king and his people:9 He escaped with his life; but it seems more probable that he was overlooked amidst affairs of greater consequence, than that such unrelenting hatred would be softened by any consideration of his courage and goodness.

For some years, Con, a Scotchman, afterwards, Rosetti, an Italian, had openly resided at London, and frequented the court, as vested with a commission from the Pope. The queen's soul, and her authority with her husband, had been the cause of this imprudence, so offensive to the nation. But the spirit of bigotry now rose too high to permit any longer such indulgences.6 Hayward, a justice of peace, having been wounded, when employed in the exercise of his office, by one James, a catholic madman, was carried into the city, where, on the authority as to overturn the whole constitution: yet so entire was the subjection into which Charles was now fallen, that had not the wound been poisoned by the infighting of his courtiers, the government might have been easily remedied. Houses of parliaments, imprisonments and prosecution of members, ship-money, an arbitrary administration; these were loudly complained of: but the grievance which was most clamorous and constant, especially latter, were the surfeits, the rates placed about the altar, the bows exacted on approaching it, the liturgy, the breach of the sabbath, embroidered cope, lawn sleeves, the use of the ring in marriage, and the cross in baptism. For some years, Con, a Scotchman, afterwards, Rosetti, an Italian, had openly resided at London, and frequented the court, as vested with a commission from the Pope. The queen's soul, and her authority with her husband, had been the cause of this imprudence, so offensive to the

Charles, in the former part of his reign, had endeavoured to overcome the intractable and encroaching spirit of the Commons, by a perseverance in his own measures, by a stately dignity of behaviour, and by imposing the utmost height, and even perhaps stretching beyond former precedent, the rights of his prerogative. Finding, by experience, how unsuccessful those measures had proved, and observing the low condition to which he was now reduced, he resolved to alter his whole conduct, and to regain the confidence of his people, by pliability, by concessions, and by a total conformity to their inclinations and prejudices. It may safely be averred, that this new extreme into which the king, for want of proper counsel or support, was fallen, became no less dangerous to the constitution, and pernicious to public peace, than the other, in which he had so long and so unfortunately persevered.

The pretensions with regard to tonnage and poundage were revived, and with certain assurance of success, by the Commons. The levies of these duties, as formerly, without consent of peers, catholics, and to enslave the catholics in return to be good and loyal sub-jects. But this whole matter, though very innocuous, was most carefully regarded. The king himself believed that he as much as any papist could be. See p. 346. 354.

Rushworth, vol. v. p. 239.

It appears not that the Commons, though now entirely masters, also feared the new emperor of James; and that this emperor, familiarly complained; a certain proof: that the rules of commerce, settled by Charles and his predecessors, were not to be altered by the new prince, were immediately established; but new limits of commodities. They seem rather to have been lower than at the time of the Duke of York, 1625.
and ever increasing them at pleasure, was such an incongruity to a free constitution, where the people, by their fundamental privileges, cannot be taxed but by their own consent, as could no longer be endured by these jealous patrons of liberty. In the preamble therefore to the bill, by which the Commons granted these duties to the king, they took care, in the strongest and most positive terms, to assert their own right of bestowing this gift, and to disavow the authority of all independent tule of assuming it. And that they might increase, or rather fairly fix, the entire dependence and subjection of the king, they voted these duties only for two months, and afterwards, from time to time, unless they should negate their own prerogatives, that the king could not arbitrarily and prudently dismiss this man, who bore both these invidious characters, remained uneunolsted. It was intended that Bedford, a popular man of great authority, as well as wisdom and moderation, should succeed Juxon; but the great prerogatives and noble prerogatives of the house of Commons, such as Croydon, was, in order to show that he entertained no intention ever again to separate himself from his parliament, passed this important bill without any scruple or hesitatin.

With regard to the bill for triennial parliaments, he made a little difficulty. By an old statute, passed during the reign of Edward III., it had been enacted, that parliaments should be held once every year, or more frequently if necessary: but as no provision had been made in case of failure, and no precise method pointed out for execution; this statute had been considered as dead and inactivated, and was dissolved with at pleasure. The defect was supplied by those vigilant patriots who now assumed the reins of government. It was enacted, that if the chancellor, who was first bound under severe penalties, failed to issue writs by the third of November, in the third year, after the votes of peers should be empowered to exert this authority: in default of the peers, that the sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. should summon the voters: and in their default, that the voters themselves should proceed to the election of the members, to the same manner as if writs had been regularly issued from the crown. Nor could the parliament, after it was assembled, be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, without the concurrence of their own Onion, and during the space of fifteen days. By this bill, some of the noblest and most valuable prerogatives of the crown were retracted; but at the same time nothing could be more necessary than such a statute for completing a regular plan of law and liberty. A great reluctance to assemble parliaments must be expected in the king; where these assemblies, as of late, established it as a maxim to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. During long intermissions of parliament, grievances and abuses, as was found by recent experience, would naturally creep in; and it would even become necessary for the king and council to exert a great discretionary authority, and by acts of state to supply, to every emergency present point prevalent, the danger was manifold uncertain and precarious. Charles, finding that nothing less would satisfy his parliament and people, at last gave his assent to this bill, which produced so great an innovation. Solemn oaths were prescribed to him by both Houses. Great rejoicings were expressed both in the city and throughout the nation. And mighty professions were everywhere made of gratitude and mutual returns of supply and confidence. This concession of the king, it must be owned, was not entirely voluntary: it was of a nature too important to be voluntary. The sole inference which has parts been entitled to draw from the submission so frankly made to present necessity, was that he had certainly adopted a scheme of government, and for the future was resolved, by every inducement, to acquire the confidence and affections of his people.

Charles thought, that what concessions were made to the public were only little considerations, if not gratifications bestowed on individuals, who had acquired the direction of civil and public duties. A change of ministers as well as of measures was therefore resolved on. The king had several new associates in the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Essex. Bristol; the lords Saville, Kimbolton: within a few days after was admitted the Earl of Warwick. All these noblemen were of the popular party; and some of them afterwards, when matters were pushed to extremities by the Commons, proved the greatest support of monarchy. Juxon, Bishop of London, who had never desired the treasurer’s staff, now earnestly solicited for leave to resign it, and retire to the care of that turbulent diocese committed to him. The king gave his consent; and it is remarkable, that during all the severe inquiries carried on against these two, he had no bad words for any of the prudent and virtuous of this man, who bore both these invidious characters, remained uneuousted. It was intended that Bedford, a popular man of great authority, as well as wisdom and moderation, should succeed Juxon; but the great prerogatives and noble prerogatives of the house of Commons, such as Croydon, was, in order to show that he entertained no intention ever again to separate himself from his parliament, passed this important bill without any scruple or hesitation.

Bristol; the lords Saville, Kimbolton: within a few days after was admitted the Earl of Warwick. All these noblemen were of the popular party; and some of them afterwards, when Charles unwarily made, and which thereafter banished all mutual confidence from the deliberations of council; where every man is supposed to have entire freedom, without fear of future punishment or inquiry, of proposing any expedient, questioning any opinion, or supporting any argument. Sir George Ratcliffe, the earl's intimate friend and confidant, was accused of high treason, sent for from Ireland, and committed to close custody. As no charge ever appeared or was prosecuted against him, it is impossible to form any intelligible interpretation to this measure, than that the Commons thereby intended to deprive Strafford, in his present distress, of the assistance of his best friend, who was most enabled, by this testimony, to justify the innocence of his patron's conduct and behaviour. When intelligence arrived in Ireland of the plans laid for Strafford's ruin, the Irish House of Commons, though they had very lately bestowed ample praises on his administration, entered into all the violent counsels against him, and prepared a representation of the miserable state into which, by his misconduct, they supposed the kingdom to be fallen. They sent over a committee to London, to assist in the prosecution of their unfortunate governor; and by intermissions from this committee, who entered into close conference with the popular leaders in England, was every measure of the Irish parliament governed and directed. And it was supposed, as well as practised; and were carried up against Sir Richard Bolton, the chancellor, Sir Gerard Louthier, chief justice, and Bramhall, Bishop of Derry. This step, which was an exact counterpart to the conduct of the English parliament, had also the same purposes: it deprived the king of the ministers whom he most trusted; it discouraged and terrified all the other ministers; and it prevented those persons who were best acquainted with the public affairs from giving evidence in his favour before the English parliament.

A. D. 1641. The bishops, being forbidden by the ancient canons to assist in trials for life, and being unwilling, by any opposition, to irritate the Commons, who were already much prejudiced against them, thought proper, of themselves, to withdraw. The Commons also voted, that the new created peers ought to have no voice in that question; because the accusation being agreed to while they were contemporaneous, their consent to it was implied with that of all the Commons of England. Notwithstanding this decision, which was meant only to deprive Strafford of so many friends, Lord Seymour, and some others, still continued to lend their consent; nor was their right to any further questioned.

To bestow the greater solemnity on this important trial, scaffoldis were erected in Westminster-hall; where both High and Common Councils, for the Commons, besides the chair of state, a close gallery was prepared for the king and queen, who attended during the whole trial. An accusation carried on by the united effort of three kindeoms against one man, unprotected by power, unassisted by counsel, dismounted by authority, was likely to prove a very unequal contest: yet such were the capacity, genius, presence of mind, displayed by this magnificent statesman, that, while argument, and reason, and law, had anywhere, he obtained an undisputed victory. And he perished at last, overwhelmed, and still unsubdued, by the open violence of his fierce and unremitting antagonists.

March 27. The articles of impeachment against Strafford are twenty-eight in number; and regard his conduct, as president of the council of York, as deputy or lieutenant of Ireland, and as councillor or commander in the north. But though four months were spent by the managers in framing the accusation, and all Strafford's answers were extraordinary; it appears from comparison, not only that he was free from the crime of treason, but that he extinguished in his conduct, making allowance for human infirmities, exposed to such severe scrutiny, was innocent, and even laudable.

The powers of the northern council, while he was president, had been extended by the king's instructions beyond what formerly had been practised: but that court being at first instituted by a stretch of royal prerogative, it had been usual for the prince to vary his instructions; and the largest authority committed to it, was allowed as legal as the most moderate, and most limited. Nor was it reasonable to conclude, that Strafford had used any art to procure those extensive powers; since he never once sat as president, or exercised one act of jurisdiction, after he was invested with this authority so much compassed of effect in the gobierno of Ireland, his administration had been equally promotive of his master's interest, and that of the subjects committed to his care. A large debt he had paid off: he had evinced a considerable sum in the exchequer: the revenue, which never before answered the charges of government, was now raised to be equal to them. A small standing army, formerly kept in no order, was augmented, and was governed by exact discipline; and a great force was then raised and paid, for the support of the king's authority against the Scottish exponents.

In industry, and all the arts of peace, were introduced among that rude people: the shipping of the kingdom augmented a hundred fold: the customs tripled upon the same rates; the exports double in value to the imports: manufactures, particularly that of linen, introduced and prospered; and the English and Scottish plantations, gradually advancing: the protestant religion encouraged, without the persecution or discontent of the catholics.

The troops of the north and west, had enforced without overstraining them. Discretionary acts of jurisdiction, indeed, he had often exercised, by holding courts-martial, billeting soldiers, deciding causes upon paper-petitions before the king, and by counsel, issuing orders in council, against their enemies, and for the public peace; but all this was done in the line of rigid laws and public principles; he apprehended still to the practice of all former deputies, and to the uncontrollable necessity of his situation.

So great was his art of managing elections and balancing parties, that he had engaged the Irish parliament to vote whatever was necessary, both for the payment of former debts, and for support of the new levied army; nor had he ever been reduced to the illegal expedients of the crown, for the support of his government, and the extirpation of his enemies. No imputation of incapacity could justly lie against his administration. Some instances of imperious expressions, and even actions, may be met with The case of Lord Mountnorris, of all those which were collected with so much industry, is the most flagrant and the least excusable.

It had been reported at the table of Lord Chancellor Lortis, that Annesley, one of the deputy's attendants, in moving a scold, had sorely hurt his master's foot, who was at that time afflicted with the gout. Perhaps, said Mountnorris, who was present at table, it was done in revenge of that public affront, which my lord deputy formerly put upon me: but he had a brother who would not have taken such a revenge. This casual, and seemingly innocent, at least ambiguous, expression, was reported to Strafford, who, on precaution that such a suggestion might be the foundation of an impeachment, appointed Annesley to arrange himself in another manner, and ordered Mountnorris, who was an officer, to be tried by a court-martial for mutiny and sedition against his general. The court, which consisted of the chief officers of the army, found them guilty of the capital, and condemned that nobleman to lose his head.

In vain did Strafford plead, in his own defence, against this article of impeachment, that the sentence of Mount-image corrupt was the deed, and that too unanimous, of the court, not the act of the deputy, that he spake not to a member of the court, nor voted in the cause, but sat uncovered as a party, and then immediately withdrew, to leave them to their freedom: that, sensible of the insolvency of the sentence,

he procured his majesty's free pardon to Mountnorris; and that he did not even keep that nobleman a moment in suspense of his fate. But to remind him, that he himself would sooner lose his right hand than execute such a sentence, nor was his lordship's life in any danger.

In vain did Strafford's friends add, as a further apology, that Mountnorris was a man of an infamous character, who had procured his pardon, or executed his sentence, without his knowledge; that, by the act of declaration; and blackened their character, by the vilest calumnies, when recalled: and that Strafford, expecting like treatment, had used this expedient for no other purpose than to subside the perturbate spirit of the man. These excuses alleviate the guilt; but there still remains enough to prove, that the mind of the deputy, though great and firm, had been not a little daunted by the not of absolute power and uncontrollable authority.

When Strafford was called over to England, he found every thing fallen into such confusion, by the open rebellion of the Scots, and the secret discontent of the English, that, if he had consented to, or executed his sentences, he might perhaps have been able to apologize for his conduct,

from the great law of necessity, which admits not, while the necessity is extreme, of any scruple, ceremony, or delay.* But, in fact, no illegal advice or consent was given to these men: and the whole amount of his guilt, during this period, was some peevish, or at most imperious, expressions, which, amidst such desperate extremities, and dooming a bad state of health, had unhappily fallen from him.

If Strafford's apology was, in the main, so satisfactory

when he pleaded to each particular article of the charge,

his victory was still more decisive when he brought the whole court to confusion and repelled the most violent measures of the Commons. If we could persuade, from the full view of his conduct and behaviour. Of all species of guilt the law of England had, with the most scrupulous exactness, defined that of treason; because on that rule it was found

most necessary to protect the subject against the violence of the king and of his ministers. In the famous statute of Edward III. all the kinds of treason are enumerated, and every other crime, besides such as are there expressly termed, is carefully excluded from that appellation. But with regard to this guilt, An endeavour to subvert the dfundamental laws, the statute of treasons is totally silent: and arbitrarily to introduce it into the fatal catalogue, is itself a subject for the law; and having, from an act of liberty, reverses a statute the best calculated for the security of liberty that had ever been enacted by an English parliament.

As this species of treason, discovered by the Commons, is entirely new and unknown to the laws; so is the species of proof by which they pretend to fix that guilt upon the prisoner. They have invented a kind of accumulative or evidence, by which many actions, either totally innocent in themselves, or criminal in a much inferior degree, shall, when united, amount to treason, and subject the person to the highest penalties inflicted by the law. A hate and unguarded word, a rash and passionate action, assisted by the malevolent fancy of the accuser, and tortured by doubtful constructions, is transmuted into the deepest guilt; and the lives and fortunes of the whole nation, no longer protected by justice, are subjected to arbitrary will and pleasure.

* Where has this species of guilt lain so long concealed?" said Strafford in conclusion: " where has this fire been so long buried, during so many centuries, that no smoke should extinguish itself, but burst out so as to consume me and my children? Better it were to live under no law at all, and, by the maxims of cautious prudence, to conform ourselves, the best we can, to the arbitrary will of a master: than fancy we have a law on which we can rely, and find at last that this law shall inflict a punishment precedent to the procrastination, and try us by maxims unheard of till the very moment of the prosecution. If I sail on the Thames, and split my vessel on an anchor; in case there be no buoy to give warning, the party shall pay me damages: but, if the anchor be marked out, then is the striking on it my own peril. Where is the mark set upon this crime? Where the token by which I should discover it? It has lain concealed under water; and no human prudence, no human industry, can serve to erroneously discern, much less to attain the destruction with which I am at present threatened.

"It is now full two hundred and forty years since treasons were defined; and so long has it been since any man was touched to this extent upon this crime, before myself. We have lived, and we have been governed, by laws, happily but we have lived gloriously abroad to the world: let us be content with what our fathers have left us: let not our ambition carry us to be more learned than they were, in these dangerous and destructive arts. Great wisdom it will be in your lordships, and just providence, for yourselves, for your posterities, for the whole kingdom, to cast from you,

into the fire, these bloody and mysterious volumes of arbi-

try and constructive treasons, as the primitive Christians did their books of curious arts, and betake yourselves to the plain letter of the statute, which tells you where the crime is, and points out to you the path by which you may avoid it.

"Let us not, to our own destruction, awake those sleeping lions, by rattling up a company of old records, which have lain for so many ages by the wall, forgotten and neglected. To give a point to my plea, I will now mention the most severe of any: that I, for my other amends for these treasions, be the means of introducing a precedent so pernicious to the laws and liberties of my native country.

"However, these gentlemen at the bar say they speak for the commonwealth; and they believe so: yet, under favour, it is I who, in this particular, speak for the commonwealth. Precedents, like those which are endeavoured to be established against me, must draw along such inconscientious and ill-omened train; in all which cases, I will be in the condition expressed in a statute of Henry

IV.; and no man shall know by what rule to govern his words and actions.

"Implore not, my lords, difficulties insurmountable upon ministers of state, nor disable them from serving with cheerfulness their king and country. If you examine them, and under such severe penalties, by every grain, by every little weight, the scrutiny will be intolerable. The public affairs of the kingdom must be left waste; and no

wise man, who has any honour or fortune to lose, will ever engage himself in such dreadful, such unknown perils.

"My lord, I have now troubled your lordships a great deliberation longer than I should do, for the most interest of these pledges, which a saint in heaven left me,

I should be loth."—Here he pointed to his children, and his weeping stopped him. —What I forfet for myself, it is nothing: but, I confess, that my indiscernement should forfet for them, it wounds me very deeply. You will be pleased to pardon my infirmity: something I should have said; but I see I shall not be able, and therefore I shall leave it.

"And now, my lords, I thank God, I have been, by his blessing, sufficiently instructed in the extreme vanity of all temporary enjoyments, compared to the importance of our eternal duration. And so, without some degree of humility, and with all tranquillity of mind, I submit,

clearly and freely, to your judgments: and whether that rigorous doom shall be to life or death, I shall repose myself, full of gratitude and confidence, in the arms of the great Author of my existence."

Certainly, says Whltlocke, with his usual candour, never any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace to all his words and actions, than did this great and excellent person;

and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, some few excepted, to remove and pity. It is remarkable, that the historian, who is himself in the same situation, was himself chairman of that committee which conducted the impeachment against this unfortunate statesman. The accusation and defence lasted eighteen days. The managers divided the several articles among them, and attacked the prisoner with all the weight of authority, with all the venality of rhetoric, with all the acuteness of long preparation; and on the side of the defence no reserve towards his most inveterate enemies, the Commons, the Scottish nation, and the Irish parliament. He took only a very short time, on each article, to recollect himself; yet his Northumberland, and solidity of his industry, humility with firmness and vigour, made such a defence, that the Commons saw it impossible, by a legal prosecution, ever to obtain a sentence against him.

While the debate on record was too important a stroke of party to be left untimely by any expedient, however extraordinary. Besides the great genius and authority of that minister, he had threatened some of the popular leaders with an impeachment; and, had he not, himself, been suddenly prevented by the impeachment of the Commons, he had, that very day, it was thought, charged Pym, Hambden, and others, with treason, for having invited the Scottish army to invade England. A bill of attainder was therefore brought into the lower House immediately after finishing these pleadings; and preparatory to it, a new proof of the earl's guilt was produced, in order to remove such scruples as might be entertained with regard to a trial of an offence of so great a magnitude.

Sir Henry Vane, secretary, had taken some notes of a debate in council, after the dissolution of the last parliament; and being at a distance, he had sent the keys of his can to a public library, in order to search for some papers, which were necessary for completing a marriage settlement. Young Vane, falling upon this paper of notes, deemed the matter of the utmost importance; and immediately communicated it to Pym, who now produced the paper before the House of Commons. The question before the council was: Offensive or defensive war with the Scots. The king proposes this difficulty, 4 but how can I undertake offensive war, if I have no more money? 5 The answer ascribed to Strafford was in these words: "Borrow of the city a hundred thousand pounds: go on vigorously to levv ship-money. Your majesty having tried the affections of your people, you are absolvd and loose from all rules of government, and may do what power will admit. Your majesty, having tried all ways, shall be acquitted before God and man. And you have an army in Ireland, which you may employ to restrain the kingdom to obedience: for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months." There followed some counsel of Laud and Cottington, equally violent, with regard to the king's being absolved from all rules of government.

This paper, with all the circumstances of its discovery and communication, was pretended to be equivalent to two witnesses, and to be an unanswerable proof of those pernicious counsels of Strafford, which tended to the subversion of the laws and constitution. It was replied by Strafford and his friends, that old Vane was his most inveterate and declared enemy; and if the secretary himself, as was by far most probable, had willingly delivered to his son this paper of notes, to be communicated to Pym, this implied such a breach of oaths and of trust as rendered him totally unworthy of all credit: that the secretary's deposition was at first exceedingly dubious: unpersuaded by the means given, to say these words: even the third time, his testimony was not positive, but imported only that Strafford had spoken such or such-like words: and words may be very like in sound, and differ much in sense; nor ought the lives of men to depend upon grammatical criticisms of any expression, much less of those which had been delivered by the speaker without premeditation, and committed by the hearer for any time, however short, to the uncertain recollection of memory. . . . The king into that kingdom; a very slight alteration! the earl's discourse could regard nothing but Scotland, and implies no advice unworthy of an English counsellor.

That even retaining the expression, This kingdom, the words may fairly be understood of Scotland, which alone was the kingdom that the debate regarded, and which alone had thrown off allegiance, and could be reduced to obedience. That it could be proved, as well as the necessity of the king's ministers, by the known disposition of the forces, that the intention never was to land the Irish army in England, but in Scotland. That of six other counsellors present, Laud and Wincelbank could give no evidence; but at least two of them, cottington and kirke, no scruples, and the advice was too remarkable to be easily forgotten. That it was needless probable such a desperate counsel would be openly declared, when all the commoners, and of that high rank, and whose attachments to the court were so much weaker than his connection with the country. That though Northumberland, and he alone, had collected some such expression as that Off being absolved from rules of government, yet in such desperate extremities as those into which the king and kingdom were then fallen, a maxim of that nature, allowing it to be delivered by Strafford, may he defended upon principles the most favourable to law and liberty. And that nothing could be more iniquitous, than to extract an accusation of treason from an opinion simply proposed at the council-table, where all freedom of debate ought to be permitted, and where it was not unusual for his council to hear the sentiments of others, to propose counsels very remote from their own secret advice and judgment.

Next Sunday after the bill passed the Commons, the parliamant's pulpits resounded with declamations concerning the necessity of executing justice upon great delinquents. 6 The populace took the alarm. About six thousand men, armed with swords and cudgels, fled from the city, and surrounded the houses of parliament. 6 The names of six Northumberland commoners who had most against the bill of attaintder, were posted up under the title of Straffords and, betrayers of their country. These were exposed to all the insults of the unguovernable multitude. When any of the lords, or members, in opposition to Strafford, were murdered in their ears: such as were suspected of friendship to that obnoxious minister, were sure to meet with menaces, not unacquainted with symptoms of the most desperate resolutions in the furious populace.

Complaints in the House of Commons being made against these violence, as the most flagrant breach of privilege, the ruling members, by their affected coolness and indifference, showed plainly that the popular tumults were not disgraceful to them. 7 But a new discovery, made about this time, served to throw every thing into still greater flame and combustion.

Some prince or prelate, perhaps Sir jeremy, O'neale, Goring, Wilmot, Pollard, Ashlariun, partly attached to the court, partly disgusted with the parliament, had formed a plan of engaging into the king's service the English army, whom they observed to be displeased at some marks of preference given by the Commons to the Scots. For this purpose, they entered into an association, took an oath of secrecy, and kept a close correspondence with some of the king's servants. The form of a petition to the king and parliament, proposing to engage the English army, to get this petition subscribed by the army. The petitioners there represent the great and unexampled concessions made by the king for the security of public peace and liberty; the endless demands of certain insatiable and turbulent spirits, whom nothing less will content than a total subversion of the ancient constitution; the frequent tumults which these factious malcontents had excited, and which endangered the liberty of the subject and the peace of the nation, led the government to measures to quiet these turbulent spirits. The army, alarmed by the danger, was called to order, and Goring, the chief minister, was ordered to proceed with caution and moderation. He was ordered to the House of Commons to address the members, who were assembled there to hear him. He began his speech by saying that the king's interest was at stake, and that the government must act to prevent a rebellion. He then went on to say that the king had a right to command, and that the members of the House of Commons must obey his orders. He ended his speech by saying that he was merely acting in the king's interest, and that he was doing what was necessary to prevent a rebellion. The members of the House of Commons were divided in their opinions, but Goring was able to convince them that he was acting in the king's interest. The result was that the government was able to pass the bill without much difficulty.

About eighty peers had constantly attended Strafford's trial; but such apprehensions were entertained on account of the popular tumults, that only forty-five were present when the bill of attainder was brought into the House. This was a serious matter, as it showed that the peers were not willing to support the bill. A certain proof, that if entire freedom had been allowed, the bill had been rejected by a great majority. In carrying up the bill to the Lords, Sir John, the solicitor-general, added to the reports, which were submitted to the House, that the bill was necessary to prevent a rebellion. The Lords, however, were not satisfied with this explanation, and they voted against the bill. This was a great blow to the government, and it showed that the peers were not willing to support the bill of attainder.

After popular violence had prevailed over the Lords, the same battery was next applied to force the king's assent. The populace flocked about Whitehall, and accompanied their demand of justice in the most barbarous and most open manners. Rumours of conspiracies against the parliament were anew spread abroad; invasions and insurrections talked of: and the whole nation was raised into the greatest excitement. In this condition, Goring delivered his evidence before the House: Pierre wrote a letter to his brother Northumberland, confessing most of the particulars. Both their testimonies agree with regard to the case; and it is supposed that the tumults had been prevented by Pollard, Ashburnham, and Wilmot, in all their examinations, it was regarded as a new proof of some desperate resolutions which had been taken.

But all these attempts were in vain; Goring declared that the king was safe, and that the House of Commons was not competent to judge of his conduct. The queen, terrified with the appearance of such a danger, and hearing formerly no good-will to Strafford, was in tears, and pressed him to satisfy his people in this demand, which it was hoped would be the last content them. Juxon alone, whose courage was not inferior to his virtues, ventured to advise him, if in his conscience he did not approve of the bill, by no means to assent to it.

Strafford, bearing of Charles's irresolution and anxiety, took a very extraordinary step: he wrote a letter, in which he entreated the king, for the sake of public peace, to put an end to his unfortunate, however innocent, life, and to quiet the tumultuous people by granting the request for which they were so importunate. In this, added he, "my consent will more acquit you to God than all the world can do besides. To a willing man there is no injury as just, as by the least harm and most open menaces. But it tended to increase the popular panic, and intimat'd, what was more expressly declared in the preamble, that these blessings were now exposed to the utmost peril.

There was a sudden change in all the preceding conspiracies; in Lancashire, great multitudes of papists were assembling: secret meetings were held by them in caves and underground, in Surrey: they had entered into a plot to blow up the king, and cause the country. The provisions of arms were making before sea: sometimes France, sometimes Denmark, was forming designs against the kingdom; and the populace, who are always terrified when present and enraged with distant dangers, were still further alarm'd in their demands of justice against the unfortunate Strafford.

The king came to the House of Lords: and though he expressed his resolution, for which he offered them any security, never again to employ Strafford in any branch of public business, he professed himself totally dissatisfied with regard to the circumstance of treason, and on that account declared his difficulty in giving his assent to the bill of attainder. The Commons too, were impatient that the greater proofs he gave of anxious concern for this minister, the more inevitable did he render his destruction.
the scaffold was full of decency and courage. "He feared," he said, "that the omen was bad for the intended reformation of the state, that it commenced with the shedding of innocent blood." Having but a flat adieu to his brother and friends who attended him, and having sent a blessing to his nearer relations who were absent;

"And now," said he, "I have nigh done! One stroke will make my wife a widow, my dear children fatherless, and preserve their poor unerring master and separate me from my affectionate brother and all my friends! But let God be to you and them all in all!" Going to dirobe, and prepare himself for the block, "I thank God," said he, "that I am nowe free of death, or am daunted no more by any terror; but do as cheerfully lay down my head at this time, as ever I did when going to repose!" With one blow was a period put to his life by the executioner.

Thus perished, in the 49th year of his age, the Earl of Strawford, one of the most eminent personages that has appeared in England. Though his death was loudly demanded as a satisfaction to justice, and an atonement for the many violations of the constitution; it may safely be affirmed, that the sentence by which he fell was an enormity greater than the worst of those which his implacable enemies prosecuted with so much cruel industry.
He had totally mortified the object of their resentment.
All the necessities, or, more properly speaking, the difficulties, by which the king had been induced to use violent expedients for raising supply, were the result of measures previous to Strawford's favour; and the proposal to raise them was entirely innocent. Even those violent expedients themselves, which occasioned the complaint that the constitution was subverted, had been, all of them, conducted, so far as the measures concerned, without fraud or deceit itself,
from this unhappy measure; and though he abandoned his best friend, yet was he still able to preserve, in some degree, the attachment of all his adherents.

from him. The Earl seemed surprised, and starting up, exclaimed in the words of Scripture, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of mankind." He was soon able, however, to collect his courage; and he prepared himself to suffer the fatal sentence. Only three days' interval was allowed him.
The king, who was at this time new effort in his behalf, and sent, by the hands of the viceroy, a letter addressed to the Peers, in which he entreated them to confer with the Commons about a mitigation of Strawford's sentence, and begged at least for some delay, was refused in both re-quievements.

Execution of Strawford.
Strawford, in passing from his apartment
to Tower-hill, where the scaffold was erected, stopped under Laud's windows, with whom he had long lived in intimate friendship; and entreated the assistance of his prayers, in those awful moments which were approaching; the aged primate dissolved in tears;
and having pronounced, with a broken voice, a tender blessing on his departing friend, sunk into the arms of his attendants. Strawford, still superior to his fate, moved on with an elated countenance, and with an air even of greater dignity than what usually attended him. He wanted that complacent which commonly supports those who perish
by the tombstone of friendship; but addressed to the king, that he was nowise biued up by glory, nor by the affectionate commands of the spectators. Yet his mind, erect and undaunted, found resources within itself; and maintained its unbroken resolution, amidst the turmoils of death, and the triumph of exultations of his misguided enemies. His discourse on

The two ruling passions of this parliament and star-chamber were zeal for liberty, and an aversion to the church; and to both of these nothing could appear more exceptionable than the court of high commissary, whose institution rendered it entirely arbitrary, and assigned to it the defence of the ecclesiastical establishment. The star-chamber also was a court which exerted liberty's power, and therefore to procure redress, either with regard to the causes which came under its jurisdiction, or the decisions which it formed. A bill unanimously passed the houses to abolish these two courts; and the principle of the most dangerous article of the king's prerogative. By the same bill, the jurisdiction of the council was regulated, and its authority abridged. Charles hesitated before he gave his assent. But finding that he had gone too far to retreat, and that he possessed no resource in case of a rupture, as at last affixed the royal sanction to this excellent bill. But to show the parliament that he was sufficiently apprised of the importance of his grant, he observed to them, that this statute altered in a great measure the fundamental laws, ecclesiastical and civil, which many of his predecessors had established.

By removing the star-chamber, the king's power of binding the people by his proclamations was indispensably abolished; and that important branch of prerogative, the strong symbol of arbitrary power, and unintelligible in a limited constitution, being at last removed, left the system of government entire consisted in uniform. The star-chamber alone was accustomed to punish infractions of the king's edicts: but as no courts of judicature now remained, except those in Westminster-hall, which take cognizance only of common and statute law, the king may thenceforth issue proclamations, but no man is bound to obey them. It must, however, be confessed, that the experiment here made by the parliament was not a little rash and adventurous. No government at that time appeared that could find a method of carrying on its business without the mixture of some arbitrary authority, committed to some magistrate; and it might reasonably, beforehand, appear doubtful whether human wisdom ever reached that state of perfection, as to support itself with no other control than the general and rigid maxims of law and equity. But the parliament justly thought, that the king was too eminent a magistrate to be trusted with discretionary power, which he might so easily turn to the destruction of liberty. And in the event it has hitherto been found, that, though some sensible inconveniences arise from the maxim of adhering strictly to law, yet the government was never overburthened under the English grateful to the memory of their ancestors, who, after repeated contests, at last established that noble, though dangerous, principle.

At the request of the parliament, Charles, instead of the polite practice of pleasure, gave all the judges patents during their good behaviour; a circumstance of the greatest moment towards securing their independency, and barring the entrance of arbitrary power into the ordinary courts of judicature.

The marsh's court, which took cognizance of offensive words, and was not thought sufficiently limited by law, was also, for that reason, abolished. The statutory courts, which exercised jurisdiction over the mines, being liable to a like objection, underwent a like fate. The abolition of the council of the north and the council of Wales followed from the same principles. The authority of the eleven clerks, who had a general inspection over weights and measures throughout the kingdom, was transferred to the mayors, sheriffs, and ordinary magistrates.

In short, if we take a survey of the transactions of this ministry, we shall find it remarkable, that in the period of its continuance, we shall find that, excepting Strafford's attainder, which was a complication of cruel iniquity, their merits in other respects so much outweigh their mistakes, as to entitle them to praise from all lovers of liberty. When we consider, that this government was reduced; great provision, for the future, was made by law against the return of like complaints. And if the means by which they obtained such advantages savour often of artifice, sometimes of violence; it is to be considered, that revolutions of government cannot be effected by the mere force of argument and reason; and that factions being once excited, men can neither so firmly regulate the tempers of others, nor their own, as to insure themselves against all exactions and oppressions.

The parliament now came to a pause. The king had promised his Scottish subjects, that he would this summer pay them a visit, in order to settle their government; and though the circumstances of government was very important with him, that he should lay aside that journey, they could not prevail with him so much as to delay it. As 9th Sept. he must necessarily in his journey have king's journey passed through the troops of both nations, the Commons seem to have entertained great jealousy on that account, and to have now hurried on, as much as they formerly delayed, the disbanding of the armies. The arrests therefore of the Scots were fully paid them; and those of the English in part. The Scots returned home, and the English were separated into their several counties, and dismissed.

After this the parliament adjourned to the 30th of October, and continued sitting till the 10th of November, when, by a bill passed the houses, a thing unprecedented, was appointed to sit during the recess with very ample powers. Pym was elected chairman of the committee of the lower house. Further attempts to make additions and alterations in the powers of the Commons alone, for assuming sovereign executive powers, and publishing their ordinances, as they called them, instead of laws. The committee too, on their part, was ready to initiate the alliance of both houses to attend the king into Scotland, in order, as was pretended, to see that the articles of pacification were executed; but really to be espoused upon him, and extend still further the ideas of a parliamentary authority, as well as eclipse the majesty of the king. The Earl of Balford, Lord Howard, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Armine, Fynes, and Hamilcnd, were the persons chosen.

Endeavours were used to ensure the Charles's departure, to have a protector of the kingdom appointed, with a power to pass laws without having recourse to the king. So little regard was now paid to royal authority, or to the established constitution of the kingdom.

Amidst the great variety of affairs which occurred during this busy period, we have almost overlooked the marriage of the Princess Mary with William, Prince of Orange. The king concluded this transaction without communicating his intentions to the parliament, which received the proposal with satisfaction. This was the commencement of the connexion with the family of Orange; connexions, which were afterwards attended with the most important consequences, both to the kingdom and to the house of Stuart.

The Scots, who began these fatal commotions, thought that they had finished a very A. D. 1611. perilous undertaking, much to their profit and reputation. Besides the large pay voted them for lying in good quarters during a great part of the year, the session did not inure they granted them a present of 300,000 pounds for their brethren assistance. In the articles of pacification, they were declared to have been ever good subjects; and their military expenses were approved of, as enterprises calculated and intended for his majesty's honour and advantage. To carry further their triumph over their sovereign those terms, so ignominious to him, were ordered by a vote of parliament, to be read in all churches, upon a day of thanksgiving, appointed for the national pacification; 1 all their claims for the restitution of property were agreed to be ratified; and what they more valued than all these advantages, they had a near prospect of spreading the Presbyterian discipline in England and Ireland, from the seeds which they had scattered of their religious principles. Never did refined Athens so exult in diffusing the sciences and liberal arts over a savage world; never did generous Rome so please herself in the view of law and order established in her dominions; as the Scots now rejoiced, in communicating their barbarous and theological fervour to the neighbouring nations.

Charles, despoiled in England of a considerable part of his authority, and densely fomenting encouragements upon him, arrived in Scotland, with an intention of abducting almost entirely the small share of power which there remained to him, and of giving full satisfaction, if possible, to his restless subjects in that kingdom. The lords of articles were an ancient institution in the Scottish parliament. They were constituted after this manner. The temporal lords chose eight bishops: the bishops elected eight earls: these sixteen named eight commissioners of counties, and eight burgesses: and without the previous consent of the thirty-two who were denounced lords of articles, no motion could be made in parliament. As the bishops were entirely devoted to the crown, the lords and burgesses, by necessity, depended entirely on the king's nomination; and the prince, besides one negative after the bills had passed through parliament, possessed indirectly another before their introduction; a prejudice of much greater consequence than the former. The bench of bishops being now abolished, the parliament laid hold of the opportunity, and totally set aside the lords of articles: and, till this important novelty was admitted, it was observed, speaking generally, could not be said to enjoy any regular freedom. 2

It is remarkable that, notwithstanding this institution, to which there was no parallel in England, the royal authority was always deemed much lower in Scotland than in the former kingdom. Bacon represents it as one advantage to be expected from the union, that the too extensive prerogative of England would be abridged by the example of Scotland, and the too narrow prerogative of Scotland he enlarged from the imitation of England. The English were, at that time, a civilized people, and obedient to the laws: but among the Scots, it was of little consequence how the laws were framed, or by whom voted, while the execution of them was attended with so much in their power to prevent their regular execution.

The Peers and Commons formed only one House in the Scottish parliament; and as it had been the practice of James, continued by Charles, to grace English gentlemen with Scottish titles, all the determinations of parliament, it was to be feared, would in time depend upon the prince, by means of these votes of foreigners, who had no interest of property in the nation. It was therefore by law desiring approbation, that no man should be created a Scotch peer, who possessed not 10,000 marks (above 500 pounds) of annual rent in the kingdom. 3

A law for imperial petitions was likewise passed; and a law was passed for a last act of parliament should be appointed the time and place for holding the parliament next ensuing. 4

The king was deprived of that power formerly exercised, of removing all his members from his council by the penalty of treason; a prerogative which invested him with the whole legislative authority, even in matters of the highest importance. 5

So far was indignant; but the most fatal blow given to royal prerogatives, was what in a manner dethroned the prince, was the article, that no member of the privy council, in whose hands, during the king's absence, the whole administration lay, no officer of state, none of the judges, should be appointed, by advice and approbation of parliament. Charles even agreed to deprive of their seats four judges who had adhered to his interests; and their place was supplied by others more agreeable to the ruling party. Several of the commissioners were appointed to the privy council. And all the ministers of state, counsellors, and judges, were, by law, to hold their places during life or good behaviour. 6

The king, which in Scotland, conformed himself entirely to the established church; and assisted with great gravity at the long prayers and longer sermons with which the presbyterians endeavoured to reconcile him. He bestowed pensions on his prelates, to Henderson, Gilloch, and other popular preachers; and practiced every art to often, if not to gain, his greatest enemies. The Earl of Argyle was created a marquis, Lord London an earl, Lesley was dignified with the title of Earl of Leven. 7

His friends he was obliged, for the present, to neglect and overlook; some of them were disgusted; and his enemies were not reconciled; but ascribed all his caresses and favours to artifice and necessity.

Argyle and Hamilton, being seized with an apprehension, real or pretended, that the Earl of Crawford and others meant to assassinate him, left the parliament suddenly, and retired into the country; but, upon invitation and assurance given by the king, that he would not neither cause nor effect that was visible, nor purpose, nor consequence, was commonly denominated the incident. 8

But though the incident had no effect in Scotland; what was not expected, it was attended with consequences in England. The last parliament which was now assembled, being willing to awaken the people's tenderness by exciting their fears, immediately took the alarm; as if the malignants, so they called the king's party, had had a plot at once to murder them and all the godly in both kingdoms. They applied, therefore, to Essex, whom the king had left general in the south of England, and he ordered a guard to attend them. 9

But while the king was employed in pacifying the commotions in Scotland, and was preparing to return to England, in order to apply himself to the same salutary work to that kingdom; he received intelligence of a dangerous rebellion broken out in Ireland, with circumstances of the utmost horror, bloodshed, and devastation. On every side, this unfortunate prince was pursued with murmurs, discontent, faction, and civil wars; and the fire from all quarters, even by the most independent accidents, at once blazed up about him.

The great plan of James, in the administration of Ireland, continued by Charles, was, by justice and peace to reconcile that turbulent people to the authority of laws, and established, introducing agriculture and industry, and making them of that sloth and barbarism to which they had ever been subject. In order to serve both these purposes, and at the same time secure the dominion of Ireland to the English crown, great colonies of British had been carried over, and, being intermixed with the Irish, had every where introduced a new face of things into that country. During a peace of near forty years, the invertebrate quarrels between the nations seemed in a great measure to be obliterated; and though much of the landed property, forfeited by rebellion, had been conferred on the new planters, a more than equal return had been made by their instructing the natives in tillage, building, manufactures, and all the civilized arts of life. 10

This had been the course of things during the successive administrations of Chichester, Grandisson, Falkland, and, and above all, of Strafford. Under the government of this latter nobleman, the pacific plans, and grand form of government and industry, seemed to have operated with full success, and to have bestowed at last on that savage country the face of a European settlement.

After Strafford fell a victim to popular rage, the humours excited in Ireland by that great event could not be suddenly composed, but continued to produce the greatest innovations to the government. 11

The British protestants, transplanted into Ireland, having every moment before their eyes all the horrors of

povery, had naturally been carried into the opposite extreme, and had universally adopted the highest principles and practices of the puritan sect, as the happiness, was beneficial to them; and every method of limiting the authority of the crown, and detaching themselves from the King of England, was greedily adopted and pursued. They considered, not, that as they scarcely formed a twentieth part of the people, and were one day or another noxious to the ancient inhabitants, their only method of supporting themselves was by maintaining royal authority, and preserving a great dependence on their mother-country. The young Commons, like their forerunners, had overlooked the consequences; and while they imputed to him, as the wicked, every discretionary act of authority, they despised all succeeding good acts of that power, as an oath at all events, and Irish could be retained in submission. And so strong was the current for popular government in all the three kingdoms, that the most established maxims of policy were everywhere abandoned, in order to gratify this ruling passion.

Charles, unable to resist, had been obliged to yield to the Irish, as to the Scottish and English parliaments; and found, too, that their encroachments were on a rise in proportion to his concession. Those subsidies, which themselves had voted, they reduced, by a subsequent vote, to a fourth part: the court of high commission was determined to be a grievance; mutual law abolished; the jurisdiction of the common law preserved; all the acts of state were declared of no authority; every order or institution, which depended on monarchy, was invaded: and the prince was despised of all his prerogative, without the least pretice of subduing the innovations in his absolute dominion.

The standing army of Ireland was usually about 3000 men; but in order to assist the king in suppressing the Scottish covetousness, Strafford had raised 8600 more, and had sent on them a thousand, drawn from the old army; a necessary expedient for bestowing order and discipline on the new-levied soldiers. The private men in this army were all catholics; but the officers, both commanding and assisting the Protestants, and some of the king, could entirely be depended on by Charles. The English Commons entertained the greatest apprehensions on account of this army; and never ceased soliciting the king, till he agreed to break it; nor would they consent to any proposal for augmenting the standing army to 5000 men; a number which the king deemed necessary for retaining Ireland in obedience.

Charles, thinking it dangerous that 8000 men accustomed to drill and trained to the use of arms, should be dispersed among a nation so turbulent and unsettled, agreed with the Spanish ambassador to have them transported to Flanders, and enlisted in his master's service. The officers and men, pretending this expedition, left no regular bodies of troops, disciplined in the Low Countries, should prove still more dangerous, showed some aversion to this expedient; and the king reduced his allowance to 4000 men. But when the Spaniards had hired ships for transporting these troops, and the men were ready to embark, the Commons, willing to show their power, and not displeased with an opportunity of curbing and affronting the king, prohibited every one from furnishing vessels for that service. And thus the project, formed by Charles, of freeing the country from these men, was unfortunately disappointed.

The Irish remarked all these false steps of the English, and resolved to take advantage of them. Though their animosity against that nation, for want of an occasion to exert itself, seemed to be extinguished, it was only composed into a temporary and decent tranquillity. Their interest both with regard to the property and religion, secretly stimulated them to a revolt. No individual of any sect, according to the ancient customs, had the property of any particular estate; but as the whole sect had a title to a whole territory, they ignorantly supposed this barbarous community before the more secure and narrower possessions assigned them by the English. An indulgence, amounting almost to a toleration, had been given to the Catholic religion: but so long as the churches and the ecclesiastical revenues were kept from the priests, and they were only allowed to celebrate, and to administer the sacraments, by profane heretics, being themselves discontented, they were determined to endeavor to retake any cordial reconciliation between the English and the Irish nations.

There was a gentleman called Roget More, Constipacy in whom, theirs interest led them, who was descended from an ancient Irish family, and was much celebrated among his countrymen for valour and capacity. This man first formed the project of expelling the English, and asso; ciated with the Protestants, like his forerunners, secretly went from chief to chief, and roused up every latent principle of discontent. He maintained a close correspondence with Lord Maguire and Sir Phelim O'Neale, despising the most powerful of the Catholics; and by letters, by his emissaries, he represented to his countrymen the motives of a revolt. He observed to them, that by the rebellion of the Scots, and factions of the English, the king's authority in Britain was reduced to so low a condition, that he never could exert himself with any vigour in maintaining the English dominion over Ireland; that the catholics, in the Irish House of Commons, assisted by the Protestants, had so diminished the royal prerogative, and the power of the lieutenant, as would much facilitate the conducting to its desired effect, any conspiracy or combination which could be formed; that the Scots, having so successfully thrown off dependence on the crown, and having given a signal of independence, into their own hands, had set an example to the Irish, who had so much greater oppressions to complain of: that the English planters, who had expelled them their possessions, and had deprived them of their liberties, were but a handful in comparison of the natives; that they lived in the most supine security, interspersed with their numerous enemies, trusting to the protection of their power, to the extent of inconsiderable divisions throughout the whole kingdom; that a great body of men, disciplined by the government, were now thrown loose, and were ready for any daring or desperate enterprise; that the puritanical parliament, having at length subdued their sovereign, would, no doubt, as soon as they had consolidated their authority, extend their ambitious enterprises to Ireland, and make the catholics in that kingdom feel the same fate as their submission to which the English land were at present exposed; and that a revolt in the Irish tending only to vindicate their nation liberty against the violence of foreign invaders, could never at any time be deemed as insubordinate, or the present consumptions, when their prince was, in a manner, a prisoner, and obedience must be paid, not to him, but to those who had gratuitously usurped his lawful authority.

By these considerations, more engaged all the heads of the native Irish into the conspiracy. The English of the rule, as they were called, or the old English planters, being all catholics, it was hoped afterwards joint the party which restored their religion to its ancient splendour and authority. The intention was, that Sir Phelim O'Neale and the other conspirators should begin an insurrection on one day throughout the provinces, and should attack all the English settlements: and that, on the same day, Lord Macartney and Roger More should surprise the castle of Dublin. The commencement of the revolt was fixed on the approach of winter, that there might be more difficulty in transporting forces from England. Successors to themselves, and successors to arms, they expected from France, in consequence of a promise made them by Cardinal Richelieu. And many Irish officers, who served in the Spanish troops, had engaged to join them, as soon as they saw an opportunity to dispose of their arms, by their catholic brethren. News, which every day arrived from England, of the fury expressed by the Commons against all papists, struck fresh terror into the Irish nation, and both stimulated the conspirators to execute their fatal purpose, and gave them assured hopes of the concurrence of all their countrymen.\textsuperscript{p} Such propensity to a revolt was discovered in all the Irish, that it was deemed unnecessary, as it was dangerous, to intrust the secret to many hands; and the appointed day drew nigh, nor had any discovery been yet made to the government. The king, indeed, had received information from many ambassadors, that something was in agitation among the Irish in former times; but though he gave warning to the administration in Ireland, the intelligence was entirely neglected.\textsuperscript{q} Secret rumours likewise were heard of some approaching conspiracy; but no attention was paid to an example which threatened men beyond all the usual motives of conduct and behaviour. The weaker sex themselves, naturally tender to their own sufferings, and compassionate to those of others, here united their more robust powers, to overwhelm nothing but their seal for the party by whom every thing was now governed. Tranquil from their ignorance and inexperience, these men indulged themselves in the most projected rejoicings, on the very brink of destruction.

But they were awakened from their security, on the very day before that which was appointed for the commencement of hostilities. The castle of Dublin, by which the capital, or at least the more considerable part of the city, were defended, was walled up by Looney, and manned with thirty-five pieces of cannon, and a proportionable quantity of ammunition: yet was this important place guarded, and that too without any care, by no garrison. The Earl of Leicester, whom the king had appointed lieutenant, remained in London. The two justices, Sir William Parsons and Sir John Borlase, were men of small abilities; and, by an incommen- surable number of circumstances, owed their advancement to nothing but their zeal for the party by whom every thing was now governed. Tranquil from their ignorance and inexperience, these men indulged themselves in the most projected rejoicings, on the very brink of destruction.\textsuperscript{r}

The Irish intercepted the castle from a surprise, the possession extorted from Mahone came too late to prevent the intended insurrection. O'Conolly and his confederates had already taken arms in Ulster. The Irish, every where interfused with the English, needed but a hint from their leaders and priests to begin hostilities against a people whose strength consisted in numbers. The English, however, were already in a town with a numerous band of their partitions: others were expected that night: and, next morning, they were to enter upon, what they esteemed the easiest of all enterprises, the taking of the castle. O'Conolly, an Irishman, but a protestant, betrayed the conspiracy to Parsons.\textsuperscript{t} The justices and council fled immediately for safety into the castle, and reinforced the guards. The alarm was conveyed to the city, and all the protestants prepared to defend themselves. Sir John Looney, and Mahone, one of the conspirators, being likewise seized, first discovered to the justices the project of a general insurrection, and redoubled the apprehensions which already had unceasingly possessed the minds of the English.\textsuperscript{u}

But though O'Conolly's discovery saved the castle from a surprise, the confession extorted from Mahone came too late to prevent the intended insurrection. O'Conolly and his confederates had already taken arms in Ulster. The Irish, every where interfused with the English, needed but a hint from their leaders and priests to begin hostilities against a people whose strength consisted in numbers. The English, however, were already in a town with a numerous band of their partitions: others were expected that night: and, next morning, they were to enter upon, what they esteemed the easiest of all enterprises, the taking of the castle. O'Conolly, an Irishman, but a protestant, betrayed the conspiracy to Parsons. The justices and council fled immediately for safety into the castle, and reinforced the guards. The alarm was conveyed to the city, and all the protestants prepared to defend themselves. Sir John Looney, and Mahone, one of the conspirators, being likewise seized, first discovered to the justices the project of a general insurrection, and redoubled the apprehensions which already had unceasingly possessed the minds of the English. After capacity had fully exerted itself, cruelty, and revenge were barbarous that ever in any nation, was known or heard of, begun its operations. A universal massacre commenced of the English, now defenceless, and passively resigned to their inhuman foes. No age, no sex, no condition was spared. The wife weeping for her butchered husband, and the helpless children, was pierced with them, and surpassed by the same stroke.\textsuperscript{v} The old, the young, the vigorous, the infirm, underwent a like fate, and were confounded in one common ruin. In vain did flight: men, on the first assault; destruction was every where let loose, and met the hunted victims at every turn. In vain was recourse to have relations, to companions, to friends: all connections were dissolved, and death was their only friend. This was attempted, and expected. Without provocation, without opposition, the astonished English, living in profound peace and full security, were massacred by their nearest neighbours, with whom they had long upheld a continual intercourse of kindness and good offices.\textsuperscript{w}

But death was the slightest punishment inflicted by those rebels: all the tortures which wanton cruelty could devise, all the lingering pains of body, the anguish of mind, the agonies of despair, could not satisfy revenge consummated without injury, and cruelty derived from no cause. To enter into particulars would shock the least delicate humanity. Such enormities, though attested by undoubted evidence, appear inadmissible. Deserved punishment, even reformed religion, encouraged by the utmost licence, reach not to such a pitch of ferocity; unless the pity inherent in human breasts be destroyed by that contagion of examples which transmits men beyond all the usual motives of conduct and behaviour.

The weaker sex themselves, naturally tender to their own sufferings, and compassionate to those of others, here united their more robust powers, to overwhelm nothing but their seal for the party by whom every thing was now governed. Tranquil from their ignorance and inexperience, these men indulged themselves in the most projected rejoicings, on the very brink of destruction.\textsuperscript{x}

The stately buildings or commodious habitations of the planters, as if upbidding the sloth and ignorance of the men, were converted into dwellings of war. In the towns and villages, and even more the country, the fields were turned into lands, and the woods into gardens. And where the miserable owners, shut up in their houses, and preparing for defence, perished in the flames, together with their wives and children, a double triumph was afforded to their insolence for so many cruelties.

If any were assembled together, and, assuming courage from despair, were resolved to sweeter death by revenge on their assassins; they were disarmed by capitulations, and promised of safety, confirmed by the most solemn oaths. All who had they surrendered, than the rebels, with perjury equal to their cruelty, made them share the fate of their unhappy countrymen.\textsuperscript{y} Others, more ingenuous still in their barbarity, tempted their prisoners by the fond love of life, to interest their hands in the blood of friends, brothers, parents; and having thus rendered them accomplices in guilt, gave them that death, which they sought to shun by deserving it.\textsuperscript{z} Amidst all these enormities, the sacred name of Religion resounded on every side; not to stop the hands of these murderers, but to enforce their blows, and to steel their hearts against every movement of human or social passion. The religious sectaries, the leaders of God and detestable to all holy men, were marked out by the priests for slaughter; and, of all actions, to rid the world of these declared enemies to catholic faith and piety, was represented as an act of justice, and.extend yearning which in that rude people, was sufficiently inclined to atrocious deeds, was further stimulated by precept; and national prejudices, embroiled by those aversions, more deadly and incurable, which arose from enmity for superstition. While death finished the sufferings of each victim, the bigoted assassins, with joy and exultation, still echoed in his expiring ears, that these agencies were but the commencement of torments infinite and eternal.

Such were the barbarities, by which Sir Phelim O'Neale and the Irish in Ulster signalized their rebellion; an event, memorable in the annals of human kind, and worthy to be held in perpetual detestation and abhorrence. The generous nature of those, who was shocked at the recital of such enormous cruelties. He flew to O'Neale's camp; but found that his authority, which was sufficient to excite the Irish to an insurrection, was too feeble to restrain their inhumanity. Scenes of allured mankind were expiated by so many crimes; and he retired into Flanders. Sir Phelim, recommended by the greatness of his family, and perhaps, too, by the unrestrained brutality of his na-tire, though without any courage or capacity, acquired the entire ascendancy over the northern rebels. The English colonies were totally annihilated in the open country of Ulster: the Scots, at first, met with more favourable treatment, and were allowed to retain their estates, but the Irish pretended to distinguish between the British nations; and claiming friendship and consanguinity with the Scots, extended not over them the fury of their massacres. Many of them found an opportunity to fly the country, others retired into places of security, and prepared themselves for defence: and by this means, the Scottish planters, most of them at least, escaped with their lives.

From Ulster, the flames of rebellion diffused themselves in an instant over the three provinces of Ireland. In all places death and slaughter were not uncommon; though the Irish, in these other provinces, pretended to act with moderation and humanity. But cruel and barbarous was their humanity! Not content with expelling the English their houses, with despoiling them of their goods, with wasting their cultivated fields; they stripped them of their very clothes, and turned them out, naked and defenceless, to all the severities of the season. The heavens themselves, as if conspiring against this unhappy people, were darkened and tempestuous over the country: the innumerable crowds of children, the tender sex of women, soon sunk under the multiplied rigours of cold and hunger. Here, the husband, holding a final adieu to his expiring family, envied them that fate which he himself expected so soon to share; there, the son, having long supported his aged parent, with reluctance obeyed his last commands, and abandoning him in his utmost distress, reserved himself to purchase the same fate; which all those efforts could not prevent or delay. The astonishing greatness of the calamity deprived the sufferers of any relief from the view of companions in affliction. With silent tears, or lamentable cries, they hurried on through the hostile territories; and found every heart which was not steeled by native barbarity, guarded by the more implacable furies of mistaken piety and religion.

The rearing of Dublin preserved in Ireland the remains of the English name. The gates of that city, though timorousiy opened, received the wretched suppliants, and presented to the view a scene of human misery beyond what any eye had ever before beheld. Compassion swayed the amazed inhabitants, aggrieved with the flood of calamities; while they observed the numerous foes without and within, which every where environed them, and the sore want of means with which they were supplied themselves supported. The more vigorous of the unhappy fugitives, to the number of three thousand, were enlisted into three regiments: the rest were distributed into the houses of the citizens, who took them in, by hot and warm rations, to refresh their feeble and torpid limbs. Diseases of unknown name and species, derived from these multiplied distresses, seized many of them, and put a speedy period to their lives; others, having now leisure to reflect on their mighty loss of friends and fortunes, cursed that being which they had saved. Abandoning themselves to despair, refusing all succour, they expired; without other consolation than that of receiving among their countrymen the humane protection of Irish and Scottish slaughtered companions, had been denied by the inhomin barbarians.

By some computations, those who perished by all these cruelties are supposed to be a hundred and fifty, or two hundred, thousand; by the most moderate, and probably the most reasonable, account, they are made to amount to forty thousand; if this estimation itself be not, as is usual in such cases, somewhat exaggerated.

All the justice accorded to Dublin and the bodies of the army which were not surrounded by the rebels; and they assembled a force of fifteen hundred veterans. They soon enlisted, and armed from the magazines, above four thousand men more. They despatched a body of six hundred men to throw relief into Treblagh, besieged by the Irish. But these troops, attacked by the enemy, were seized with a panic, and did not suffer one of them. Their arms, falling into the hands of the Irish, supplied them with what they most wanted. The justices, willing to foment the rebellion, in a view of profiting by the multiplied forfeitures, henceforth thought of nothing more than providing for their own present security, and that of their capital. The Earl of Ormond, their general, remonstrated against such ruin, not to say base and interested, counsels; but he was obliged to submit to them.

The English of the pale, who probably were not at first in the secret, pretended to blame the insurrection, and to detest the barbarity with which it was accompanied. By their protestations and declarations, they engaged the justices to supply them with arms, which they promised to employ in defence of the government. But in a little time, the interests of religion were found more prevalent over them, than regard and duty to their mother-country.

They chose Lord Comberstone their leader; and when the old Irish, rivalled them in every act of violence towards the English protestants. Besides many smaller bodies dispersed over the kingdom, the principal army of the rebellion had already assembled men, and threatened Dublin with an immediate siege.

Both the English and Irish rebels conspired in one imposture, with which they seduced many of their deluded countrymen to the purpose. The feverish age of children, the tender sex of women, soon sunk under the multiplied rigours of cold and hunger. Here, the husband, holding a final adieu to his expiring family, envied them that fate which he himself expected so soon to share; there, the son, having long supported his aged parent, with reluctance obeyed his last commands, and abandoning him in his utmost distress, reserved himself to purchase the same fate; which all those efforts could not prevent or delay. The astonishing greatness of the calamity deprived the sufferers of any relief from the view of companions in affliction. With silent tears, or lamentable cries, they hurried on through the hostile territories; and found every heart which was not steeled by native barbarity, guarded by the more implacable furies of mistaken piety and religion.

The great event of this insurrection by a messenger despatched from the north of Ireland. He immediately communicated his intelligence to the Scottish parliament. He expected that the mighty zeal expressed by the Scots for the protestant religion, would immediately engage them to fly to its defence, where it was so violently invaded: he hoped that their horror against popery, a religion which now appeared in its most horrible aspect, would second all his exhortations: he had observed with what alacrity they had twice run to arms, and assembled troops in opposition to the rights of their sovereign; he saw with how much greater facility they could now collect forces, which had been so lately disbanded, and which had been so long inured to military discipline. The cries of their afflicted and distressed brethren in Ireland, he promised himself, would powerfully incite them to send over such a number, as might, by their aid, remove such promptitude in this utter distress. But the zeal of the Scots, as is usual among religious sects, was very feeble, when not stimulated either by faction or interest. They now considered themselves entirely a republic, and made no account of the authority of their prince, which they had utterly uninhabited. Conceiving hopes from the present distresses of Ireland, they resolved to make an advantageous bargain for the succours with which they should supply their neighbouring nation. And they cast their eyes towards the English parliament, with whom they were already so closely connected, and who could alone fulfil any articles which might be agreed on. Except despatches which had been to support the Scottish columns in Ulster, they would, therefore, go no further at present, than sending commissioners to London in order to treat with that power, to whom the sovereign authority was now in reality transmuted.

The king too, sensible of his utter inability to subdue the Irish rebels, found himself obliged, to this exigency, to have recourse to the English parliament, and depend on their fame for support. The king attempted to form them the intelligence which he had received; he informed them, that the insurrection was not, in his opinion, the result of any rash enterprise, but of a formed conspiracy.
against the crown of England. To their care and wisdom, therefore, his majesty said, he committed the secret and execution of the war, which, in a cause so important to national and religious interests, must of necessity be immediately entered upon, and vigorously pursued.

In the meantime, that party was now assembled; and discovered, in every vote, the same dispositions in which they had separated. The exulting of its own authority, the diminishing of the king's, were machineryed by a small majority. Every attempt which had been made to gain the popular leaders, and by offices to attach them to the crown, had failed of success, either for want of skill in conducting it, or by reason of the slender pretexts which it was then in the king's power to confer. The ambitious and enterprising patriots disdained to accept, in detail, of a precarious power; while they deemed it so easy, by one bold and vigorous assault, to possess themselves of power with a wonderful degree of success and as well by greatness, by enlarging popular authority in England. The great necessities to which the king was reduced; the violent prejudices which generally, throughout the kingdom, prevailed against the monarchy, made the most important concessions; the example of the Scots, whose encroachments had totally subverted monarchy; all these circumstances further instigated the Commons in their petition. Their former conduct, which the constitution seemed to have so lately exposed, persuaded many, that it never could be sufficiently secured, but by the entire abolition of that authority which had hitherto existed.

But this project, it had not been in the power, scarcely in the intention, of the popular leaders to execute, had it not been for the passion which seized the nation for preserving the king himself in the power which at that time accompanied it. The licence which the parliament had bestowed on this spirit, by checking ecclesiastical authority; the countenance and encouragement with which they had honoured it; had already diffused its influence to a wonderful degree; and almost of men had drank deep of the intoxicating poison. In every discourse or conversation, this mode of religion entered; in all business it had a share; every elegant pleasure or amusement, which was on this occasion to extait that and the court for it promoted; even diseases and bodily distempers were not totally exempted from it; and it became requisite, we are told, for all physicians to be expert in the spiritual profession, and the effect of it was, that not only those religious terrors with which their patience were so generally haunted. Learning itself, which tends so much to enlarge the mind, and humanize the temper, rather served on the occasion to extait that and the court for it which prevailed. Rude as yet, and imperfect, it supplied the diastal fanaticism with a variety of views, founded it on some coherence of system, enriched it with different figures of devotion; advantages with which a people, totally ignorant and barbarous, had been happily unacquainted.

From policy, at first, and inclination, not from necessity, the king attached himself extremely to the hierarchy:
intention of employing them against himself; whatever law they deemed necessary for aggrandizing themselves, was voted, under colour of enabling them to recover Ireland; and if Charles withheld the royal assent, his refusal was imputed to those pernicious counsels which had at first engaged the commons to reject the petition, and still threatened total destruction to the protestant interest throughout all his dominions. And though no forces were for a long time sent over to Ireland, and very little money remitted, during the extreme distress of that kingdom; so strong was the people's attachment to the Commons, that the fault was never imputed to those pious zealots, whose votes breathed nothing but death and destruction to the Irish rebels.

To make the attack on royal authority by regular approaches, it was thought proper to frame a general remonstrance of the state of the nation; and accordingly, the committee, which at the first meeting of the Commons had been chosen for that purpose, and which had luthered no progress in their work, received fresh injunctions to finish that undertaking.

The remonstrance, which had been so memorable, and which was soon afterwards attended with such important consequences. It was not addressed to the king; but was openly declared to be an appeal to the principle of the constitution, and a protest against the manœuvres of the monarch, equalized by the lex mercatoria, and as necessary to the greatness of the nation. It consists of many gross falsehoods, intermingled with some evident truths: malignant insinuations are joined to open invectives: loud complaints of the king's inhumanity, and of his mercifulness to the future. Whatever unfortunate, whatever invasions, whatever suspicious measure had been embraced by the king, from the commencement of his reign, is insisted on; and all the aggressions, with merciless rage, and the unsuccessful expeditions to Cadiz, and the Isle of Rhy, are mentioned: the sending of ships to France for the suppression of the hugonots; the forced loans: the illegal confinement of men: the various complaints of the violent dissolution of four parliaments: the arbitrary government which always succeeded: the questioning, fining, and imprisoning of members for their conduct in the House: the levying of taxes without consent of the Commons: the introducing of superstitious innovations into the church, without authority of law: in short, every thing which, either with or without reason, had given offence, during the course of fifteen years, from the accession of the king to the calling of the present parliament. And, though all these grievances had been already redressed, and even laws enacted for future security against their return, the praise of these advantages was ascribed, not to the king, but to the committee who had extorted his consent to so many salutary statutes. Their own merits too, they asserted, towards the king, were no less eminent than towards the people. The royal majesty, they asserted, in his balance, rendered itself too precarious, and made even their temporary supplies to be paid to their own commissioners, who were independent of him; they pretended that they had liberally supported him in his necessities. By an insult still more egregious, the very giving of money to the Scots, for levying war against their sovereign, they represented as an instance of their duty towards him. And all their grievances, they said, which amounted to no less than a total subversion of the constitution, proceeded entirely from the formed combination of a popish faction, who had ever swayed the king's counsels, who had endeavoured, by an uninterrupted effort, to introduce their superstition into England and Scotland; and not at last, excited an open and bloody rebellion in Ireland.

This remonstrance, so full of acrimony and violence, was a plain signal for some further attacks intended on royal prerogative, and a declaration that the concessions already made, however important, were not to be regarded as satisfactory. What pretensions would be advanced, how unprecedented, how unlimited, were easily imagined; and no little anxiety was occasioned, imagining that others must be preserved, than an abolition, almost total, of the monarchical government of England: The opposition, therefore, which the remonstrance met with in the House of Commons, was great. For above fourteen hours, the debate was variously managed; and from the weakness of the king's party, which probably consisted chiefly of the elderly people, and men of cool spirits, the vote was at last carried by a small majority of eleven. Some time after, the remonstrance was printed and published, without being carried up to the House of Peers for their assent and concurrence.

When this remonstrance was dispersed, it Reasons on both exaltation everywhere the same violent contro- siders, which was introduced into the House of Commons. This parliament, said the partisans of that assembly, have at length profited by the fatal example of their predecessors; and are resolved that the famine, which they have generously undertaken to rear for the protection of liberty, shall not be left to future ages insecure and imperfect. At the time when the petition of right, that required vindication of a violated constitution, was extorted from the unwilling prince; who but imagined that liberty was at last secured, and that the laws would thenceforth maintain themselves in opposition to arbitrary authority? But what was the event! A right was misled acquiescing to the people, or rather their ancient right was more exactly defined: but as the power of invading it still remained in the prince, no sooner did an opportunity offer than he totally quashed it, by a violent act of parliament, which made his will and pleasure the sole rule of government. Those lofty ideas of monarchical authority, which he has derived from his early education, which are united in his mind with his love of his kindred, and are corrobolated by his mistaken principles of religion, it is in vain to hope that, in his more advanced age, he will sincerely renounce, from any subsequent reflection or experience. Such a man is, his chimeras are extremely rare; but to expect that they will be derived from necessity, from the jealousy and resentment of antagonists, from blame, from reproach, from opposition, must be the happy issue of such an eventual resolution. These visions, however necessary, are sure to irritate a prince against limitations so cruelly imposed upon him; and each concession, which he is constrained to make, is regarded as a temporary tribute paid to fiction and sedition, and is secretly attended with a resolution of seizing every favourable opportunity to retract it. Nor should we imagine that opportunities of that kind will not offer in the course of human affairs. Governments, especially those of a mixed kind, are in continual fluctuation: the humours of the people change perpetually from one extreme to another: and no resolution can be more wise, as well as more than that of this kind, which has been acted, against the king, who had formerly pushed much less tempting ones to the utmost extremities against his people and his parliament. It is to be feared, that, if the religious question, so long as it has whirled in the maelstrom of political action, shall not speedily, to evaporate, they will quickly return to the ancient ecclesiastical establishment; and, with it, embrace those principles of slavery, which it inculcated with such zeal on its subversive prolesytes. Those patriots, who are now the public idols, may then become the objects of general detestation; and equal shouts of joy attend their ignominious execution, with those which second their present advantages and triumphs. Nor ought the apprehension of such an event to be regarded in them as a selfish consideration: in their safety is involved the security of the laws: the patrons of the constitution cannot suppress without a fatal blow to the constitution: and it is but justice that the people, who have protected, at any hazard, those who have so generously exposed themselves to the utmost hazard for the public interest. What though monarchy, the ancient government of England, be impaired, during these contest, in many of its former prerogatives: the laws will flourish the more by its decay; and it is happy, allowing that matters are really carried beyond the bounds of moderation, that the current at least runs towards liberty, and that at least the balance is in favour of the general interest of mankind and society.

The best arguments of the royalists against a further attack on the prerogative were founded more on opposite ideas, which they had formed of the past events of this reign, than on opposite principles of government. Some invasions, they said, and those too of moment, had undoubtedly been made on national privileges: but were we to establish a precedent upon the score of their vices, we should find it to consist in the wanton tyranny and injustice of the prince, not even in his ambition or immoderate appete

for authority. The hostilities with Spain, in which the people, naturally and instinctively, were engaged, had ever imprudent and unnecessary, had proceeded from the advice, and even importunity, of the parliament; who deserted him immediately after they had embargoed him in those very measures. A young prince,possessed of honour, was naturally afraid of being foiled in his first enterprise, and had not as yet attained such maturity of counsel, as to perceive that his greatest honour lay in preserving the laws inviolate, and no less confidence of his people. The rigour of the subsequent parliament had been extreme with regard to many articles, particularly tonnage and poundage; and had reduced the king to an absolute necessity, if he would preserve the royal prerogative, of levying taxes duties by his own authority, and of breaking through the forms, in order to maintain the spirit, of the constitution. Having once made such a perilous step, he was naturally induced to continue the course, and to increase the impropriety, the use of ship-money, and other moderate, though irregular, burdens and taxes. A sure proof that he had formed no system for enshrining his people is, that the chief object of his government, was to mark their distress by a national force; a project useful, honourable, may, indispensably requisite, and, in spite of his great necessities, brought almost to a happy conclusion. It is now full time to free him from all its mark, and substituting, in his place, the lenities, after those severest, which have already had their full course against him. Never was sovereign blessed with more moderation of temper, with more justice, more humanity, than the Hungarians. Therefore, The step, which such a prince should so long have been harassed with rigours, suspicions, calumnies, complaints, encroachments; and been forced from that path in which the rest of his province, increasing the full confidence of his people, as it had constantly trod! If some few instances are found of violations made on the petition of right, which he himself had granted; there is an easier and more natural way for preventing the necessity of, than by a total abolition of any authority. Let the revenue be settled, suitably to the ancient dignity and splendour of the crown; let the public necessities be fully supplied; let the remaining articles of prerogative be left untouched; and let his most religious and virtuous courtiers, be restored into the will, of invading the constitution. From what quarter can jealousy now arise! What further security can be desired or expected? The king's preceding concessions, so far from being insufficient for public security, have rather erred on the other extreme; and, by depriving him of all power of self-defence, are the real cause why the Commons are imbued to raise pretensions hitherto unheard of in the kingdom, and to subvert the whole system of the constitution. But would they be content with moderate advantages, is it not evident that, besides other important concessions, the present parliament may be continued, till the government be reformed to the new track, and every part be restored to full harmony and concord? By the triennial act a perpetual succession of parliaments is established, as everlasting guardians to the laws, while the king possesses no independent power or military force, by which he can be supported in his invasion of them. No danger remains, but what is inseparable from all free constitutions, and what forms the very essence of their freedom; the danger of a change in the people's disposition, and defects in public security, contracted against popular privileges. To prevent such an evil, no expedient is more proper than to contain ourselves within the bounds of moderation, and to consider that all extremes naturally and infallibly beget each other. In the same manner as the past usurpations of the crown, however excusable on account of the necessity or provocations whence they arose, have excited an immeasurable appetite for liberty; let us beware, lest our encroachments, by introducing anarchy, make the people seek shelter under the peevish and despotic rule of a monarch. Authority, as well as liberty, is requisite to government; and is even requisite to the support of liberty itself, by maintaining the laws, which can alone regulate and protect it. What madness, while every thing is so happily settled under advice, and engaged, him, exactly poised and adjusted, to try the hazardous experiment of a new constitution, and renounce the mature wisdom of our ancestors for the crude whirls of turbulent innovators! Besides the certain and incomparable mischief of civil war; are not the perils apparent, which the delicate frame of liberty must inevitably sustain amidst the furious shock of arms! Whichever side prevails, can he scarcely hope to remain inviolate, and may suffer no less, or rather greater, injuries from the boundless pretentions of forces engaged in her cause, than from the invasion of enraged troops, enlisted on the side of monarchs.

The king, upon his return from Scotland, was received in London with the shouts and acclamations of the people, and with every demonstration of regard and affection. Sir Richard Gournay, lord mayor, a man of moderation and sense, understood the importance of these first dispositions, and had engaged the populace, who so lately insulted the king, and who so soon after made furious war upon him, to give him these conduct. In which Charles reapplied from this joyous reception, was soon damped by the remonstrance of the Commons which was presented to him, under a petition of a like strain. The king, however, was not to be so soon or so easily complained of; his concurrence in the Irish rebellion plainly imputed; the scheme laid for the introduction of popery and superstition inveighed against; and, as a king of grace and glory for all time, would not assent to any diocesanism of his subjects. This and other conduct of these assemblies, would have been very ill received by the generality of the people. So loud were the complaints against regal usurpations, that had the king asserted the prerogative of supremacy, by his own authority, the deficiencies in government, arising from the obstancy of the Commons, he would have increased the clamours with which the whole nation already resounded. Charles, therefore, contented himself with observing in general, that even during that period so much complained of, the people enjoyed a great measure of happiness, not only comparatively, in respect of their neighbours, but even in respect of those times which were justly accounted the most fortunate. He made warm protestations of his sincerity in the reformed religion; he promised indulgence to tender consciences with regard to the ceremonies of the church; he mentioned his great concessions to national liberty; he blamed the infantilism of liberty, by which he defended against his person and the national religion; he complained of the general reproaches thrown out in the remonstrance with regard to ill counsels, though he had protected no man from disclosure, by his own authority, and had exposed no unpopular servant, and conferred offices on no one who enjoyed not a high character and estimation in the public. "If, notwithstanding this," he adds, "any malignant party shall take heart, and be willing to sacrifice the peace and happiness of their country to their own sinister ends and ambition, under whatever pretence of religion and conscience; if they shall endeavour to lessen my reputation and interest, and to weaken my lawful power and authority; if they shall attempt, by discountenancing the present laws, to lessen the bands of government, that all men would have for their protection; by which I mean not but God in his good time will discover them to me, and that the wisdom and courage of my high court of parliament will join with me in their suppression and punishment. Nothing shall be more contrary to my heart than that Charles was placed, than to observe, that he was obliged to confine himself within the limits of civility towards subjects who had transgressed all bounds of regard, and even of good manners, in the treatment of their sovereign.

The first instance of those parliamentary encroachments which Charles was now to look for, was, the bill for pressing soldiers to the service of Ireland. This bill quickly passed the lower House. In the preamble, the king's power of pressing, a power exercised during all former times, was declared illegal, and contrary to the liberty of the subject. By a necessary consequence, the prerogative which the crown had ever supposed of obliging men to accept of any branch of public service, was abolished and annihilated: a prerogative, it must be owned, not very compatible with a limited monarchy. In order to elude this law, the king offered to raise 10,000 volunteers for the purpose, but the Commons, with a fierce and strong spirit, that ill-timed question with regard to the prerogative would for the present be avoided, and the pretensions of each party be left entirely. Both Houses took fire at this measure, which, from a similar instance while the bill of attainder against Strafford was in dependence, Charles might foresee would be received with resentment. The Lords, as well as Commons, passed a vote, declaring it to be a high breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill which was in agitation in either of the Houses, or to express his sentiments with regard to it, before it be presented to him for his assent in a parliamentary manner. The king was obliged to compose all matters by an apology.2

The general question, we may observe, with regard to privileges of parliament, has always been, and still continues, one of the greatest mysteries in the English constitution; and, in some respects, notwithstanding the accurate views of that government, the prerogatives and privileges are present as undetermined as were formerly the prerogatives of the crown. Such privileges as are founded on long precedent cannot be controverted: but though it were certain that no earlier kings had not, in any instance, taken notice of bills before the Houses, (which yet appears to have been very common,) it follows not, merely from their never exerting such a power, that they had renounced it or never were possessed of it. Such privileges also as are essential to all free assemblies which deliberate, they may be assumed to whatever precedents may prevail; but though the king's interposition, by an offer or advice, does in some degree overawe or restrain liberty; it may be doubted whether it imposes such evident violence as to entitle the parliament, without any other authority or concession, to claim the privilege of excluding it. But this was the favourable time for extending privileges; and had no, nor never was, this point of harmless been challenged, few bad consequences had followed. The establishment of this rule, it is certain, contributes to the order and regularity, as well as freedom, of parliamentary proceedings.

The interposition of Peers in the election ofcommons was likewise about this time declared a breach of privilege; and continues ever since to be condemned by votes of the Commons, and universally practised throughout the nation.

Every measure pursued by the Commons, and, still more, every attempt made by their partisans, were full of the most inveterate hatred against the hierarchy, and showed a determined resolution of subverting the whole ecclesiastical establishment. Besides numberless vexations and persecutions which the clergy underwent from the arbitrary power of the lower House, the Peers, sometimes, to prevent their bills from (which at the second reading, for the observance of the laws with regard to public worship, the Commons assumed such authority, that, by a vote alone of their House, they suspended those laws, and employed a greater legislative and they particularly forbade bowing at the altar of Jesus Christ, which gave them the highest scandal, and which was one of their capital objections against the established religion.3 They complained of the king's filling five vacant sees, and considered it as an insult upon the kingdom, to complete and strengthen on no order, which they intended soon entirely to abolish. They had accused thirteen bishops of high treason, for enacting canons without consent of parliament; though from the foundation of the monarchy no other method had ever been practised: and they now insisted that the Peers, upon this general accusation, should sequester those bishops from their seats in parliament, and commit them to prison. Their bill for taking away the bishops' votes had last winter been rejected by the Peers: but they again introduced the same bill, though no profigation had intervened; and they endeavored, by some minute alterations, to elude that rule of parliament which opposed the introduction of new sees.4 The Lords, they made a demand, the most absurd in the world, that the bishops, being all of them parties, should be refused a vote with regard to that question. After the resolution of the Lords, by the introduction of the established government of church and state, it could not be expected that their proceedings, in such a violent attempt, would there forth be altogether regular and equitable; but it must be confessed, that, in their attack on the hierarchy, they still openly passed all bounds of moderation, as supposing, no doubt, that the sacredness of the cause would sufficiently atone for employing means the most irregular and unprecedented. This principle, which professed to be so much among zealots, never declared itself so openly as during the transactions of this whole period.

But, notwithstanding these efforts of the Commons, they could not expect the concurrence of the upper House, either to this law, or to any other which they should introduce for the further limitation of royal authority. The majority of the Peers adhered to the king, and plainly forewarned the Commons of the consequences of popular usurpations on the crown. The insolence, indeed, of the Commons, and their haughty treatment of the Lords, had already risen to a great height, and gave sufficient warning of their future attempts upon that order. They muttered, and almost exclaimed, that, if they should be obliged to save the kingdom alone, and that the House of Peers would have no part in the honour. Nay, they went so far as openly to tell the Lords, That they themselves were the representative body of the whole kingdom, and that the Peers were nothing but individuals, who held their seats in a particular capacity: and therefore, if their lordships will not consent to the passing of acts necessary for the preservation of the people, the Commons, together with such of the Lords as are more sensible of the danger, must join together, and represent the matter to his majesty.5 So violent was the democratical, enthusiastic spirit that diffused throughout the nation, that a total confusion of all rank and order was justly to be apprehended, and the wonder was not, that the majority of the nobles should seek shelter under the throne, but that any of them should venture to desert it. But the tide of popular sway seemed never to carry them wide of the moderately defined maxims of civil policy. Among the opponents of the king are ranked the Earl of Northumberland, lord admiral, a man of the first family and fortune, and endowed with that magnified spirit which so well became the Earl of Essex, who inherited all his father's popularity, and having, from his early youth, sought renown in arms, united to a middling capacity that rigid inflexibility of honour which forms the proper ornament of a subject and a soldier: Lord Kimbolton, soon after Earl of Manchester, a person distinguished by humanity, generosity, affability, and every amiable virtue. These men, finding that they could not get redress from the nation, ventured to encourage those popular disorders, which, they really imagined, they possessed authority sufficient to regulate and control.

To obtain a majority in the upper House, the Commons had a recourse to the populace, who on other occasions had done them such important service. Amidst the greatest security, they affected continual fears of destruction to themselves and the nation, and seemed to espouse every movement they advocated, and even the combinations with which, they pretended, they were hourly threatened. All stories of plots, however ridiculous, were willingly attended to, and were dispersed amongst the multitude. One of those that he wished to consult, a taylor, informed the Commons, that, walking in the fields, he had heard to the discourse of certain persons unknown to him, and had heard them talk of a most dangerous conspiracy. A hundred and eight ruffians, as he learned, had been appointed to murder a hundred and eight Lords and Commoners, and were promised rewards for these assassinations, ten pounds for each lord, forty shillings for each commissner. Upon this notable intelligence, at every breath, and without a moment’s hesitation, a conference was desired with the Lords, and the deputy-lieutenants of some suspected counties were ordered to put the people in a posture of defence.

When Charles dismissed the guard which they had ordered during his absence, he complained; and, upon his promising them a new guard, under the command of the Earl of Lauderdale, they absolutely refused the offer, and were well pleased to insomuc, by this instance of jealousy, that their danger chiefly arose from the king himself. The barber barred the way to the chamber where they assembled, and thus the pretensions to those suspicions with which, they pretended, they were hourly threatened. All stories of plots, however ridiculous, were willingly attended to, and were dispersed amongst the multitude.

The Peers voted a declaration against those tumults, and sent it to the lower House; but these relaxed their concurrence. Some zealous apprentices, being seized and committed to prison, thereof. They complained of their imprisonment, and an order was given by the Commons. The sheriffs and justices having appointed constables with strong watches to guard the parliament, the Commons sent for the constables; and required that the constables, and all other violent persons in the county, should be sent to them, to attend the courts of justice.

Encouraged by these intimations of their pleasure, the populace crowded about Whitehall, and threatened insurrections. Several reduced officers and young gentlemen of the inns of court, during this time of disorder and danger, offered their service to the king. Between them and the populace there was some skirmishes, which ended without bloodshed. By way of reprehension, these gentlemen gave notice that they had neither strength nor authority to suppress the tumults. Whitehall was supplied with party-names, under which the factions might rendezvous and agitate their mutual hatred.

Meanwhile the tumults still continued, and even increased about Westminster and Whitehall. The cry incessantly resonated against bishops and rotten-hearted lords. The former especially, being distinguishable by the habit and dress, and armed with rapiers as well as civil causes of quarrel, was also supplied with party-names, under which the factions might rendezvous and agitate their mutual hatred.

Securities, were exposed to the most dangerous insults. Williams, now created Archbishop of York, having been abused by the populace, hastily called a meeting of his brethren. By his advice a protestation was drawn and addressed to the king and the House of Lords. The bishops there set forth, that though they had an undoubted right to sit and vote in parliament, yet in coming thither, they had been menaced, assaulted, and confronted, by the rabble multitude, and could not longer with safety attend their duty in the House. For this reason they protested against all laws, votes, and resolutions, as null and invalid, which should pass during the time of their constrained absence. This protestation, which, though just and legal, was certainly ill-timed, was signed by twelve bishops, and communicated to the king, who lastly approved of it. As soon as it was presented to the Lords, that house desired a conference with the Commons, that they inform the king of the opportunity was seized with joy and triumph. An impeachment of high treason was immediately an indiscretion, to which all the ensuing disorders and civil wars ought immediately and directly to be ascribed. This was the impeachment of Lord Kimbolton and the five members.

When the Commons employed, in their remonstrance, language so severe and indecent, they had not been actuated entirely by justice and passion: their views were more solid and profound. They considered, that in a violent attempt, such as an invasion of the ancient constitution, the more leisure was afforded the people to reflect, the less would they be compelled to adopt those rash and dangerous enterprises; that the Peers would certainly refuse their concurrence, nor were there any hopes of prevailing on them, but by instigating the populace to tumult and disorder; that the employing of such odious means for so invidious an end, would, at long-run, lose them all their popularity, and turn the tide of favour to the contrary party; and that, if the king only remained in the House of Commons, he might adopt such a form, and thus subvert the constitution. They were therefore resolved, if possible, to excite him to the tumult, and thus to bring him into the hands of his enemies. It was not long before they succeeded beyond their fondest wishes. Charles was enraged to find that all his concessions but increased their demands; and that the people, who were returning to a sense of duty towards him, were again roused to sedition and tumults; that the blackest calumnies were propagated against him, and even the Irish massacre ascribed to his counsels and combinations; and that a method of address was adopted, not only unsuitable towards so great a prince, but which no private gentleman could bear without resentment. When he considered all these increasing acts of insolence in the Commons, he was seized with a passion to subvert all order and authority, and to create a new and unstable government. The queen and the ladies of the court further stimulated his passion, and represented, that, if he exerted the vigour and displayed the majesty of a monarch, the daring preparations of the subject rebels before him. Lord Digby, a man of fine parts, but full of levity, and hurried on by precipitate passions, suggested like counsels; and Charles, who, though commonly moderate in his temper, was ever disposed to haste resolutely.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

[The following is a continuation of the narrative, describing the events surrounding the Peers' role in the Regents' intrigue.]

... and every particle and grain of the fons anderves. Herbert, attorney-general, appeared in the House of Peers, and in his majesty's name, accused the peers of an intrigue against Lord Kimbolton and five commoners, Hollis, Sir Arthur Hazlrig, Hamblen, Pym, and Strode. The articles were: that they had traitorously conspired to subvert the government, and to deprive the king of his regal power, and to impose on his subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical authority; that they had conspired, by many foul aspersions on his majesty and his court, to alienate the affections of his people, and make him odious to them; that they had attempted to draw his late army to disobedience of his royal command, and to side with them in their traitorous designs; that they had invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade the kingdom; that they had aimed at subverting the rights and very being of parliament; that, in order to complete their traitorous designs, they had endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them, and to that end, had actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament; and that they had traitorously conspired to levy and actually levied, and to resist, an army against the king.

The whole world stood amazed at this important accusation, so suddenly entered upon, without concert, deliberation, or reflection. Some of these articles of accusation, men said, to judge by appearance, seem to be concocted with an intent to insult and impeach the parliament; nor did these persons appear any further active in the enterprises of which they were accused, than so far as they concurred with the majority in their votes and speeches. Though proofs might, perhaps, be produced, of their privately inviting the Scots to invade England; how could such an attempt be considered as treason, after the act of oblivion which had passed, and after that both Houses, with their common accusers, had entered upon three hundred thousand pounds for their brotherly assistance? While the House of Peers are scarcely able to maintain their independency, or to reject the bills sent them by the Commons; will they be led by the populace, supposing them inclined, to pass a sentence, which must totally subdue the lower House, and put an end to their ambitious undertakings? These five members, at least Pym, Hamblen, and Hollis, are the very heads of the popular party; and if these be taken off, what fate must be expected by their followers, who are many of them accomplices in the same treason! The punishment of which is to be the last triumph of the last routed party; but surely was never before attempted, in opposition to a faction, during the full tide of its power and success.

The king had not leisure to wonder at the indiscerniture of this measure: their astonishment was excited by new attempts, still more precipitate and impudent. A sergeant-at-arms, in the king's name, demanded of the House the five members; and was sent back without any positive answer. Messengers were employed to search for them and arrest them. Their trunks, chambers, and studies, were sealed and locked. The House voted all these acts of violence to be breaches of privilege, and commanded every one to defend the liberty of the members. The king, irritated by all this opposition, resolved next day to come in person to the House, with an intention to demand, perhaps seize, in their presence, the persons whom he had accused.

This resolution was discovered to the Countess of Carlisle, sister to Northumberland, a lady of spirit, wit, and intrigue. She privately sent intelligence to the five members; and they had time to withdraw, a moment before the king entered. He was accompanied by his ordinary retinue, to the number of above two hundred, armed as usual, some with halberts, some with walking swords. The king led them to the door, and himself advanced alone through the hall; while all the members rose to receive him. The speaker withdrew from his chair, and the king took possession of it. The speech which he made was as follows: "Gentlemen, I am sorry for this occasion of coming to you. Yesterday, I sent a sergeant-at-arms, to demand the presence of five members, traitors and rebels against the king, and his majesty's opening to the protection of the House. Instead of obedience, I received a message. I must here declare to you, that though no king that ever was in England could be more careful of your privileges than I shall be, yet you cannot, and I will not, have more than one treason. Therefore am I come to tell you, that I must have these men wheresoever I can find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect that you will send them to me to answer some of the articles. But I am sure, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a fair and legal way: for I never meant any other: and now since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this is no unfit occasion to repeat what I have formally, that whatever I have done in favour to the good of my subjects, I do intend to maintain it."

When the king was looking around for the accused members, he asked the speaker, who stood below, whether any of these persons were in the House? The speaker, falling on his knee, prudently replied: "I have, Sir, neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak, in this place, but as the House shall direct me. And I humbly ask pardon, that I cannot give any other answer to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me."

The Commons were in the utmost disorder; and, when the king was about to leave them, some members cried aloud, so as he might hear them, "Pray, Sir, let us have a Parliament! And the House immediately adjourned till next day.

That evening, the accused members, to show the greater apprehension, removed into the city, which was their fortress. The citizens were the whole night in arms. Some people, who were appointed for that purpose, or perhaps actuated by their own terrors, ran from gate to gate, crying out, that the cavaliers were coming to burn the city, and that the king had ordered them to arm. Next morning Charles sent to the mayor, and ordered him to call a common-council immediately. About ten o'clock, he himself, attended only by three or four lords, went in Guildhall. He told the common-council that he was sorry to hear of the apprehensions entertained of him; that he was come to them without any guard, in order to show how much he relied on their affections; and that he had accused certain men of high treason, against whom he would proceed in a legal way, and therefore presumed that they would not meet with protection in the city. After many other gracious expressions, he told them that one of the heads of the movement was broken and in custody; but that he was not inclined to his service, that he would dine with him. He departed the hall without receiving the applause which he expected. In passing through the streets, he heard the cry, "Pray, Sir, let us have a Parliament!" and the people resounding from all quarters. One of the populace, more insolent than the rest, drew nigh to his coach, and called out with a loud voice, 'To your tents, O Israel!' the words employed by the mutinous Israelites when they abandoned Rebhonom, their rash and ill-counselled sovereign.

When the House of Commons met, they affected the greatest dismay; and adjourning themselves for some days, ordered a committee to sit in Merchant-Taylors' hall in the city. The committee made an exact inquiry into all circumstances attending the king's entry into the House: every passionate speech, every menacing gesture of any, even the meanest of his attendants, was recorded and agitated. An intention of offering violence to the parliament, of seizing the accused members in the very House, and of murdering all who should make resistance, was inferred. And that unparalleled breach of privilege, so it was called, was still ascribed to the counsel of princes and their adherents. This expression, which then recurred every moment in speeches and memorials, and which at present is so apt to excite laughter in the reader, begat at that time the deepest and most real correspondence throughout the kingdom.

A letter was pretended to be intercepted, and was communicated to the committee, who pretended to lay great stress upon it. One catholic there congratulates another on the accusation of the members; and represents that incident as a breach of the same pious contrivance, which had twice already been violated by the violators of their enemies. This practice they continued for some time. When the people, by these affected panic, were worn up to a sufficient degree of rage and terror, it was thought proper that they should be discharged by some public declaration and military process, take their seats in the House. The river was covered with boats, and other vessels, laden with small pieces of ordnance, and prepared for fire. Skipper, whom the parliament had appointed, by their own authority, major-general of the city militia, conducted the members, at the head of this tumultuary army, to Westminster-hall. And when the populace, by land and by water, passed Whitehall, they did not address the insalubrious bodies, What has become of the king and his cavaliers? And whither are they fled?

King leaves London

The king, apprehensive of danger from the enraged multitude, had retired to Hamp- ton-court, determined, on his own account, with grief, shame, and remorse, for the fatal measures into which he had been hurried. His distressed situation he could no longer ascribe to the rigours of destiny, or the misconduct of his adherents; but the whole of the accusation must bear the blame of whatever disasters should henceforth befall him. The most faithful of his adherents, between sorrow and indignation, were confounded with reflections on what had happened, and what was likely to follow. Seeing every prospect blasted, factions triumphant, the disconcerted populace inflamed to a degree of fury, they utterly despared of success in a cause, to whose ruin friends and enemies seemed equally to conspire.

The address of that great body was in his presence nobody pretended to justify. The legality of his proceedings met with many and just apologies; though generally offered to unwilling ears. No maxim of law, it was said, is more established or universally allowed, than that privilege of parliament extends not to treason, felony, or breach of peace; nor has either House, during former ages, ever pretended in any of those cases to interpose in behalf of its members. Though some inconveniences should arise from the exercise of this power in this time; they would not be sufficient, without other authority, to abolish a principle established by uninterrupted precedent, and founded on the tacit consent of the whole legislature. But what are the inconveniences so pretended? The king, on pretence of treason, may seize any members of the opposite faction, and for a time, gain to his partisans the majority of voices. But if he seize only a few, will he not lose more friends by such a gross arbitrariness than he confines enemies? If he seize a great number; is not this expedient force, open and barefaced? And what remedy at all times against such force, but to oppose to it a force which is superior? Even allowing that the king intended to employ violence, not authority, for seizing the members; though at that time, and ever afterwards, he positively asserted the contrary; yet will his conduct admit of excuse. That the hall, where the parliament assembled, is an invariable sanctuary was never yet pretended. And if the Commons complain of the affront offered them, by an attempt to arrest their members in their very presence; the blame must lie entirely on themselves, who had formerly refused compliance with the king's message, when he peaceably demanded those members. The sovereign is the great executor of the laws; and his presence was here legally employed, both in order to declare the law, and in order to prevent those insults which their disobedience had so well merited.

Charles knew how little purpose he should urge these reasons against the present fury of the Commons.

He proposed, therefore, by a message, that they would agree upon a legal method, by which he might carry on his prosecution against the members, lest further misunderstandings happen with regard to privilege. They desired him to lay the grounds of accusation before the House; and pretended that he had offered a pardon to the members; offering to concur in any law that should acquit or secure them; offered any reparation to the House for the breach of privilege, of which, he acknowledged, they had reason to complain.

They were resolved to accept of no intercourse he would discover his advisers in that illegal measure; a condition to which they knew that, without rendering himself for ever vile and contemptible, he could not possibly submit. Meanwhile, they continued to threaten and to demand the violation of parliamentary privileges, and, by their violent outcries, to inflame the whole nation. The secret reason of their displeasure, however obvious, they carefully concealed. In the king's accusation of the members, they plainly saw his judgment of late parliamentary proceedings; and every adherent of the ruling faction dreaded the same fate, should royal authority be re-established in its ancient lustre. By the most unhyphen connexions, they propagated the rumour that the commons would have had, as well as increased the ability, of hurting him. The more to excite the people, whose dispositions were already very turbulent, and whose passions were more excited, a petition from the county of Buckingham was presented to the House by six thousand subscribers, who promised to live and die in defence of the privileges of parliament. The city of London, the county of Essex, that of Hertford, Surrey, Devon, and a petition from the apprentices was graciously received. Nay, one was encouraged from the ports; whose numbers amounted, as they said, to fifteen thousand. The proceedings of that great body contained the same articles with all the others, the privileges of parliament, the danger of religion, the rebellion of Ireland, the decay of trade. The porters further desired, that justice might be done upon offenders, as the atrociousness of their crimes had been observed. And they added, That if such remedies were any longer suspended, they should be forced to extremities not fit to be named, and make good the saying, That necessity has no law.

Another petition was presented by several poor people, or beggars, in the name of many thousands more; in which the petitioners proposed as a remedy for the public miseries, That those noble worthies of the House of Peers, who consort with the happy votaries of the Commons, may separate themselves from the rest, and sit and vote as one entire body. The Commons gave thanks for this petition.

The very women were seized with the same rage. A brewer's wife, followed by many thousands of her sex, brought a petition to the House; in which the petitioners expressed their terror of the papists and prelates, and their dread of like massacres, rapes, and outrages, with those which had been committed upon their sex in Ireland. They had been necessitated, they said, to imitate the example of the womeo of Tekosh; and they claimed equal right with the men, of declaring, by petition, their sense of the public cause; because Christ had purchased them as dear a rate, and in the free enjoyment of Christ consists equally the happiness of both sexes. Pym came to the door of the House; and having told the female zealots, that their petition was thankfully accepted, and was presented in a reasonable time, he begged that they would for the success of the Commons might follow their petition. Such low arts of popularity were affected by such illiberal cant were the unhappy people incited to civil discord and civil enmity against each other.

In the mean time, not only all petitions which favoured the church or monarchy, from whatever hand they came, were discouraged; but the petitioners were sent for, imprisoned, and prosecuted as delinquents; and this unequal conduct was openly avowed and justified. Whoever desirous change, it was said, must express their sentiments; for low, otherwise, shall they be known? But those who favor the established government in church or state should not petition; because they already enjoy what they wish for.

The king had possessed a great party in the lower House, as appeared in the vote for the remonstrance; and this party, had every new cause of disgust arisen, would soon have become the majority, from the odium attending the violent measures embraced by the popular leaders. A great majority he always possessed in the House of Commons, even if their steps were confounded or chased away; and this majority could not have been overcome, but by outrages which, in the end, would have drawn disgrace and ruin on those who incited them. By the present fury of the people, as by an inundation, were all these obstacles swept away, and every rampart of royal authority laid level with the ground. The victory was pursued with impetuosity by the sagacious Commons, who knew the importance of a favourable moment in all popular commotions. The terror of their authority they extended over the whole nation; and all opposition, and even all blame, vented in private conversation, were treated as the most atrocious crimes by these severe inquisitors. So severe was it to find fault with any particular member, if he made a figure in the House; and reflections thrown out on Pym, were at this time treated as breaches of privilege. The populace without discretion, and the frantic step, from the least hurt, the men of their leaders; nor was it safe for any member to approach either House, who pretended to control or oppose the general torrent. After so undisguised a manner was this violence conducted, that Hollis, in a speech to the Peers, desired to know the names of such members as should vote contrary to the sentiments of the Commons. And Pym said, in the lower House, that the people must not be restrained in the expressions of their just desires.

By terror, or contemnity of the king's party, an undisputed majority remained everywhere where his opponents; and the bills sent up by the Commons, which had hitherto stopped with the Peers, and would certainly have been rejected, now passed, and were presented for the royal assent. These were, the pressure bill with its preamble, and the bill against the votes of the bishops in parliament. The king's authority was at that time reduced to the lowest ebb. The queen too, being secretly threatened with imprisonment, and enduring no rest in her husband's protection, was preparing to retire into Holland. The rage of the people was, on account of her religion, as well as her spirit and activity, universally levelled against her. Literature, the most contumacious, she had hitherto borne with silent indignation. The Commons, in their fury against priests, had seized her very confessor; nor would they release him upon her repeated applications. Even a visit of the prince to his mother had been openly complained of, and remonstrances against it had been presented to her. Apprehension of attacks still more violent, she was desirous of facilitating her escape; and she prevailed with the king to pass these bills, in hopes of appeasing for a time the rage of the multitude.

These new concessions, however important, the king immediately found to have no other effect, than had all the preceding ones: they were made the foundation of demands still more arrogant. From the facility of his disposition, from the weakness of his situation, the Commons believed that he could now refuse them nothing. And they regarded the least moment of relaxation, in their demand of royal authority, as highly impolite, during the uninterrupted torrent of their successes. The very moment they were informed of these last acquisitions, they affronted the queen, by opening some intercepted letters written to her by them; they accused an impeachment against Herbert, attorney-general, for obeying his master's commands in accusing their members. And they prosecuted with fresh vigour their plan of the militia, on which they rested all future hopes of an uncontrolled authority.

The Commons were sensible that monarchical government, which, during so many ages, had been established in England, would soon regain some degree of its former authority, and the present tenants, would all their new-invented limitations be able totally to suppress an authority, to which the nation had ever been accustomed. The sword alone, to which all human ordinances must of necessity, at last, conform, could guard their acquired power, and fully secure to them personal safety against the rising indignation of their sovereign. This point, therefore, became the chief object of their aims. A large magazine of arms being in the town of Hull, and a citizen, Peter Manesty, with the advice of Sir John Hotham, a gentleman of considerable fortune in the neighbourhood, and of an ancient family; and they gave him the authority of governor. They sent orders to Conings, governor of Portsmouth, to obey no commands but such as should receive from the parliament. Not content with having obliged the king to displace Lansford, whom he had appointed governor of the Tower, they never ceased soliciting him, till he had also displaced Sir John Byron, a man of high character, and had bestowed that command on Sir John Conyers, in whom alone, they said, they could repose confidence. After making a fruitless attempt, in which they intercepted and destroying the despatches to the minister, that the people should put themselves in a posture of defence against the enterprizes of papists and other ill-affected persons, they now resolved, by a bold and decisive stroke, to seize at once the whole power of the sword, and to confine entirely on their own creatures and adherents.

The severe votes passed in the beginning of this parliament against lieutenants and their deputies, for exer-cising the powers which had been intrusted to them, and armed the crown, and had not left in any magistrate military authority sufficient for the defence and security of the nation. To remedy this inconvenience now appeared necessary. A large majority of the king's party, in both Houses, which restored to lieutenants and deputies the same powers of which the votes of the Commons had been re-ceived; but at the same time the names of all the lieutenants were inserted in the bill; and thus consisted entirely of men in whom the parliament could confide. And for their conduct, they were accountable, by the express terms of the bill, not to the king, but to the parliament.

The policy pursued by the Commons, and which had hitherto succeeded to admittance, was, to astonish the king by the boldness of their enterprises, to intermingle no sweetness with their severity, to employ expressions no less vigorous than necessary, to make him sensible in what little estimation they held both his person and his dignity. To a hill so destructive of royal authority, they prefixed, with an insolence seemingly wanton, a preamble equally dishonourable to the personal character of the king. These are the words: "Whereas there has been of late a most dangerous and desperate design upon the House of Commons, which we have just cause to believe an effect of the bloody courtesies of papists and other ill-affected persons, who have already raised a rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland; and whereas, by reason of many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed, not only to stir up the like rebellions and insurrections in this kingdom of England, but also to back them with forces from abroad," &c.

Here Charles first ventured to put a stop to his concessions; and that not by a refusal, but a delay. When this demand was made; a demand which had totally changed Commons justly regarded as the last they should ever have occasion to make; he was at Dover, attending the queen and the Princess of Orange, in their embarkation. Charles had been frequently accused of an impeach-ment as a matter of so great importance, and must therefore resolve his answer till his return. The parliament instantly despatched another message to him, with solicitations still more important. They expressed their great grief on account of his majesty's answer to their just and necessary petition. They represented, that any delay, during dangers and disturbances so great, was not less unsatisfactory and destructive than an absolute denial. They insisted, that it was their duty to see put in execution a measure so necessary for public safety. And they affirmed, that the people, in many counties, had applied to them for the protection of themselves, and, in some places, were, of themselves, and by their own authority, providing against those urgent dangers with which they were threatened.

Even after this intoleration, the king durst not venture upon a like despatch. But, seeing that attempts which threw such disdour upon him, and protesting the innocence of his intentions when he entered the House of Commons; he only desired that the military authority, if it was defective, should first be conferred upon the crown; and he promised to bestow commissions, but such as should be revocable at pleasure, on the same persons whom the parliament had named in the bill. By a former message he had dismissed his wishes, that they would lay before him, in one view, all the concessions which they deemed requisite for the settlement of the nation. They pretended, that they were exposed to perils so dreadful and imminent, that they had not leisure for such a work. The king, accordingly, resolved to remedy during this emergency; and yet maintained the prerogatives of the crown entire and unbroken.

But the intentions of the Commons were with much impatience known. The distance of time by which, without immediate measures, they could be cured by one remedy alone. They instantly replied, that the dangers and distresses of the nation were such as could endure no longer delay; and unless the king speedily complied with their demands, they should be constrained, for the safety of prince and people, to dispose of the militia by the authority of both Houses, and to resolve to do it accordingly. They asserted, that there were parts of the kingdom which had, from their own authority, put themselves in insurrection; and that they had been distanced by those prevailing fears and jealousies, had acted suitably to the declarations and directions of both Houses, and conformably to the laws of the kingdom. And while they thus menaced the king with their power, they invited him to fix his residence at London, where they knew he would be entirely at mercy.

I am so much amazed at this message," said the king in his very earnest reply, that I know not what to answer. You speak of jealousies and fears! Lay your hands on your hearts, and ask yourselves whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies: and if so, I assure you that this message has nothing lessened them.

As for the militia, I had given the answer before I gave that answer, and am so much assured that the answer is agreeable to what in justice or reason you can ask, or in honour grant, that I shall not alter it in any point.

For my residence near you, I wish it might be safe and honourable, and that I had no cause to absent myself from Whittingham: ask yourselves whether I have not?

What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask what you have done for me.

Have any of my people been transported with fears and apprehensions? I offer as free and general a pardon as yourselves can devise. All this considered, there is a judgment of Heaven upon this nation, if these distinctions continue.

God so deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the true Protestant profession, and for the observance and preservation of the laws; and I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation."

No sooner did the Commons despair of obtaining the king's consent to their bill, that, as those who advised his majesty's answer were enemies to the state, and mischievous projectors for the safety of the nation; that this denial is of such dangerous consequence, that, if his majesty persist in it, it will hazard the peace and tranquillity of all his kingdoms, unless some speedy remedy be applied by the wisdom and authority of both Houses; and that such of the subjects as have put themselves in a posture of defence against these imminent dangers, have done nothing but what is justifiable, and approved by the House."

Lest the people might be averse to the seconding of all these usurpations, and, in some places, to the danger, with the terrors of invasion, with the dread of English and Irish papists; and the most unaccountable panics were spread throughout the nation. Lord Digby having entered Kingston in a coach and six, attended by a few livery servants in their livery livery; and the Duke of Shrewsbury, who had been menaced by some of the menaces of the kingdom being removed from that furious vortex of new principles and opinions, which had transported the capital, still retained a sincere regard for the church and monarchy; and the king here found marks of attachment beyond what he had before expected. The great counsels of the king, and all quarters of England the prime nobility and gentry, either personally, or by messages and letters, expressed their duty towards him; and exhorted him to save himself and himself from that unanimous slavery with which they were threatened. The small interval of time which had passed since the fatal accusation of the members, had been sufficient to open the eyes of many, and to recover them from the astonishment with which at first they had been seized. One rash and passionate attempt of the king's seemed but a small counterbalance to so many acts of deliberate violence, which had been offered to him and every branch of the legislature; and, however sweet the sound of liberty, many resolved to adhere to that moderate freedom transmitted them from their ancestors, and now better secured by such important concessions; rather than, by engaging in a giddy search after more independence, run a manifest risk either of incurring a cruel subjection, or abandoning all law and order.

Charles, finding himself supported by a considerable party in the kingdom, began to speak in a firmer tone, and to retort the accusations of the Commons with a vigour which he had not before exerted. Notwithstanding their remonstrances, and menaces, and insults, he still persisted in refusing their bill; and they proceeded to frame an ordinance, in which, by the authority of the two Houses, without the king's consent, they named lieutenants for all the counties, and conferred on them the command of the whole military force, of all the guards, garrisons, and forts of the kingdom. He issued proclamations against this assembly usurpation, and, as a resolution strictly to observe the law himself, so was he determined, he said, to oblige every other person to pay it a like obedience. The name of the king was essential to all laws, and so familiar in all acts of executive authority, that the parliament was afraid, had they totally omitted it, that the innovation would be too sensible to the people. In all commands, therefore, which they conferred, they bound the persons to obey the orders of his majesty, signified by such; and, in particular, he hitherto unheard of, between the office and the person of the king; those very forces which they employed against him, they levied in his name and by his authority."

It is remarkable how much the topics of argument were now reversed between the parties. The king, while he acknowledged his former error, of employing a plea of necessity, in order to infringe the laws and constitution, warned the public, to their increase of suspicion, on which they threw such violent blame; and the parliament, while they cloathed their personal fears or ambition under the appearance of national and imminent danger, made unknowingly and without any regard to the most trivial instances of conduct. That the liberties of the people were no longer exposed to any peril from royal authority, so narrowly circumscribed, so exactly defined, so much unsupported by reason, and so little maintained upon very plausible topics: but that the danger, allowing it to have any existence, was not of that kind: great, urgent, inevitable; which dilutes all law, and levels all limitations; seems apparent from the simplest view of these transactions. So obvious indeed was the king's present inability to invade the constitution, that the fears and jealousies which operated on the people, and pushed them so furiously to arms, were undoubtedly not of a evil, but of a religious nature. The disconcerted imaginations of men were agitated with a continual dread of popery, with a horror against prelacy, with an antipathy to ceremonies and the liturgy, and with a violent affection for whatever was mingled with popish practices. The former spirit let loose, confounded all regard to ease, safety, interest; and dissolved every moral and civil obligation. Each party was now willing to throw on its antagonist the odium of commencing a civil war; but both of them performed such a demonstration of their judgment, which we cannot gain the people's favour and good opinion, was the chief point on both sides. Never was there a people less corrupted by vice, and more actuated by principle, than the English in this period; and in this period there existed more men who possessed more capacity, more courage, more public spirit, more disinterested zeal. The infusion of one ingredient, in too large a proportion, had corrupted all these new-joiners to the most vitriolic poison. To determine his choice in the approaching contests, every man hearkened with avidity to the reasons proposed on both sides. The war of the pen preceded that of the sword, and daily sharpened the humours of the opposite parties. Besides private adventurers without number, the king and parliament themselves carried on the controversy, by messages, remonstrances, and declarations; where the nation was really the party to whom all answers were addressed. Conducted in the sense of the mass, it could not possibly be otherwise than to the advantage. Not only his cause was more favourable, as supporting the ancient government in church and state against the most illegal pretensions: it was also defended with more art and eloquence. Lord Falkland had accepted

Charles I immediately proclaimed his truant, and complained to the parliament of his disobedience. The parliament avowed and justified the action.

The county of York levied a guard for the king of 600 men: for the king of England had hitherto lived among their subjects, like fathers among their children, and had derived all their security from the dignity of their character, and from the protection of the laws. The two houses, though they had already levied a guard for themselves, had attempted to seize all the military power, all the navy, and all the forts of the kingdom; and to destroy the privilege in every kind of warlike preparations: yet immediately voted, "That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against his parliament, who, in all their consultations and actions, had proposed no other end but the care of his kingdom, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person; that this attempt was a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to a dissolution of the government; and that who- ever should assist him in such a war, were traitors to the fundamental laws of the kingdom."

The armies, which had been every where raised on presence of the service in Ireland, were henceforth more openly employed against the council; and the command of them was given to the Earl of Essex. In London, no less than four thousand men enlisted in one day. And the parliament voted a declaration, which they required every member to subscribe, that those who were still living under the government of the Peers, issued orders for bringing in loans of money and plate, in order to maintain forces which should defend the king and both houses of parliament: for this style they still preserved. Within ten days, vast quantities of plate were brought to their treasurers. Hardly were there men enough to receive it, or room sufficient to store it; and many, with regret, were observed to carry plate out of the palace. All the authorities could find leisure to receive them. Such zeal animat- ed the pusillanimous part of the parliament, especially in the city! The women gave up all the plate and ornaments of the houses, and even their silver thimbles and book- kins, in order to support the good cause against the malignants.

Meanwhile the splendour of the nobility, with which the king was environed, much eclipsed the appearance at Whitehall, with the sight of a crown and sceptre (though even these twigs would not long flourish, when the stock upon which they grew was dead); but as true and real power, I should remain but the outside, but the picture, but the form and semblance of a king."

Charles made a declaration to the Peers who attended him, that he expected from them no obedience to any commands which were not warranted by the laws of the land. The Peers answered this declaration by a protest, in which they declared their resolution to obey no commands but such as were warranted by that authority. By these deliberate engagements, so worthy of an English prince and English nobility, they meant to confound the furious and tumultuary resolutions taken by the parliament. The queen, disposing of the crown jewels in Holland, had been enabled to purchase a number of arms and ammunition. Part of these, after escaping many perils, arrived safely to the king. His preparations were not near so forward as those of the parliament. In order to remove all jealousies, he had resolved, that their usurpations and illegal pretensions should be apparent to the whole world, and thought, that to recover the confidence of the people, was a point much more material to his interest than the collecting of any magazines, stores, or armies, which might breed apprehensions of violent or illegal counsels. But the urgent necessity of bis situation no longer admitted of delay. He now prepared himself for defence. With a spirit, activity, and address, which the other party apprehended, nor the other expected, he employed all the advantages which remained to him, and roused up his adherents to arms. The resources of this prince's genius increased to his difficulties; and he never appeared greater than when plunged into the deepest perils and distresses. From the mixed character, indeed, of Charles, arose in part the misfortunes in which England was involved. His political errors, or rather weaknesses, had raised him inveterate enemies: his eminent moral virtues had procured him zealous partisans: and between the hatred of the one, and the affections of the other, was the nation agitated with the most violent convulsions.

That the king might despair of all composition, the parliament sent him the conditions on which they were willing to come to an agreement. Their demands, contained in nineteen propositions, amounted to a total abdication of monarchical authority. They required, that no man should remain in the council, who was not agreeable to parliament; that no deed of the king's should have validity, unless it was passed in council, and was attested under their hand; that all the officers of state and principal judges should be chosen with consent of parliament, and enjoy their offices for life; that none of the royal family should marry without consent of parliament or council; that the king should be advised by council; that the votes of popish lords should be excluded; that the reformation of the liturgy and church-government should have place according to advice of parliament; that the ordinance, with regard to the militia, be submitted to; that the justice of parliament pass upon all delinquents; that a general pardon be granted, with such exceptions as should be advised by parliament; that the forts and castles be disposed of by consent of parliament; and that no peer be made but with consent of both houses."

"Should I grant these demands," said the king in reply, "I may be waited on bareheaded: I may have my hand kissed; the title of majesty may be continued to me; and the king's authority, signified by both houses, may still be the style of your commands; I may have swords and maces carried before me, and please myself with the sight of a crown and sceptre (though even these twigs would not long flourish, when the stock upon which they grew was dead); but as true and real power, I should remain but the outside, but the picture, but the form and semblance of a king.

When two names, so sacred in the English constitution as those of King and Parliament, were placed in opposition, no act of civil war.
wonder the people were divided in their choice, and were agitated with the most violent animosities and factions.

The nobility, and more considerable gentry, dreading a total confusion of rank from the fury of the populace, enlisted themselves in defence of the monarch, from whom they received, and to whom they communicated, their lustre. Animated with the spirit of loyalty, derived from their ancestors, they adhered to the ancient principles of their constitution, and, valuing themselves on exerting the maxims, as well as inheriting the possessions, of the old English families. And while they passed their time mostly at their country-seats, they were surprised to hear of opinions prevailing, with which they had ever been unacquainted, and which implied not a limitation, but an abolition, almost total, of monarchical authority.

The city of London, on the other hand, and most of the great corporations, took part with the parliament, and adopted with zeal those democratical principles on which the pretensions of that assembly were founded. The government of cities, which even under absolute monarchies is commonly republican, inclined them to this party; the small hereditary influence, which can be retained over the industrious inhabitants of towns; the natural independence of citizens; and the force of popular currents over those generated associations of mankind; all the causes gave, there, authority to the new principles propagated throughout the nation. Many families too, which had lately been enriched by commerce, saw with indignation the officials and gentry of their counties, they could not raise themselves to a level with the ancient gentry; they therefore adhered to a power, by whose success they hoped to acquire rank and considerations. And the new splendid glory of the Dutch commonwealth, where liberty so happily supported industry, made the commercial part of the nation desire to see a like form of government established in England.

The genius of the two religions, so closely at this time interwoven with politics, corresponded exactly to these divisions. The presbyterian religion was new, republican, and suited to the genius of the populace: the other had an air of greater show and ornament, was established on ancient authority, and bore an affinity to the kingly and aristocratical parts of the constitution. The devotees of presbytery became of course zealous partisans of the parliament: the friends of the episcopal church valued themselves on defending the rights of monarchy to this party; the small hereditary influence, which can be retained over the industrious inhabitants of towns; the natural independence of citizens; and the force of popular currents over those generated associations of mankind; all the causes gave, there, authority to the new principles propagated throughout the nation. Many families too, which had lately been enriched by commerce, saw with indignation the officials and gentry of their counties, they could not raise themselves to a level with the ancient gentry; they therefore adhered to a power, by whose success they hoped to acquire rank and considerations. And the new splendid glory of the Dutch commonwealth, where liberty so happily supported industry, made the commercial part of the nation desire to see a like form of government established in England.

Some men also there were of liberal education, who, being either careless or ignorant of those disputes banded about by the clergy of both sides, aspired to nothing but the preservation of life; and the spirit of public spirit and social intercourse of their companions. All these flocked to the king's standard, where they breathed a freer air, and were exempted from that rigid preciseness and melancholy austerity, which reigned among the parliamentary party.

Never was a quarrel more unequal than seemed at first that between the contending parties; almost every advantage lay against the royal cause. The king's revenue had been seized, from the beginning, by the parliament, who issued out to him, from time to time, small sums for his present subsistence; and as soon as he withdrew to York, they totally stopped all payments. London and all the ports, except Newcastle, being in their hands, all the customs yielded them a certain and considerable supply of money; and all contributions, loans, and impositions, were more easily raised from the cities which possessed the nation, than from those which were merely tenant to the king, and could be levied by the king in those open countries, which after some time declared for him.

The seamen naturally followed the disposition of the sea-ports to which they belonged: and the Earl of Northumberland, in his capacity of admiral, having embraced the party of the parliament, had appointed, at their desire, the Earl of Warwick to be his lieutenant, who at once established his authority in the fleet, and kept the entire dominion of the seas that assembled.

All the magazines of arms and ammunition were from the first seized by the parliament; and their fleet intercept- ed the greater part of those which were sent by the queen from Holland. The king was obliged, in order to arm his followers, to borrow the weapons of the train-bands, under the pretense of restoring them as soon as peace should be settled in the kingdom.

The veneration for parliaments was at this time extreme throughout the nation. The custom of reviling those who were suspected of being in opposition, became unknown, during all former ages. Few or no instances of their encroaching ambition or selfish claims had hitherto been observed. Men considered the House of Commons in no other light than as the representatives of the nation, whose interest was the same with that of the public, who were the eternal guardians of law and liberty, and whom no motive, but the necessary defence of the people, could ever engage in an opposition to the crown. The torrent, therefore, of general affection ran to the parliament. What is the great advantage of popularity, the privilege of affixing epithets, fell of course to that party. The king's adherents were the Worked and the Malignant; their adversaries were the Godly and Well-affected. And as the forces of the cities were more united than that of the country, and at once gave shelter and protection to the parliamentary party, who could easily suppress the royalists in their neighbour- ing districts, although they were less considerable, and in the war, seemed to be in the hands of the parliament.

What alone gave the king some compensation for all the advantages possessed by his adversaries, was the nature of his post. In quality and sprite, their conduct was not impeded for, from the generous spirit of the nobles and gentry, than from the base disposition of the multitude. And as the men of estates, at their own expense, levied and armed their tenants, besides an attachment to their masters, greater force and courage were to be expected in these rustic troops, than in the vicious and enervated populace of cities.

The neighbouring states of Europe, being engaged in violent wars, little interested themselves in these civil commotions; and this island enjoyed the singular advantage (for such it surely was) of fighting out its own quarrels without the interposition of foreigners. France, from policy, had fomented the first disorders in Scotland; had sent over arms to the Irish rebels; and continued to give countenance to the English parliament: Spain, from bigotry, furnished the Irish with some supplies of money and arms. The Prince of Orange, closely allied to the crown, encouraged English officers, who served in the Low Countries, to enlist in the king's army: the Scottish officers, who had been formed in Germany, and in the late accommodating spirit of the continent, were inured to arms.

The contempt entertained by the parliament for the king's party was so great, that it was the chief cause of pushing matters to such extremities against him; and men believed that he never would attempt resistance, but must soon yield to the pretensions, however enormous, of the two Houses. Even after his standard was erected, men could not, he brought to apprehend the danger of a civil war; nor was it imagined that he would have the impudence to enrage his implacable enemies, and render his own condition more desperate, by opposing a force which was so much superior. The low condition in which he appeared at Nottingham confirmed all these hopes. His artillery, though far from numerous, had been and armed for want of horses to transport it. Besides the trained bands of the county, raised by Sir John Digby, the sheriff, he had not gotten together above three hundred infantry. The naval force was certainly not eight hundred, and were very ill provided with arms. The forces of the parliament lay at Northampton, within a few days' march of him; and consisted of above six thousand men, well armed and well appointed. Had these troops been joined to the train-bands, the royalists would have beset the small force which he had assembled. By pursu- ing him in his retreat, they had so discredited his cause, and discouraged his adherents, as to have for ever prevented his enlisting any army that could support them. But the Earl of Essex, the parliamentary general, had not yet received any orders from his masters. What rendered them so backward, after such precipitate steps as they had formerly taken, is not easily explained. It is probable, that in the extreme distress of his party consisted the present safety of the king. The council meant, that the royalists, sensible of their feeble condition, and convinced of their slender resources, would disperse of themselves, and leave their adversaries a victory, so much more easily supplied and maintained without the appearance of force, and without bloodshed. Perhaps too, when it became necessary to make the concluding step, and offer base alliance to their sovereign, their scruples and apprehensions, though not sufficient to obstruct their resolution, yet checked the execution of it.

Sir Jacob Astley, whom the king had appointed major-general of his intended army, told him, that he could not give him assurance but he might be taken out of his bed, if the rebels should make a brisk attempt to that purpose. All the king's attendants were full of well-grounded apprehensions. Some of the lords having desired that a message might be sent to the parliament with overtures to a treaty, Charles, who well knew that an accommodation, in his present condition, meant nothing but a total submission, hastily broke up the council, lest this proposal should be further insisted on. But next day, the Earl of Southampton and Sir Edward Montagu, having offered the same advice in council, it was hearkened to with more coolness and deliberation. He urged, that though such a step would probably increase the insolence of the parliament, this was so far from being an advantage to the commonwealth, as it would be to the advantage of the royal cause: that if they refused to treat, which was more probable, the very sound of peace was so popular, that nothing could more disgust the nation than such haughty severity: that if they admitted of a treaty, their proposals, considering their present situation, would be so exorbitant, as to open the eyes of their most partial adherents, and turn the general favour to the king's side. The case was, that a delay was expeditious, and a delay of the imminent danger with which the king was at present threatened.

Charles, on assembling the council, had declared against all advances towards an accommodation; and had said, that, having now nothing left him but his honour, this last possession he was resolved steadily to preserve, and rather to perish than yield any further to the pretensions of his enemies. But, by the unanimous desire of the council, he was prevailed on to send a message to the parliament, with the same advice. That nobleman, therefore, with Sir John Colepepper, and Sir William Uvedale, was despatched to London, with offers of a treaty. The manner in which they were received was disgraceful to the interest of the commonwealth, not allowed by the Peers to take his seat; but was ordered to deliver his message to the skir, and immediately to depart the city; the Commons showed little better disposition towards Colepepper and Uvedale. Both Houses replied, that they could admit of no treaty with the king, till he took down his standard, and recalled his proclamations, in which the parliament supposed themselves to be declared traitors. The king, by a second message, denied any such intention against the two Houses; but offered to recall these proclamations, provided the parliament agreed to recall theirs, in which his adherents were declared traitors. They desired him, in return, to dismiss his forces, to reside with his own family, and take up his residence on his estates; that is, abandon himself and his friends to the mercy of his enemies.

Both parties flattered themselves, that, by these messages and replies, they had gained the ends which they had designed, and believed that they had sufficiently sensible of the parliament's insolence and aversion to peace; the parliament intended, by this vigour in their resolutions, to support the vigour of their military operations. The courage of the parliament was increased, besides their great superiority of force, by two recent events, which had happened in their favour. Goring was governor of Portsmouth, the best fortified town in the kingdom, and, by its situation, of great importance. This man seemed to have rendered himself an immoveable enemy to the king, by betraying, probably magnifying, the secretcabals of the army; and the parliament thought that his fidelity to them might, on that account, be entirely depended on. But the same love of money, and the same desire of being regarded to engagements and professions. He took underhand his measures with the court, and declared against the parliament. But, though he had been sufficiently supplied with money, and long before he knew this danger, so small was his foresight, that he had left the place entirely destitute of provisions, and in a few days he was obliged to surrender to the parliamentary forces. The Marquis of Winchester had gained the highest credit and character in the kingdom, and, equally with the king, descended, by a female, from Henry VII. During the reign of James, he had attempted, without having obtained the consent of that monarch, to marry Arundella Stuart, a lady nearly related to the crown; and, upon discovery of his intentions, had been obliged, for some time, to fly the kingdom. Ever after, he was looked on with an evil eye at court, from which, in a great measure, he withdrew; and living in an independent manner, he addicted himself entirely to literary occupations and amusements. In proportion as the king declined in popularity, and the parliament assumed greater and nobler airs, and treated the commons with great good humour and authority. By his sagacity, he soon perceived, that the Commons, not content with correcting the abuses of government, were carried, by the natural current of power and popularity, into the opposite extreme, and that they were commencing on themselves the work of constitution. Immediately he devoted himself to the support of the king's falling authority, and was prevailed with to be governor to the young prince, and reside at court, to which, in the eyes of all men, he gave, by his presence, a new lustre and authority. So high was his character for mildness and humanity, that he still preserved, by means of these popular virtues, the public's esteem and favour; and so respected by the parliament, that it was not possible his change of his change. Notwithstanding his habits of ease and study, he now exerted himself in raising an army for the king; and being named general of the western counties, where his interest chiefly lay, he began to assemble forces in Somersetshire. By the assistance of Lord Seymour, Lord Paulten, John Digby, son of the Earl of Bristol, Sir Francis Hawley, and others, he had drawn together some appearance of an army; when the parliament apprehensive of the danger, sent the Duke of Buckingham, with a body of troops, to apprehend him, and force against him. On his approach, Hertford was obliged to retire into Sherborne castle; and, finding that place untenable, he himself passed over into Wales, leaving Sir Ralph Hopton, and Captain Berkeley, with their horse, consisting of about a hundred and twenty, to march into Cornwall, in hopes of finding that county better prepared for their reception.

All the dispersed bodies of the parliamentary army were now ordered to march to Northampton; and the Earl of Essex, who had joined them, found the whole amount to 15,000 men. The king, though his camp had been gradually removed from all quarters, was sensible that he had no army which could cope with so formidable a force; and he thought it prudent, by slow marches, to retire to Derby, thence to Shrewsbury, in order to counteract the levies which his friends were making in those parts. At Wellingham, and Barnet, a day's march before the beleaguered place, the king received an intelligence, that the rebels resolved on an attempt against him. He immediately marched to reenforce Brecon, with his army, and on the 16th of February, defeated the parliamentary forces in such a manner, as to produce a renunciation of all his forces, and caused his military orders to be read at the head of every regiment. That he might bind himself by reciprocal ties, he solemnly made the following declaration before the army:—

"I do promise, in the presence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his blessing and protection, that I will, to the utmost of my power, defend and maintain the true reformed protestant religion, established in the church of England, and, by the grace of God, in the same will live and die."

"I desire that the laws may ever be the measure of my government, and that the liberty and property of the subject may be preserved by them with the same care as my own just rights. And if it please God, by his blessing on this army, raised for my necessary defence, to preserve me from the present rebellion, I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the sight of God, to maintain the laws and freedom of parliament, and to govern, to the utmost of my power, by the known statutes and customs of the kingdom; and particularly to observe inviolably the laws to which I have given my oath, in this parliament, to observe in my absence, and the great necessity to which I am bound, beget any violation of law. I hope it shall be imputed by God and man to the authors of this war; not to me, who have so earnestly laboured to preserve the peace of the kingdom.

When I willingly fall in these particulars, I shall expect no aid or relief from man, nor any protection from above; but in this resolution I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men, and am confident of the blessing of Heaven."

Meanwhile, the importance of the royal army, with both the approaches of the capital, had never done him any real service. The bulk of the generous train of nobility and gentry who now attended the king in his distresses, breathed the spirit of liberty, as well as of loyalty: and in the hopes alone of his subduing to a legal and limited monarchy, like those who were in the same situation, in his favour, to sacrifice their lives and fortunes.

While the king's army lay at Shrewsbury, and he was employing himself in collecting money, which he received, though in no great quantities, by voluntary contributions, and the first part of the universality of the nation, the news arrived of an action, the first which had happened in these wars, and where he was successful.

On the appearance of commotions in England, the Prince Rupert and Maurice, sons of the unfortunate palatine, had offered their service to the king; and the former, at that time, commanded a body of horse, which had been sent to Worcester, in order to watch the motions of Essex, who was marching towards the city eastward. Rupert, as soon as he had the place arrived, entered his order cavalry of the enemy approaching the gates. Without delay he briskly attacked them, as they were defiling from a lane, and forming themselves. Colonel Sandys, who led them, and who fought with valour, being mortally wounded, fell from his horse. The whole party was routed, and was pursued above a mile. The prince, hearing of Essex's approach, returned to the main body. This encounter, though in itself of small importance, mightily raised the reputation of the royalists, and acquired to Prince Rupert the character of promptitude and courage; qualities which he eminently displayed during the whole course of the war.

In this army, the king found it amount to 10,000 men. The Earl of Lindsey, who in his youth had sought experience of military service in the Low Countries, was general: Prince Rupert commanded the horse; Sir Jacob Astley, the foot; Sir Arthur Aston, the dragoons; Sir John Hveden, the artillery. Lord Berrington and Stuart was at the head of a troop of guards. The estates and revenue of this single troop, according to Lord Clarendon's computation, were at least equal to those of all the members, who, as the commencement of war, voted in both Houses. Their servants, under the command of Sir William Killigrew, made another troop, and always marched with their masters.

On Oct. 10th, with this army the king left Shrewsbury, resolving to give battle as soon as possible to the army of the parliament, which, he heard, was continually augmenting by supplies from London. In order to prevent the council, he diverted the money, which he knew the enemy would not abandon to him. Essex had now received his instructions. The import of them was, to present a most humble petition to the king, and to rescue him and the royal family from those dangers that were about them. Five days after the departure of the royalists from Shrewsbury, he left Worcester. Though it be commonly easy in civil wars to get intelligence, the armies were within six miles of each other, ere either of the generals was acquainted with the approach of his enemy. Shrewsbury and Worcester, the places from which they set out, are not above twenty miles distant; yet had the two armies marched ten days in this mutual ignorance. So much had military skill, during a long peace, decayed in England. The royal army lay near Banbury: that of the parliament at Northampton. On the 30th Oct., Prince Rupert sent intelligence of the enemy's approach. Though the day was far advanced, the king resolved upon the attack: Essex drew up his men to receive him. Sir Faithful Fortescue, who had levied a troop for the Horse, had been ordered to serve in the parliamentary army, and was now posted on the left wing, commanded by Ramsay, a Scotchman. No sooner did the king's army approach, than Fortescue, ordering his troop to discharge their pistols in the ground, put himself under the command of Prince Rupert. Partly from this incident, partly from the furious shock made upon them by the prince, that whole wing of cavalry immediately fled, and were pursued for two miles. The right wing of the parliament's army had no better success. Chased from their ground by Wilmot and Sir Arthur Aston, they also took to flight. The king's body of reserve, commanded by Prince Rupert, had not yet understood that all was over, and impatient to have some share in the action, heedlessly followed the chase, which their left wing had precipitately led them. Sir William Balfour, who commanded Essex's reserve, perceived the advantage: he wheeled about a troop which he sent forward; the news of an arrival of the first, which had happened in these wars, and where he was successful.

The prince, hearing of Essex's approach, returned to the main body. This encounter, though in itself of small importance, mightily raised the reputation of the royalists, and acquired to Prince Rupert the character of promptitude and courage; qualities which he eminently displayed during the whole course of the war.

After the royal army was recruited and refreshed, as the weather still continued favourable, it was again put in motion. A party of horse approached to Reading, of which Martin was appointed governor by the parliament. Both governors then marched towards Oxford, which was now the present of a civil war, bloody, and of uncertain event; were further alarmed at the near approach of the royal army, while their own forces lay at a distance. They voted an address for a treaty.
The king's near approach to Colchester quickened their advances for peace. Northumberland and Pembroke, with three commissioners, presented the address of both Houses; in which they besought his majesty to appoint some convenient place where the might reside till the matter might be attended to with proposals. The king named Windsor, and desired that their garrison might be removed, and his own troops admitted into that castle.

Meanwhile, the Essex, by the nasty marches, had arrived at London. But neither the presence of his army nor the precarious hope of a treaty, retarded the king's approaches. Charles attacked, at Brentford, with the facility of treason, and after a sharp action beat them from that village, and took about 500 prisoners. The parliament had sent orders to forbear all hostilities, and had expected the same from the king; though no stipulations to that purpose had been mentioned by their commissioners. Loud complaints were raised against this attack, as if it had been the most apparent perjury, and breach of treaty.

Inflamed with resentment, as well as anxious for its own safety, the city marched its trained bands in excellent order, and joined the army under Essex. The parliamentary army now amounted to above 24,000 men, and was much superior to that of the king. After both armies had faced each other for some time, Charles drew off and retired to Oxford.

While the principal armies on both sides were kept in inaction by the winter season, the king and parliament went on their respective march, each in search of the other, and in seeking advancing towards peace. By means of contributions or assessments, levied by the house, Charles maintained his cavalry; by loans and voluntary presents, sent from his friends abroad, he supported his infantry; but the supplies were still very unequal to the necessities under which he laboured. The parliament had more resources for money; and had, by consequence, every military preparation in much greater order and in a better state, than the government of Essex; but the army amounted to the five-and-twentieth part of every one's substance, they established on that city a weekly assessment of 10,000 pounds, and another of 23,518 on the rest of the kingdom. And as their army was not present established in most counties, they levied these taxes with regularity; though they amounted to sums much greater than the nation had formerly paid to the public.

A.D. 1643.

The king and parliament sent reciprocally their demands; and a treatly was made, but without any cessation of hostilities, as had at first been proposed. The Earl of Northumberland, and four other commissioners of the lower house, came to Oxford, as commissioners. In this treaty the king perpetually insisted on the re-establishment of the crown in its legal powers, and on the restoration of his constitutional prerogative; the parliament still required new concessions, and a further subversion of regal authority, as a more effectual remedy to their fears and jealousies. Finding the king supported by more forces and a greater party than they had ever looked for, they seemed to be shocked at other extravagant conditions which they had formerly claimed; but their demands were still too high for an equal treaty. Besides other articles, to which a complete victory alone could entitle them, they made no secret of the terms which they expressed terms utterly to abridge the king's episcopacy; a demand which, before they had only insinuated: and they required, that all other ecclesiastical controversies should be determined by their assembly of divines; that is, in the manner the most repugnant to the inclinations of the king and all his partizans. They insisted, that he should submit to the punishment of his most faithful adherents. And they desired him to acquiesce in their settlement of the militia, and to confer on their adherents the entire power of the sword. In answer to the king's proposal, that his magazines, towns, forts, and ships, should be restored to him, the parliament required, that they should be put into such hands as they could confide in; whereupon the munitions, to which he formerly sent to the king, showed their inclination to abolish monarchy; they only asked, at present, the power of doing it. And having now, in the eye of the law, been broken up by the legal power, and landed gentleman in foreign; it is evident that their fears and jealousies must, on an account, have multiplied extremely; and have rendered their personal safety, which they interwove with the safety of the nation, still more incompatible with the authority of the monarch. Though the gentleness and lenity of the king's temper might have insured them against schemes of future vengeance; they preferred, as no doubt, natural, an independent security, accompanied too with exterior power, to the station of subjects, and that not entirely guarded from all apprehensions of danger.

The conferences went no further than the first demand on each side. The parliament, finding that there was no likelihood of coming to any agreement, suddenly recalled their commissioners. A military enterprise, which they had concerted early in the spring, was immediately undertaken. Reading, the principal market town in the county of Berkshire, which had been esteemed a place of considerable strength in that age, when the art of attacking towns was not well understood in Europe, and was totally unknown in England. The Earl of Essex sat down before it on the 12th April. He had the place invested by his army of 18,000 men; and carried on the siege by regular approaches. Sir Arthur Aston, the governor, being wounded, Colonel Fielding succeeded to the command. In a little time the town was found to be no longer in a condition for a defence; and it was approached, with an intention of obliging Essex to raise the siege, the disposition of the parliamentary army was so strong, as rendered the design impracticable. Fielding, therefore, was contented to sell the town and profits on condition that he should bring off all the garrison with the honours of war, and deliver up deserters. This last article was thought so ignominious and so prejudicial to the king's interests, that the governor tried by a council of war, and condemned to lose his life for consenting to it. His sentence was afterwards remitted by the king.

Essex's army had been fully supplied with all necessary names from London; even many superfluities and luxuries were sent them by the care of the zealous citizens: yet the hardships, which they suffered from the siege, during so early a season, had weakened them to such a degree, that they were no longer fit for any new enterprise. And the two armies, for some time, encamped in the neighbourhood of each other, without attempting, on either side, any action of moment.

Besides the military operations between the principal armies, which lay in the centre of England; each county, each town, each family almost, was divided within itself; and the most violent convulsions shook the whole kingdom. Throughout the winter, continual efforts had every where been made by each party to surmount its antagonist; and the English, roused from the lethargy of peace, with eager though unfaltering hands, employed against their fellow-citizens their long-neglected weapons. The famous zeal for liberty and presbyterian discipline, which had hitherto run uncontrolled throughout the nation; now at last exerted an equal ardour for monarchy and episcopacy; whose intention of abolishing these ancient modes of government was openly avowed by the parliament. Conventions for neutrality, though in several counties they had been entered into, and confirmed by the most solemn covenant, were accordingly disregarded by Houses, which, immediately broken; and the fire of discord was spread into every quarter. The altercation of discourse, the controversies of the pen, but, above all, the declamations of the pulpit, indisposed the minds of men towards each other. The former, however, and inflamed as were the dispositions of the English, by a war both civil and religious, that great destroy of humanity; all the events of this period are less distinguished by atrocious deeds, either of teachers or cruelty, than were ever any intestine discord which had so long a continuance: a circumstance which will be found to reflect great praise on the national character of that people, now so unhappily roused to arms.

In the north, Lord Fairfax commanded for the parliament, the Earl of Newcastle for the king. The latter nobleman began those associations which were afterwards so destructive both to the parties, and to the country. He united in a league for the king the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and the bishopric, and engaged, some time after, other counties in the same association. Finding that Fairfax, assisted by Hotham and other captains of Hull, was advancing upon the southern part of Yorkshire; he advanced with a body of four thousand men, and took possession of York. At Tadcaster, he attacked the forces of the parliament, and defeated them, but his victory was not decisive. In other encounters he obtained some inconclusive advantages. But the chief benefit which resulted from his enterprises was, the establishing of the king's authority in the northern provinces.

In another part of the kingdom, Lord Broke was killed by a shot, while he was taking possession of Lichfield for the parliament. After a short combat, near Stafford, between the Earl of Newcastle and Sir John Gell, the former, who commanded the king's forces, was killed, while he fought with great valor; and his forces, discouraged by his death, though they had obtained the advantage in the action, retreated into the town of Stafford.

Sir William Waller began to distinguish himself among the generals of the parliament. Active and indefatigable in his operations, rapid and enterprising, he was fitted by his genius to the nature of the war; which, being managed by him and conducted by unforeseen counsels, afforded success to every bold and sudden undertaking. After taking Winchester and Chichester, he advanced towards Gloucester, which was in a mannerblockaded by Lord Herbert, who had large considerable forces in Wales for the royal party. While he attacked the Welsh on one side, a sally from Gloucester made impression on the other. Herbert was defeated; five hundred of his men killed on the spot; a thousand taken prisoners; and he himself escaped with some difficulty to Oxford. Hereford, esteemed a strong town, defended by a considerable garrison, was surrendered to Waller, from the cowardice of Colonel Perci, the governor. Tenby and Carnarvon underwent the same fate. Worcester refused him admittance; Waller, without placing any garrisons in his new conquests, retired to Gloucester, and he thence joined the army under the Earl of Essex.

Of all the most remarkable actions of valor, royalists in the winter season, were performed in the west. When Sir Ralph Hopton, with his small troops, retired into Cornwall before the Earl of Bedford, and had recovered a few of the townships, he abandoned the pursuit, and committed the care of suppressing the royal party to the sheriffs of the county. But the attentions of Cornwall were much inclined to the king's service. While Sir Richard Buller and Sir Alexander Carew lay at Launceston, and employed themselves in executing the parliament's ordinance for the militia, a meeting of the county was assembled at Truro; and after Hopton produced his commission from the Earl of Hertford, the king's general, it was agreed to execute the laws, and to expel these invaders of the county. The trans-borders of Cornwall reduced to peace and to obedience under the king.

It had been usual for the royal party, on the commencement of these disorders, to claim, on all occasions, the strict execution of the laws, which they knew were favourable to the parliamentary party. A promise to the pleas of necessity, and avow the transgression of any statute, had also been accustomed to war the laws, and by forced constructions to interpret them in their own favour. But through the king was not taken by such a method of conducting war, and it was by favour of law that the trans-bands were raised in Cornwall; it appeared that those maxims were now prejudicial to the royal party. These troops could not legally, without their own consent, be carried out of the county; and consequently, it was impossible to push into Devonshire the advantage which they had obtained. The Cornish royalists, therefore, had to be more serviceable. Sir Bevil Granville, the most beloved man of that country, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Nicholas Sharning, Arundel, and Trevannon, undertook, at their own charge, to raise an army for the king; and their great interest and zeal naturally obtained that the parliament should be more serviceable. The parliament, alarmed at this appearance of the royalists, gave commission to Ruthven, a Scottishman, governor of Plymouth, to march with all the forces of Dorset, Somerset, and Devon, in order to recover Cornwall and obtain the honour of that victory which he looked for with assurance. The royalists, in like manner, were impatient to bring the affair to a decision before Ruthven's army should receive so considerable a reinforcement. The battle was fought on Bradac Down; and the king's forces, though inferior in number, gave a total defeat to their enemies. Ruthven, with a few broken troops, fled to Saltash; and when that town was taken, he escaped with some difficulty, and almost alone, into Plymouth and Exeter.

Notwithstanding these advantages, the extremest wants of both army and garrison under which the Cornish royalists laboured, obliged them to enter into a convention of neutrality with the parliamentary party in Devonshire; and this neutrality held all the winter-season. In the spring, they recovered and established a considerable force in the country; and war recommenced with great appearance of disadvantage to the king's party. Stamford, having assembled a strong body of near seven thousand men, well supplied with money, provisions, and ammunition, advanced upon the royalists, who were not half his number, and were oppressed by every kind of necessity. Distrust, joined to the natural gallantry of these troops, commanded by the prime gentry of the country, which are ready, with the most miraculous efforts, to overcome all these disadvantages. Stamford being encompassed on the top of a high hill near Stratton, they attacked him in four divisions, at five in the morning, having lain all night under arms. One division was commanded by Lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton, another by Sir Bevil Granville, and Sir John Berkley, a third by Sharning and Trevannon, a fourth by Esset and Godolphin. In this action, the authority of the king's army was pressing with vigour those four ways up the hill, and their enemies obstinately defending themselves. The fight continued with doubtful success, till word was brought the chief officers of the Cornish, that their ammunition was spent to less than four barrels of powder. This defect, which they concealed from the soldiers, they resolved to supply by their valour. They agreed to advance without firing a shot, and to adhere to their design of making a sudden assault and could be an equal ground with the enemy. The courage of the officers was so well seconded by the soldiers, that the royalists began on all sides to gain ground. Major-General Chaloner, who commanded the parliamentary army, (for Stow it is a matter of dispute,) failed not in his duty; and when he saw his men recoil, he himself advanced with a good stand of pikes, and pierced into the thickest of the enemy, was at last overpowered by numbers, and took refuge behind the thickest part of the ground; so much the four parties of the royalists, growing nearer and nearer as they ascended, at last met together upon the plain at the top; where they embraced with great joy, and signalled their victory with loud shouts and musical congratulations.

After this success, the attention both of king and parliament was turned towards the west, as to a very important scene of action. The king sent thither the Marquis of Hertford and Prince Rupert, and detached troops to prevent the arrival of any other unjudicious attempts of the royal army; whereas he had marched out of Somerset, to reduce that county to obedience. The next scene was the battle of Lansdown near Bath, in which the king had had an advantage by the arrival of the royalists; but, when they had been dispersed, he had entirely given the advantage to the parliament; the king's troops were brought off; and a great body, together with two hundred prisoners, was conveyed to Oxford. But what most pleased the royalists was, the expectation that some disaster had happened to Hambden, their capital and main strength.

Colonel Urrey, a Scotchman, who served in the parliamentary army, having received some despatches, came to Oxford, and offered his services to the king. In order to prevent the removal of the main body of the royalists from the field, he was to form an attempt upon them. The prince, who was entirely fitted for that kind of service, falling suddenly upon the dispersed bodies of Essex's army, routed two regiments of cavalry and one of infantry, and carried his navages within two miles of the general's quarters. The alarm being given, every one mounted on horseback, in order to pursue the prince, to recover the scattered forces, and to redress the disaster which had sustained. Among the rest, Hambden, who had a regiment of infantry that lay at a distance, joined the horse as a volunteer; and overtaking the royalists on Cholgrave field, entered into the thickest of the battle. By the bravest and activity of Rupert, the king's troops were brought off; and a great body, together with two hundred prisoners, was conveyed to Oxford. But what most pleased the royalists was, the expectation that some disaster had happened to Hambden, their capital and main strength.

The gallant Grenville was there killed; and Hopton, by the blowing up of some granado, was dangerously hurt. The royalists next attempted to march onwards, and to join their forces to the king at Oxford; but Waller hung on their rear, and mistested their march till they reached the Devizes. Reinforced by additional troops, which flocked to him from all quarters, he so much surprised the royalists in number, that they durst not continue their march, or expose themselves to the hazard of an action. It was resolved, that Hertford and Prince Maurice should proceed with the cavalry; and having procured a reinforcement from the king, should hasten back to the relief of their friends. Waller was so confident of taking this body of infantry, now abandoned by the horse, that he wrote to the parliament, that their work was done, and that by the next post he would inform them of the number and quality of the army he had defeated. The king, having received hearing of the great difficulties to which his western army was reduced, had prepared a considerable body of cavalry, which he immediately dispatched to their succour and support. Waller, the next day, 12th July, resolved to join the head of the army, on Roundway-down, about two miles from war-less. He had the two armies met at the Devizes; and advancing with his cavalry to fight Wilmot, and prevent his conjunction with the Cornish infinjns, was received with equal valour by the royalists. After a sharp action he was totally routed, and flying with a few horse, escaped to Bristol. Wilmot, seeing the enemy's cannon, and having joined his friends, whom he came to relieve, attacked Waller's infantry with reloaded courage, dispersed them off the field, and routed and dispersed the whole army.

This important victory following so quick after other successes, struck great dismay into the parliament, and gave an alarm to their principal army commanded by Essex. Waller exclaimed loudly against that general for allowing Wilmot to pass him, and proceed without any interruption to the succour of the distressed army at the Devizes. But Essex, finding that his army fell continually to decay after the siege of Reading, was resolved to recover the loss there; and the weakness of the king, and his want of all military head, restrained the activity of the royal army. No action had happened in that part of England, except one skirmish, which of itself was of no great consequence, and was rendered remarkable by the presence of the Prince Rupert in the battle of Reading.

The battle of Round-down, or the relief of the Devizes, and the advanced in consequence, of Rupert, to the king's assistance, drove Waller from the field, and dispersed the whole army.
At this period of Waller, was further informed, that the queen, who landed in Burlington-bay, had arrived at Oxford, and had brought from the north a reinforcement of three thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse. Dislodging from Thame and Newbury, where he had hitherto proper to retreat nearer to London; and he showed to his friends his broken and disheartened forces, which a few months before he had led into the field to so flourishing a conclusion, in the midst of twenty thousand arms, sent his affection westward under Prince Rupert, and, by their conjunction with the Cornish troops, a formidable force, for numbers as well as reputation and valour, was composed. That an enterprise, correspondent to men's expectations, might be undertaken with the prince, and that which the prince died so to the defence of the garrison, that in the end the assailants were repulsed with a considerable loss both of officers and soldiers. On the prince's side, the assault was conducted with so much dispatch, and almost with equal loss, that the better success. One party, led by Lord Grandison, was indeed beaten off, and the commander himself mortally wounded. Another, conducted by Colonel Belkiss, met with a like fate: but Washington, with a less party finding a place in the curtain weaker than the rest, broke in, and quickly made room for the horse to follow. By this interruption, however, nothing but the suburbs was yet gained: the entrance into the town was still more difficult: and by the lost approach was regained, as well as the prospect of further danger, every one was extremely discouraged: when, Bristol taken, to the great joy of the army, the city beat a parley. The garrison was allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, leaving their cannon, ammunition, and colours. For this instance of cowardice, Fiennes was afterwards tried by a court-martial, and condemned to lose his head; but the sentence was remitted by the general.

Great complaints were made of violations exercised on the garrison, contrary to the capitulation. An apology was made by the royalists, as if these were a retaliation for some grievances committed on their friends at the surrender of Rochester, or presented in the court of King Charles; but really from the extreme anarchy of the parties, were such irregularities continued during the whole course of the war.

The loss sustained by the royalists, in the assault of Bristol, was considerable. Five hundred excellent soldiers perished. Among those of condition, were Grandison, Slanning, Trencham, and Morley; Bellasis, Ashley, and Sir John Owen, were wounded: yet was the success, upon the whole, so considerable, as might have made the courage of the one party, and depressed that of the other. The king, to show that he was not intoxicated with good fortune, nor aspired to a total victory over the parliament, published a manifesto, in which he renewed the proposition, formerly taken, with great solemnity, at the head of his army, and expressed his firm intention of making peace upon the re-establishment of the constitution. Having joined the camp at Bristol, and sent Prince Maurice with a detachment into Devonshire, he deliberated how to employ the remaining forces in an enterprise of moment. Some proposed, and seemingly with reason, to march directly to London; where every thing was in confusion, where the army of the parliament was baffled, weakened, and dismayed, and where, it was hoped, either by an insurrection of the citizens, by victory, or by treaty, a speedy end to the war might be brought about. But by the undertaking, by reason of the great number and force of the London militia, was thought by many to be attended with considerable difficulties. Gloucester, lying within twenty miles of the capital, was never to be captured by assault. It was the only remaining garrison possessed by the parliament in those parts. Could that city be reduced, the king held the whole course of the Severn under his command; the rich and malcontent counties of the West were subdued, and Posterity might be forced to pay high contributions, as an atonement for their disaffection; an open communication could be preserved between Wales and these new conquests; and half of the kingdom, being entirely freed from the enemy, and thus united into one firm body, might be employed in re-establishing the king's authority throughout the remainder. These were the reasons for embracing that resolution; fatal, as it was ever esteemed, to the royal party.

The governor of Gloucester was one Sir George Massey, a soldier of fortune, who, before he engaged with the parliament, had offered his service to the king; and as he was free from the fumes of enthusiasm, and from the ties of personal interest, it was supposed that he would lend an ear, it was presumed, to proposals for accommodation: but Massey was resolute to preserve an entire fidelity to his masters; and though no one could kindle that enthusiastic spirit so prevalent in his city and garrison, the summons to surrender allowed ten days for an answer: but before that time expired, there appeared before the town two citizens, with lean, pale, sharp, and dismal visages: faces, so strange and uncouth, according to Lord Clarendon; figures, so habited and accoutered, as at once moved the most severe countenance to mirth, and the most cheerful heart to sadness: it seemed impossible that such messengers could bring less than a defiance. The men, without any circumstance of duty or good manners, in a pert, shrill, undismayed accent, said, that they brought an answer from the godly city of Gloucester: and extremely ready were they, according to the historians, to give insolent and sedition replies to any question; as if their business were chiefly, by provoking the king, to make him violate his own safe-conduct. Their answer from the city was in these words: "We, the inhabitants, magistrates, officers, and soldiers, within the garrison of Gloucester, unto his majesty's gracious message, return this humble answer: that we do keep this city, according to our oaths and allegiance, to the end for the security of the king and the whole kingdom, and do accordingly conceive ourselves wholly bound to obey the commands of his majesty, signified by both Houses of parliament; and are resolved, by God's help, to keep this city accordingly." After these preliminaries, the siege was resolutely undertaken by the army, and at last resolutely sustained by the citizens and garrison.

When intelligence of the siege of Gloucester arrived in London, the consternation among the inhabitants was as great as if the enemy were already at their gates. The rapid progress of the royalists threatened the parliament with immediate subjection: the factions and discontentments among themselves in the city, and throughout the neighbouring counties, augmented some dangerous division or insurrection. Those parliamentary leaders, it must be owned, who had introduced such mighty innovations in the English constitution, and who had projected so much greater, had not engaged in an enterprise of so little moment. The courage and capacity. Great vigour, from the beginning, as well as wisdom, they had displayed in all their counsels; and a furious, headstrong body, broken loose from the restraint of laws, had hitherto been retained in subjection under their authority, and firmly united by zeal and passion, as by the most legal and established government. A small committee, on whom the two Houses devoted their power, had directed all their military operations, and they preserved their severest discipline, and a proper spirit in execution, beyond what the king, notwithstanding the advantages possessed by a single leader, had ever been able to attain. Sensible that no jealousy was by their partisans entertained against them, they had on all occasions and in every instance counteracted every design that any of the royalists, even during the pressing exigencies of war, could with patience endure in their sovereign. Whoever incurred their displeasure, or was exposed to their suspicion, was committed to prison, and prosecuted under the notion of delinquency: after all the old jails were full, many new ones were erected; and even the ships were crowded with the royalists, both gentry and clergy, who languished below decks, and penned in those unhealthy confinements: they imposed taxes, the heaviest, and of the most unusual nature, by an ordinance of the two Houses: they voted a commission for sequestrations; and they seized, wherever they had power, the revenues of all the king's parts:* and knowing that all these, and all their adherents, were, by resisting the prince, exposed to the penalties of law, they resolved, by a severe administration, to overcome these enemies, and to retain the people in obedience, by some means or other. In the beginning of this summer, a combination, formed against them in London, had obliged them to exert the plenitude of their authority.

Edmund Waller, the first refiner of English versification, was a member of the lower House; a man of considerable fortune, and not more distinguished by his poetic genius, than by his parliamentary talents, and by the politeness and elegance of his manners. His merit depended on his genius, and not on his eloquence, as of tenderness and patience in his poetry, he caught the attention of his hearers, and exerted the utmost boldness in blaming those violent counsels, by which the Commons were governed. Finding all opposition within doors to be fruitless, he endeavored to form a party without, which might oblige the parliament to accept of reasonable conditions, and restore peace to the nation. The charms of his conversation, joined to his character for courage and integrity, had procured him the entire confidence of No. thumberland, Conway, and every eminent person of either sex who resided in London. They opened their breasts to him without reserve, and exposed all the former measures of the Commons, and all the plans suggested by them, and their wishes that some expedient could be found for stopping so impetuous a career. Tomkms, Waller's brother-in-law, and Chaloner, the intimate friend of Tomkms, had entertained like sentiments: and, finding the same resolutions in the noblemen of the city, they informed Waller, that the same abhorrence of war prevailed there, among all men of reason and moderation. Upon reflection it seemed impracticable, that a combination might be formed between the Lords and citizens; and, by mutual concert, the illegal taxes be refused, which the parliament, without the royal assent, imposed on the people. While this affair was in agitation, and lists were making as such as they conceived to be well affected to their design, a servant of Tomkms, who had overheard their discourse, immediately carried intelligence to Pym, Waller, Tomkms, and Chaloner were seized, and after some trial, were convicted, and condemned, and the two latter executed on gibbets erected before their own doors. A covenant, as a test, was taken by the Lords and Commons, and imposed on their army, and on all who lived within their quarters. Besides resolving to amend and reform their laws, the convention there vowed, that they will never lay down their arms so long as the papists, now in open war against the parliament, shall, by force of arms, be protected from justice; they express their abhorrence of the late conspiracy; and they promise to assist to the utmost the forces raised by both Houses, against the forces levied by the king.

Waller, as soon as imprisoned, sensible of the great danger into which he had fallen, was so seized with the dread of death, that all his former spirit deserted him; and, in a manner, he knew, without springing his most intimate friends, without regard to the circumference reposed in him, without distinguishing between the negligence of familiar conversation, and the schemes of a regular conspiracy. With the most profound dissimulation, before the relation was put off, out of mere Christian compulsion, till he might recover the use of his understanding. He invited visits from the ruling clergy of all sects; and while he expressed his own penitence, he received their devout exhortations with humility and reverence, as conveying clearer conviction and information than in his life he had ever before attained. Presents too, of which, as well as of flattery, these holy men were not insensible, were distributed among them; as a small retribution for their prayers and ghostly counsel. And by all these artifices, more than from any regard to the beauty of his genius, of which, during that time of furious cont and faction, small account would be made, he prevailed so far as to have his life spared, and a fine of ten thousand pounds accepted in lieu of it.

The severity exercised against the conspirators, or rather project, of Waller, induced the author of the convention, and seemed to insure them against like attempts for the future. But by the progress of the king's arms, the defeat of Sir William Waller, the taking of Bristol, the sack of Gloucester, a cry for peace was renewed, and with more violence than ever. Crowds of women, with a petition for that purpose, flocked about the House, and were so clamorous and importunate, that orders were given to disperse them; and some of them were killed in the fray. Bedford, Holland, and Conway, had deserted the parliament, and had gone to Oxford; Clare and Lovelace had followed them. Northumberland had retired to his country-seat: Essex himself showed extreme dissatisfaction, and exhorted the parliament to make peace. The upper House sent down terms of accommodation more moderate than had hitherto been insisted on. It even passed, by a majority among the Commons, that these proposals should be transmitted to the king. The resolute took the alarm. A petition against peace was framed in the city, and presented by Pennington, the factious mayor. Multitudes attended him, and renewed the cry for peace. The pulpits thundered, and rumours were spread of twenty thousand Irish, who had landed, and were to cut the throat of every protestant. The majority was again turned to the other side; and all thoughts of sacrifice being dropped, every man was desirous of seeing the king restored, and for the immediate relief of Gloucester, on which the parliament was sensible all their hopes of success in the war did so much depend.

Masses, resolute to make a vigorous defence, and having under his command a city and garrison ambitious of the crown of martyrdom, had hitherto maintained the siege with courage and abilities, and had much retarded the advances of the king's army. By continual sallies he infested them in their trenches, and gained sudden advantages over them: by disputing every inch of ground, he repressed the vigour and alacrity of their courage, elated by former successes. He had, however, been reduced to the last extremity; and he failed not, from time to time, to inform the parliament, that, unless speedily relieved, he should be necessitated, from the extreme want of provisions and ammunition, to open his gates to the enemy.

The parliament, in order to repair their broken condition, and put themselves in a posture of defence, now exerted to the utmost their power and authority. They voted that an army should be levied under Sir William Waller, whom, notwithstanding his misfortunes, they loaded with extraordinary careness. Having associated in their cause the counties of Hertford, Essex, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Lincoln, and Huntingdon, they gave the Earl of Manchester a commission to be general of their association, and appointed an army to be moved under his command. But, above all, they were intent that Essex's army, on which their whole fortune depended, should be put in a condition of marching against the king. They expected fresh their preparations to furious declamations against the royal cause. They even employed the expedient of pressing, though abashed by a late law, for which they had strenuously contended. And they engaged the king's army and four regiments of militia to the relief of Gloucester. All shops, meanwhile, were ordered to be shut; and every man expected, with the utmost anxiety, the event of that important enterprise. Essex, carrying with him a well-appointed army of 14,000 men, took the road of Bedford and Leicester; and though inferior in cavalry, yet by the mere force of conduct and discipline, he passed over those open campaign countries, and defended himself from the enemy's horse, who had advanced to meet him; and who infested him during his whole march. As he approached to Gloucester, the king was obliged to raise the siege, and open the way for Essex to enter that city. The necessities of the extreme of powder and their whole stock of ammunition remaining; and their other provisions were in the same proportion. Essex had brought with him military stores; and the neighbouring commons were supplied for the wants of the army. The inhabitants had carefully conveyed all provisions from the king's army, and pretending to be quite exhausted, had reserved their stores for that cause which they so much favoured. The enemy actually remained. Essex dreaded a battle with the king's army, on account of its great superiority in cavalry; and he resolved to return, if possible, without running that hazard. He lay five days at Tewkesbury, which was the first stage after reaching Gloucester; and he signified, by some preparations, to point towards Worcester. By a forced march during the night, he reached Cirencester, and obtained the double advantage of passing unmolested an open country, and of surprising a convoy of provisions which lay in that town. Without delay he proceeded towards London; but when he reached Newbury, he was surprised to find that the king, by hasty marches, had arrived before him, and was already posted to the north.

An action was now unavoidable; and Battle of Newbury. Essex prepared for it with presence of mind, and not without military conduct. On both sides, the battle was fought with great spirit and a steady bravery. Essex's horse were several times broken by the king's, but his infantry maintained themselves in firm array; and, besides giving a continued fire, they presented an invincible rampart of pikes against the furious shock of Prince Rupert, and those gallant troops of genius, of which the royal cavalry was chiefly composed. The militia of London especially, though utterly unequalled with action, though drawn but a few days before from their ordinary occupations, yet having learned all military exercises, and being animated with unconquerable zeal for the cause in which they were engaged, equalled, on this occasion, what could be expected from the most experienced and well-trained troops. While the armies were engaged with the utmost ardour, night put an end to the action, and left the victory undecided. Next morning, Essex proceeded on his march; and though his rear was once put in some disorder by an incursion of the king's horse, he reached London in safety, and received applause for his conduct and success in the whole enterprise. The king followed him on his march; and having taken possession of the town were several days after, he placed the royal standard, sent the garrison; and straitened, by that means, London, and the quarters of the enemy.

In the battle of Newbury, on the part of the king, besides the Earls of Sunderland and Carnewar, two noblemen of promising hopes, was unfortunately slain, to the regret of every lover of ingenuity and virtue throughout the kingdom, Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland, secretary of state, was not numbering amongst the victims committed by this man, devoted to the pursuits of learning, and to the society of all the polite and elegant, who, having enjoyed himself in every pleasure, which a fine genius, a generous disposition, and an opulent fortune could afford. Called into public life, he stood foremost in all attacks on the high pretensions of the crown; and displayed that masculine eloquence, and undaunted love of liberty, which, from his intimate acquaintance with the sublime spirits of antiquity, he had greatly admired. His preparations proceeded to extremities, and it became requisite for him to choose his side; he tempered the ardour of his zeal, and embraced the defence of those limited powers which remained to monarchy, and which he deemed necessary for the support of the English constitution. Still anxious, however, for his country, he seems to have dreaded the too prosperous success of his own party, as much as of the enemy; and, among his intimate friends, often, after a deep silence and frequent nights, he would, with a sad accent, reiterate the word, Peace. In excuse for the too free exposing of his person, which seemed unsuitable in a secretary of state, he alleged, that it became him to be more active in the service of his prince, and less impatient for peace might bear the imputation of cowardice or pusillanimity. From the commencement of the war, his natural cheerfulness and vivacity became clouded; and he was seen, some of the most distinguished of his friends, by his birth and station, gave way to a negligence which was easily observable. On the morning of the battle in which he fell, he had shown some care of adorning his person; and gave for a reason, that the enemy should not find his body the easier by any slowness; and "I am weary," subjoined he, "of the times, and foresee much misery to my country; but believe, that I shall be out of it ere night." This excellent person was but thirty-four years of age, and having given up his life.

The loss sustained on both sides in the battle of Newbury, and the advanced season, obliged the armies to retire into winter quarters.

In the north, during the summer, the great Acton in the interest and popularity of the Earl, now north. created Marquis, of Newcastle, had raised a considerable force for the king; and great hopes of success were entertained from that quarter. There appeared New Castle, in opposition to him, two men, one, the event of the war finally depended, and who began about this time to be remarked for their valour and military conduct. These were Sir Thomas Fairfax, son of the lord of that name, and Oliver, the Viscount Fairfax. The former advantage at Wakefield, after a detraction of royalists, and took General Goring prisoner; the latter obtained a victory at Garwood, after a party commanded by the gallant Cavendish, who perished in the action. But being these defeats of the royalists were more than sufficiently compensated by the total rout of Lord Fairfax at Thaston moor, and the dispersal of his army. After this victory, Newcastle, with an army of 15,000 men, sat down before Hull. Hotham was no longer governor of that place. That gentleman and his son, partly from a jealousy entertained of Lord Fairfax, partly repeating of their engagements against the king, had entered into a correspondence with Newcastle, and had expressed an interest in him. But being Hull into his hands. But their conspiracy being detected, they were arrested and sent prisoners to London; where, without any regard to their former services, they fell, both of them, victims to the severity of the punishment.

Newcastle, having carried on the attack of Hull for some time, was best off by a sally of the garrison, and suffered so much, that he thought proper to raise the siege. About the lesson there, it is observable, that the eastern associated counties, having joined Cromwell and young Fairfax, obtained a considerable victory over the royalists at Horncastle; where the two officers last mentioned gained renown by their conduct and gallantry. And though fortune had thus balanced her favours, the king's party still remained much superior in those parts of England; and had it not been for the garrison of Hull, which kept Yorkshire in awe, a conjunction of the northern counties might have declared for it. As it was, the south might have been made, and had probably enabled the king, instead of entering on the unfortunate, perhaps imprudent, enterprise of Gloucester, to march directly to London, and put an end to the war.

While the military enterprises were carried on with vigour in England, and the event became every day more doubtful, both parties cast their eyes towards the neighbouring kingdoms, and afforded assistance to the issuing of royal proclamations in which their own forces were compared with such furious opposition. The parliament had recourse to Scotland; the King to Ireland.

When the Scottish covenanters obtained that end, for which they so earnestly contended, the establishment of presbyterian discipline in their own country, they were not satisfied, but indulged still an ardent passion for propagating, by all methods, that mode of religion in the neighbouring kingdoms. Has King Charles in the fervour of their zeal, that, by supernatural assistance, they should be enabled to carry their triumphant covenant to the gates of Rome itself, it behoved them first to render it prevalent in England, which already showed so great a disposition of heart in its north: But how, when the people perceived, they expressed a desire of uniformity in worship with England; and the king, employing general expressions, had approved of this inclination, as pious and laudable. No sooner was there an appearance of a rapture, than the English parliament, in order to allure that nation into a close confederacy, openly declared their wishes of ecclesiastical reformation, and of imitating the example of their northern brethren. When war was actually commenced, the same artifices were used; and the Scots beheld, with the utmost impatience, a scene of action, of which they could not deem themselves indifferent spectators. Should the king, they said, be able, by force of arms, to prevail over the parliament of England, and re-establish his authority in that powerful kingdom, he will undoubtedly retract all those concessions, which, with so many circumstances of violence and indignity, the Scots have extorted from him. Besides a sense of his own interest, and a regard to royal power, which has been entirely annihilated in this country; his very passion for prelacy and for religious ceremonies must lead him to invade a church which he has ever been taught to regard as antichristian and corrupt. The commission that compose the factions now so furiously engaged in arms. Does not the parliament consist of those very men who have ever opposed all war with Scotland, who have particular causes to fear the conversion of which they have obtained the redress of every grievance, and who, with many honourable expressions, have conferred on us an ample reward for our brethren? And is not the court full of papists, prelates, malignants; all of them zealous enemies to our religious model, and resolute to sacrifice their lives for their idolatrous establishments? Not to mention our own necessary security; can we better express our gratitude to Heaven for that pure light with which we are, above all nations, so eminently distinguish ed, than by conveying the same divine knowledge to our unhappy neighbours, who are wading through a sea of blood in order to attain it? These were, in Scotland, the topics of every conversation; with these doctrines the pulpit echoed; and the famous curse of Meroz, that curse so solemnly denounced and reiterated against neutrality and moderation, resounded from all quarters.

The parliament of England had ever invited the Scots, from the commencement of the civil dissensions, to interfere their mediation, which, they knew, would be so little favourable to the king; and the king, for that very reason, had ever endeavoured, with the least offensive expressions, to make the English convinced of his sincerity, and his readiness to communicate with any of their demands. The commissioners, accordingly, were sent to London, to desire that court to afford to the king the same encouragements that are granted to the other sovereigns of Europe; and that it would take the same steps in the reformation of religion, as are employed with the most religious states in the formation of the same. Nor was this commission the least doubt with regard to his own principles, and who knew of a much better way to reduce opponents than by employing any theological topics, absolutely refused all dissertation or controversy. The English divines went away full of admiration at the blind assurance and boasted prejudices of the man; he, on his part, was moved with equal wonder at their obstinate attachment to such palpable errors and delusions. By the concessions which the king had granted to Scotland, it became necessary for him to summon a parliament once in three years; and in June of the subsequent year, was fixed the period for the meeting of that assembly. Before that time elapsed, Charles flattered himself that he should be able, by some decisive advantage, to reduce the English parliament to a reasonable submission, and might then expect, with security, the meeting of a Scottish parliament. Though earnestly solicited by London to summon that great council of the nation, he absolutely refused to give authority to men who had already excited such dangerous commotions, and who showed still the same disposition to resist and invade his authority. The commissioners were not being heard, either in any of their demands, desired the king's passport for London, where they proposed to confer with the English parliament; and being likewise denied this request, they returned with extreme disappointment to Edinburgh.

The office of conservators of the peace was newly erected in Scotland, in order to maintain the confederacy between the two kingdoms; and these, instigated by the clergy, were resolved, since they could not obtain the king's consent, to summon, in his name, by their own authority, a convention of states; and to conceive their sovereign of this article, the only one which remained of his prerogative. Under colour of procuring for national peace, endangered by the neighbourhood of English armies, was a convention called; an assembly which, though it meets with less solemnity, has the same authority as a parliament, in raising money and levying forces. Hamilton, and his brother the Earl of Lauderdale, who had been sent into Scotland in order to oppose these measures, wanted either authority or sincerity; and passively yielded to the torrent. The general assembly of the church met at the same time with the commission that his attachment to episcopacy, though partly founded on religious principles, was also, in his situation, derived from the assumed views of the English policy. In such a crisis, it was easy for the king by his humble and earnest but by the inhabitants itself; because they came not in the help of the Lord, in the battle of the Lord's arm. Judges, chap. vi., v. 18.

The different sorts of manuscripts, preserved in the British Museum, and published by Mrs. Macaulay, vol. iv. p. 480, he says, unless removed by the commissioners, had not been looked upon as of the highest importance. I suppose the great establishment of the church was absolutely established, the king would have but small comfort at the news. That reason show's the king's good sense, and proves that his attachment to episcopacy, though partly founded on religious principles, was also, in his situation, derived from the assumed views of the English policy. In such a crisis, it was easy for the king by his humble and earnest but by the inhabitants itself; because they came not in the help of the Lord, in the battle of the Lord's arm. vention, and exercising an authority almost absolute over the whole civil power, made every political consideration yield to their theological zeal and prejudices.

The English parliament was, at that time, fallen into great distress, by the progress of the royal arms; and they gladly sent to Edinburgh commissioners, with ample powers, to treat of a nearer union and confederacy with the Scottish nation. The persons employed were the Earl of Hamilton, the Earl of Argyll, young Thomas, Hatcher, and Henry Darley, attended by Marshal and Nye, two clergymen of signal ability. In this negotiation, the man chiefly trusted was Vane, who, in eloquence, address, capacity, wits, or manner, was not surpassed by any one, even during that age, so famous for active talents. By his persuasion, whatever league and covenant, which effected all former protestations and vows taken in both kingdoms; and long maintained its credit and authority. In this covenant, the subscribers, besides engaging mutually to defend each other against all opponents, bound themselves to endeavour, without respect of persons, the extirpation of popery and prelacy, superstition, heresy, schism, and profaneness; to maintain the rights and privileges of parliaments, together with the king's authority; and to discover and punish all unlawfulness and malpractices.

The subscribers of the covenant vowed also to preserve the reformed religion established in the church of Scotland; but, by the article of Vane, no declaration more explicit was made with regard to England and Ireland, than that they would support the government, and the country, by whose means God had been preserved, and the people expect to obtain so considerable a reinforcement as the accession of the Scottish nation, was received without opposition. The parliament, therefore, having first subscribed it themselves, they all long imagined it would be received by all who lived under their authority.

Great were the rejoicings among the Scots, that they should be the happy instruments of extending their mode of religion, and dissatisfying that profound darkness in which the neighbouring nations were involved. The general assembly applauded this glorious imitation of the pravity displayed by their ancestors, who, they said, in three different applications, during the reign of Elizabeth, had endeavoured to engage the English, by persuasion, to lay aside the use of the surplus, tippet, and corncape. The convention too, in the height of their zeal, ordered every one to swear to this covenant, under the penalty of confiscation, besides what further punishment it should please the ensuing parliament to inflict on the refusers, as enemies to God, to the king, and to the kingdom. And being determined that the sword should carry conviction to all re-

prises. By means of a hundred thousand pounds, which they received from England; by the hopes of alliance with all parties; not to mention their favourble disposition towards the cause; they soon completed their levies. And, having added to their other forces the troops which they had recurred from Ireland, they were ready, about the end of the year, to enter England, under the command of their old general, the Earl of Leven, with an army of above twenty thousand men. After the commencement of the Irish insurrection, the English parliament, though they undertook the suppression of it, had ever been too much engrossed with other affairs to be able to finish the enterprise, to take any effectual step towards finishing that enterprise. They had entered, indeed, into a contract with the Scots, for sending over an army of ten thousand men into Ireland; and, in order to engage that nation in this undertaking, besides giving a present of pay, they agreed to put Carieferges into their hands, and to invest their general with an authority quite independent of the Eng- lish government. These troops, so long as they were allowed to remain, were useful, by diverting the force of the Irish rebels, and protecting in the north the small remnants of the British planters. But, except this contract with the Scottish nation, all the other measures of the parliament were devoted rather to the prejudice of the Protestant cause in Ireland. By continuing their violent persecution, and still more violent menaces against priests and papists, they confirmed the Irish catholics in their rebellion, and cut off all hopes of a reconciliation to the end, and thereby, beforehand all the Irish forswore to subscribers or adventurers, they rendered all men of property desperate, and seemed to threaten a total extirpation of the natives. And while they, thus infused zeal and animosity into the enemy, no measure was pursued which could tend to support or encourage the protestants, now reduced to the last extremities.

So great a descendant which, from a long course of successes, the English has acquired over the Irish nation, that though the latter, when they receive military discipline among foreigners, are not surprised by any troops, they had never, in their own country, been able to make a vigorous effort for the defence or recovery of their liberties. In many encounters, the English under Lord More, Sir William St. Leger, Sir Frederic Hamilton, and others, had, though under great disadvantages of situation and numbers, being able to regain or recover the dominion of Dublin. The rebels raised the siege of Tredagh, after an inestimable defence made by the garrison. Ormond had obtained two complete victories at Kilarus and Ross; and his army had hitherto been placed, or relieved or blockaded in different parts of the kingdom of England, and the fourth part of one small vessel's lodging. Dublin, to 'save itself from starving, had been obliged to send the greater part of its inhabitants to England. The army had been little ammunition, scarcely exceeding forty barrels of gunpowder; and the Irish to recompense the English, and the soldiers had been obliged to eat their own horses. And though the distress of the Irish was not much inferior to that of their neighbours, it was but a melancholy reflection, that the soldiers should make desolate that fertile island, which might serve to the subsistence and happiness of both.

The justice and council of Ireland, and for the most part employed chiefly by the interest and authority of Ormond, to fall into an entire dependence on the king. Parsons, Temple, Loftus, and Meredith, who favoured the opposite party, had been removed; and Charles had supplied their place by others better affected to his service. A committee of the English House of Commons, which had been sent over to Ireland, in order to conduct the affairs of that kingdom, had been excluded the council, in obedience to the orders from the King. These were reasons sufficient, besides the great difficulties under which they themselves laboured, why the parliament was unwilling to send supplies to an army, which, though engaged in a cause much favoured by them, was commanded by their declared enemies. They even interdicted some small succours sent thither by the king.

The king, as he had neither money, arms, ammunition, nor provisions, to spare from his own urgent wants, resolved to supply them with as much as their means, and the necessities of the Irish Protestants, contributed to the advancement of his affairs in England. A truce with the rebels, he thought, would enable his subjects in Ireland to provide for their own support, and would procure him the assistance of the army against the English parliament. But as a treaty with a people, so odious for their barbarities, and still more for their religion, must be repugnant to the refined susceptibilities of those calamities with which he had been loaded; it was necessary to proceed with great caution in conducting that measure. A remonstrance from the army was made to the Irish council, representing their necessity, and the king’s permission to leave the kingdom: and if that were refused, we must have recourse, they said, to that first and primary law, with which God had endowed all men; we mean the law of nature, which teaches every creature to preserve itself. Memorials both to the king and parliament were transmitted by the justices and council, in which their wants and dangers are strongly set forth; and though the general expressions in these memorials might perhaps be suspected of exaggeration, yet from the particular facts mentioned, from the confession of the English parliament itself, and from the very nature of things, it is apparent that the Irish provincials were reduced to the last exigency, and the monarch, if not absolutely necessary, to embrace some expedient, which might secure them, for a time, from the ruin and misery with which they were threatened.

Accordingly, the king gave orders to Ormond and the justices to conclude, for a year, a cessation of arms with the council of Kilkenny, by which the Irish were governed, and to leave both sides in possession of their present advantages. The parliament, whose business it was to find fault with every measure adopted by the opposite party, and who would not lose so fair an opportunity of reproaching the king with his favour to the Irish papists, exclaimed loudly against this cessation. Among others, it was said, the king by it had left the Irish, which England might justly dread, for tolerating antichristian idolatry, on pretence of civil contracts and political agreements. Religion, though every day employed as the engine of their own ambitious purposes, was supposed too sacred to be yielded up to the temporal interests or safety of kingdoms.

After the cessation, there was little necessity, as well as no means, of subduing the army in Ireland. The king ordered Ormond, who was entirely devoted to him, to send over considerable bodies of it to England. Most of them continued in his service; but a small part, having imbibed in Ireland a strong animosity against the catholics, and hearing the king’s party universally reproached with popery, soon after deserted to the parliament.

Some Irish catholics came over with these troops, and joined the royal army, where they continued the same conduct, and discourse, which they had been accustomed to. The parliament voted that no quarter, in any action, should ever be given them: but Prince Rupert, by making some reprisals, soon repressed this insubordination.

CHARLES I.

The king had hitherto, during the course of the war, obtained many advantages over his enemies, and raised himself from that low condition into which he had at first fallen, to be nearly upon an equal footing with his adversaries. Yorkshire, and all the northern counties, were reduced by the Marquis of Newcastle; and, excepting Hull, the parliament was master of no garrison in that quarter. The west of the Plym alone, having been in vain besieged by Prince Maurice, resisted the king’s authority: and had it not been for the disappointment in the enterprise of Gloucester, the royal garrisons had reached, without interruption, from one end of the kingdom to the other; and had occupied a greater extent of ground than those of the parliament. Many of the royalists flattered themselves that the same vigorous spirit which had elevated them to the momentous height of power, would still favour their progress, and obtain them a final victory over their enemies: but those who judged more soundly observed, that besides the accession of the whole Scotch nation to the same of the parliament, the very principle on which the royal supremacy had been founded was every day acquired, more and more, by the opposite party. The king’s troops, full of gentry and nobility, had exerted a valour superior to their enemies, and had hitherto been successful in almost every encounter: but, in proportion as the whole nation came within the circle of civil discord, the advantage was more equally shared; and superior numbers, it was expected, must at length obtain the victory. The king’s troops also, ill paid, and destitute of every necessary, could not possibly be retained in equal discipline with the parliamentary forces, to whom all supplies were furnished from unusual sources, and to whom the box revenue, from the number of men, and the nature of their service, would enable them to endure the most extreme privations, and the severest calamities. The king’s officers indulged themselves even in greater licences than those to which, during times of peace, they had been accustomed, they were apt, both to neglect their military duty, and to set a pernicious example of disorder to the soldiers under their command.

At the commencement of the civil war all Englishmen, who served abroad, had been ordered to be treated with extraordinary respect: and most of them, being descended of good families, and, by reason of their absence, unacquainted with the new principles which depressed the dignity of the crown, had enlisted under the royal standard. But it is observable that, though the military profession requires great genius and long experience in the principal commanders, all its subordinate duties may be discharged by ordinary talents, and from superficial practice. Citizens and country gentlemen soon became excellent officers, and the generals of greatest fame and capacity happened, all of them, to spring up on the side of the parliament. The courtiers and great nobility, in the other party, checked the growth of an extraordinary genius among the subordinate officers; and every man there, as in a regular established government, was confined to the station in which his birth had placed him.

The king, that he might make preparations, during winter, for the ensuing campaign, summoned to Oxford all the members of either House, who adhered to his interests; and endeavoured to avail himself of the name of parliament, so passionately cherished by the English nation. The House of Peers was pretty full; and besides the nobility employed in different parts of the kingdom, it contained twice as many members as commonly voted at Westminster. The House of Commons consisted of about 140; which amounted not to above half of the other House of Commons. So extremely light had government bitherto lain upon the people, that the very name of excise was unknown to them; and among other evils arising from these domestic wars, was the introduction of that impost into England. The parliament at Westminster having voted an excise of 10,000 pounds, wine, and other commodities; those at Oxford imitated the example, and conferred that revenue on the king. And, in order to enable him the better to recruit his army, they granted him another sum of 10,000 pounds, by way of loan upon the subject. The king circuited penny seals, countersigned by the speakers of both Houses, requiring the loan of particular sums from such persons as lived within his quarters. Neither party had as yet got above the perplexity of reproaching their antagonists with these illegal measures.

The Westminster parliament passed a whimisical ordinance, commanding all the inhabitants of London and the neighbourhooe to reënch a meal a week; and to pay the value of it for the support of the public cause. It is easily imagined, that provided the money were paid, they troubled themselves but little about the execution of their ordinance, or the support of the state.

Such was the king's situation, that, in order to restore peace to the nation, he had no occasion to demand any other terms than the restorine of the laws and constitution; these he more than once, and ever hereafter, enjoyed by his predecessors; and the re-establishing, on its ancient basis, the whole frame of government, civil as well as ecclesiastical. And, that he might facilitate an end seemingly so desirable, he offered to employ means equivalent to an universal act of oblivion, and a toleration or indulgence to tender consciences. Nothing, therefore, could contribute more to his interests than every discourse of peace, and every discussion of the conditions upon which that blessing could be obtained. For this reason, he solicited a treaty on all occasions, and desired a conference and mutual examination of pretensions, even when he entertained no hopes that any conclusion could possibly result from it.

For like reasons, the parliament prudently avoided, as much as possible, all advances towards negotiation, and were cautious not to expose too easily to encroach those high terms which their apprehensions or their ambition made them previously demand of the king. Though their partisans were blinded with the thickest veil of religious prejudices, they dreaded to bring their pretensions to the test, or lay them open before the whole nation. In opposition to the policy of the king, the venerable precedents of many ages, the popular leaders were ashamed to plead nothing but fears and jealousies, which were not avowed by the constitution, and for which neither the personal character of Charles, so full of virtue, nor his situation, so deprived of all independent authority, seemed to afford any reasonable foundation. Grievances which had been fully redressed; powers, either legal or illegal, which had been entirely renounced; it seemed onopular, and invidious, and ungrateful, any further to insist on.

The king, that he might abate the universal vexation paid to the name of parliament, had issued a declaration, in which an act was set for, to call all the members which had been in both Houses had been driven from London; and he thence inferred, that the assembly at Westminster was no longer a free parliament, and till its liberties were restored, was entitled to no authority. As this declaration was an obstacle to all treaty, some contravance seems requisite, in order to elude it.

A letter was written in the foregoing spring, to the Earl of Essex, and subscribed by the prince, the Duke of York, and the Duke of Marlborouh, which having been sent to, and his partisans in both Houses had been driven from London; and he thence inferred, that the assembly at Westminster was no longer a free parliament, and till its liberties were restored, was entitled to no authority. unwarrantable enterprises. Manchester, having taken Lincoln, had united his army to that of Leven and Fairfax; and York was now closely besieged by their combined forces. That town, though vigorously defended by Newcastle, was reduced to extremity; and the parliamentary generals, Herbert and Talfourd, who had raised a considerable number of troops in the country, determined that all their labours would at last be crowned by this important conquest. On a sudden, they were alarmed by the approach of Prince Rupert. This gallant commander, having vigorously suppressed a mutiny in the army of the king, had raised a considerable body of troops, and marched into Leicestershire, had hastened to the relief of York, with an army of 20,000 foot and 2000 horse. The Scotts and parliamentary generals raised the siege, and, drawing up on Marston-moor, purposed to give battle to the royalists. Prince Rupert approached the town by another quarter, and, enjoining the river Ouse between him and the enemy, safely joined his forces to those of Newcastle. The Marquis endeavoured to persuade him, that, having so successfully effected his purpose, he ought to be content with the present advantages, and leave the enemy, now much diminished by their losses, and discouraged by their ill success, to deliberate mutual dissensions which had begun to take place among them. The prince, whose martial disposition was not sufficiently tempered with prudence, nor softened by complaisance, precipitated positive orders from the king, without designating the place, and raising up the slender resources of which he was possessed. In the eastern association, they levied fourteen thousand men, under the Earl of Manchester, seconded by Cromwell. An army of ten thousand men, under Essex, another of nearly the same force under Waller, were assembled in the neighbourhood of London. The former was destined to oppose the king; the latter was appointed to march into west, where, if Maurice, with a small army which went continually to decay, was spending his time to vain before Lyme, an incommoding town upon the sea-coast. The utmost efforts of the king could not raise above ten thousand men at Oxford; and on their sword chiefly, during the campaign, were these to depend for subsistence. The queen, terrified with the dangers which every way environed her, and afraid of being enclosed in Oxford, in the middle of the kingdom, fled to Exeter, where she hoped to be delivered unmolested of the child with which she was now pregnant, and whence she had the means of an easy escape into France, if pressed by the forces of the enemy. She knew not a feasible means of contriving her escape but that of mortifying her religion and her credit with the king, had all along borne her. Last summer the Commons had sent up to the Peers an impeachment of high treason against her; because, in his utmost distresses, she had insulted the nation's laws, and opposed the airy of the court, so that she had bought in Holland. Had she fallen into their hands, neither her sex, she knew, nor high station, could protect her against insults, at least, if not danger, from those haughty republicans, who so little affected to conduct themselves by the maxims of gallantry and politeness.

From the beginning of these dispositions, the parliament, it is remarkable, had, in all things, assumed an extreme ascendancy over their sovereign, and had displayed a violence, and arrogated an authority, which, on his side, would not have been compatible either with his temper or his situation. While he spoke perpetually of pardoning all rebels; they talked of nothing but the punishment of delinquents and malignants: while he offered a toleration and indulgence to tender consciences: they threatened the utter extirpation of prelacy; to his professions of loyalty, they opposed declensions of treason: and the more the ancient tenor of the laws inculcated a respectfull subordination to the crown, the more careful were they, by their lofty pretensions, to cover that defect under which they laboured. The great advantages in the north seemed to second their ambition, and finally to promise them success in their fugitives were oppressive to his natural indulgence. Magnificent and generous in his expense; polite and elegant in his taste; courteous and humane in his behaviour; he brought a great accession of friends and of credit to the party which he embraced. But amidst all the hurry of action, he never was known to close with the arts of peace, in which he took delight; and the charms of poetry, music, and conversation, often stole from him to the rougher occupancies. He chose Sir William Daventry, an ingenious poet, for his lieutenant-general; for persons, in whose place, he placed confidence, were more the instruments of his refined pleasures, than qualified for the business which they undertook: and the severity and application, requisite to the support of discipline, were qualities which he was entirely wanting in.

When Prince Rupert, contrary to his advice, resolved on this battle, and issued all orders, without communicating his intentions to him, he took the field, but, he said, merely as a volunteer, and, except by his personal courage, which shone out with lustre, he had no share in the action. Enraged to find that all his successful labours were rendered abortive by one act of fatal temerity, trivialized with the prospect of renewing his name, and falling again into hands he had so long toiled to save from ruin; few resources remained to a desperate cause, and thought that the same regard to honour, which had at first called him to arms, now required him to abandon a party, where he met with such disastrous defeat. Nor did he scruple to utter the word to the prince that he was instantly to leave the kingdom; and, without delay, he went to Scarborough, where he found a vessel, which carried him beyond sea. During the ensuing years, till the Restoration, he lived abroad in great necessity, and, with indifference, his opulent fortune sequestered by those who assumed the government of England. He disdained, by submission or composition, to show obedience to these usurpers; and the least favourable censures of his character allowed, that the fidelity and services of a whole life had sufficiently atoned for one rash action into which his passion had betrayed him.

Prince Rupert, with equal precipitation, drew off the remains of his army, and retired into Lancashire. Glenham, in a few days, was obliged to surrender York; and he marched out his garrison with all the honours of war. Lord Fairfax, remaining in the city, established his government in that whole county, and sent a thousand horse into Lancashire, to join with the parliamentary forces in that quarter, and attend the motions of Prince Rupert: the English army marched north, to take the Earl of Carlisle, who was advancing with ten thousand additional forces; and to reduce the town of Newcastle, which they took by storm; the Earl of Manchester, with Cromwell, to whom the fame of unhasting victory was chiefly ascribed, and who was wounded in the action, returned to the eastern association, in order to recruit his army.

While these events passed in the north, the king's affairs in the south were conducted with more success and greater abilities. Rotherham, a Scotchman, who had been created Earl of Brentford, acted under the king, as general.

The parliament soon completed their two armies commanded by Essex and Waller. The great zeal of the city facilitated this undertaking. Many speeches were made to the citizens by the parliamentary leaders, in order to excite their ardour. Hollis, in particular, exhorted them not to spare, on this important occasion, either their purses, their persons, or their prayers; and, in general, it must be confessed, they were sufficiently liberal in all these contributions. The two generals had orders to march with their combined armies towards Oxford; and, if the king retired into that city, to lay siege to it, and by one enterprise put a period to the war. The king, leaving a numerous garrison in Oxford, passed with dexterity between the two armies, which had taken Abingdon, and had enclosed him on both sides. He marched towards Worcester; and Waller received orders from Essex to follow him and watch his motions; while he himself marched into the west in quest of Prince Maurice. Waller had approached within two miles of the royal camp, and was only separated from it by the Severn, when he received intelligence that the king was advanced to Bewdley, and had directed his course to the north. Waller presently dislodged, and hastened by quick marches to that town; while the king suddenly returned upon his own footsteps, reached Oxford; and having reinforced his army from the garrison, marched out in quest of Waller. The two armies faced each other at Cropredy-bridge near Banbury; but the Carwell ran between them. Next day the king decamped, and marched towards Daventry. Waller offered to pass his whole retinue to pass the bridge, with an intention of falling on the rear of the royalists. He was repulsed, routed, and pursued with considerable loss. Stunned and disheartened with this blow, his army decayed and melted away by desertion; and the king thought he might safely leave it, and march westward against Essex. That general, having obliged Prince Maurice to raise the siege of Lyme, having taken Wermouth and Taunton, was with his forces, and met, with no equal opposition. The king followed them, and having reinforced his army from all quarters, appeared in the field with an army superior to the enemy. Essex, retreating into Cornwall, informed the parliament of his danger, and begged early help. The king would fall on the king's rear. General Middleton received a commission to execute that service; but came too late. Essex's army, cooped up in a narrow corner at Lesthill, deprived of all forage and provisions, and seeing no prospect of succour, was reduced to the last extremity. The king pressed them on one side; Prince Maurice on another; Sir Richard Granville on a third. Essex, Roberts, and some of the principal officers, escaped in a boat to Plymouth: Balfour with a few; the king's out-posts, in a thick mist, and got safely to the garrisons of his own party. The foot under Skippon were obliged to surrender their arms, artillery, baggage, and ammunition; and being conducted to the parliament's quarters, were dismissed. By this advantage, which was much boasted of, the king, besides the honour of the enterprise, obtained what he stood extremely to need of; the parliament, having preserved the men, lost what they could easily repair.

No sooner did this intelligence reach London, than the committee of the two kingdoms voted thanks to Essex for his fidelity, courage, and conduct; and this method of proceeding was universally approved. It was observed by the parliament throughout the whole course of the war. Equally indulgent to their friends and rigorous to their enemies, they employed, with success, these two powerful engines of order and punishment, to confirmation of their authority.

That the king might have less reason to exult in the advantages which he had obtained in the west, the parliament opposed to him very numerous forces. He arrived near Essex's subdivided but not disheartened troops; they ordered Manchester and Cromwell to march with their recruited forces from the eastern association; and, joining their armies to those of Waller and Middleton, as well as of Essex's other battle to the king. Charles chose his post at Newbury, where the parliamentary armies, under the Earl of Manchester, attacked him with great vigour; and that town was a second time the scene of the bloody anniversaries of the English. Essex's soldiers, exhausting one another to repair their broken honour, and revenge the disgrace of Lesthield, made no impetuous assault on the royalists; and having recovered some of their cannon, lost in Cornwall, could not forbear embracing them with tears of joy. Though the king's troops defended themselves with valour, they were overpowered by numbers; and the night came very seasonable to their relief, and prevented a total overthrow. Charles, leaving his luggage and cannon in Dennington-castle, near Newbury, forthwith retreated to Wallingford, and thence to Oxford. There Prince Rupert and the Earl of Northampton joined hands with considerable forces of cavalry. Strengthened by this reinforcesment, he ventured to advance towards Oxford, where his army was superior to that of the king, declined an engagement, and rejected Cromwell's advice, which earnestly pressed him not to neglect so favourable an opportunity of finishing the contest. Even by leaving London from Dennington-castle, in the face of the enemy, seemed to have sufficiently repaired the honour which they had lost at Newbury; and Charles, having the satisfaction to execute, between Manchester and Cromwell, equal animosities with those which formerly took place between Essex and Waller, distributed his army into winter-quarters.

Those contests among the parliamentary generals, which had disturbed their military operations, were renewed in London during the winter season; and each being supported by his own faction, their mutual reproaches and accusations agitated the whole city. The king, and the leaders of each party, in that secret, a distinct section, which, though the dread of the king's power had hitherto suppressed it, yet, in proportion as the hopes of success became nearer and more immediate, began to discover itself with high colours and open assertions; and which, had it, at first, taken shelter and concealed itself under the wings of the Presbyterians, soon, now evidently appeared a distinct party, and betrayed very different views and pretensions. We must here endeavour to explain the genius of this party, and of its leaders, who henceforth occupy the scene of action.

During those times, when the enthusiastic spirit of the Independents was so much on the increase and encouragement, and was the immediate means of distinguishing and preferment, it was impossible to set bounds to these holy fervours, or confine, within any natural limits, what was directed towards an infinite and a supernatural object. Every man, as prompted by the warmth of his temper, excited by emulation, or supported by his habits of hypocrisy, endeavoured to distinguish himself beyond his fellows, and to arrive at a higher pitch of saintship and perfection, in proportion to its degree of sanctity, and the sect became dangerous and destructive; and as the Independents went a note higher than the presbyterians, they could less be restrained within any bounds of order. From this point of connection, as from a first principle, were derived, by a necessary consequence, all the other differences of these two sects.

The independents rejected all ecclesiastical establishments, and would admit of no spiritual courts, no government among pastors, no interposition of the magistrate in religious concerns, no fixed encouragement annexed to any system of doctrines or opinions. According to their principles, each congregation, united voluntarily and by spiritual ties, composed, within itself, a separate church, and exercised a jurisdiction, but one destitute of temporal sanctions, over its own pastor and its own members. The election alone of the congregation was sufficient to bestow the sacerdotal character; and as all essential distinctions were denied between the laity and the clergy, no ceremony, no institution, no vocation, no imposition of hands, was, as in all other churches, supposed requisite to convey a right to holy orders. The enthusiasm of the presbyterians led them to reject the authority of priests, to throw off the restraints of liturgies, to contumely ceremonies, to limit the riches and authority of the priestly office: the fanaticism of the independents, exalted to a higher pitch, abolished ecclesiastical government, disdained every system, neglected every ceremony, and confounded all ranks and orders. The soldier, the merchant, the mechanic, indulging the fervours of zeal, and guided by the illusions of the Spirit, resigned himself to an inward and superior direction, and was consecrated, in a manner, by an immediate intercourse and communication with heaven.

The catholics, pretending to an infallible guide, had justified, upon that principle, their doctrine and practice contrary to persecution: the method of clear and certain tenets as they themselves adopted, could be rejected only from a criminal and pertinacious obstinacy, had hitherto restrained to the full, their boasted zeal, and the mildness of their system, was the only produce of the extremity of the same zeal, were led into the milder principles of toleration. Their mind, set afloat in the wide sea of inspiration, could confine itself within no certain limits, in which an enthusiastic indulgence, being he was, was not, by a natural train of thinking, to permit in others. Of all christian sects this was the first, which, during its prosperity, as well as its adversity, always adopted the principle of toleration; and it is remarkable that so reasonable a doctrine owed its origin, not to reasoning, but to the height of extravagance and fanaticism.

Pepoy and prelacy alone, whose genius seemed to tend towards superstition, were treated by the independents with regard. The doctrines too of fate or destiny were deemed by them essential to all religion. In these rigid opinions, the whole sectaries, amidst all their other differences, unanimously pretended to these. The political system of the independents kept pace with their religious. Not content with confining to very narrow limits the power of the crown, and reducing the king to the rank of first magistrate, which was the project of the presbyterians, they, too, more, and even the nobles, aspiring to a total abolition of the monarchy, and even of the aristocracy, and projected an entire equality of rank and order in a republic, quite free and independent. In consequence of this scheme, they were declared Jenies to all proposals for peace, except on such terms as they knew it was impossible to obtain; and they adhered to that maxim, which, in the main, prudent and political, that whoever opposed his sovereign, should throw away the scabbard. By terrifying others with the fear of vengeance from the offended prince, they had engaged greater numbers into the opposition against peace, than had adopted their other principles with regard to government and religion. And the great success which had already attended the arms of the parliament, and the greater, which was soon expected, confirmed them still further in this obstinacy.

Sir John Vane, Oliver Cromwell, Nathaniel Fiennes, and Oliver St. John, the solicitor-general, were regarded as the leaders of the independents. The Earl of Essex, disgraced with a war, of which he began to foresee the pernicious consequences, was aden, and has recommended every reasonable plan of accommodation. The Earl of Northumberland, lord of his rank and dignity, regarded with horror a scheme which, if it took place, would confound himself and his family with the lowest in the kingdom. The Earls of Warwic and Denbigh, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Waller, Hollis, Massey, Winlocke, Maynard, Glyn, had embraced the same sentiments. In the parliament, a considerable majority, and a much greater in the nation, were attached to the presbyterian party; and it was only by cunning and deceit at first, and afterwards by military violence, that the independents could entertain any hopes of success.

The Earl of Manchester provoked at the impeachment which the king had lodged against him, had long forward the war with alacrity: but being a man of humanity and good principles, the view of public calamities, and the prospect of a total subversion of government, began to moderate his ardour, and inclined him to promote only on any safe or honourable terms. He was even suspected, in the field, not to have pushed to the utmost against the king the advantages obtained by the arms of the parliament; and Cromwell, without the public dictate and without the accusation, that this nobleman had wilfully neglected, at Dennington-castle, a favourable opportunity of finishing the war by a total defeat of the royalists. "I showed him evidently," said Cromwell, "how this success might be obtained; and only desired leave, with my own brigade of horse, to charge the king's army in their retreat; leaving it in the earl's choice, if he thought proper, to remain induct with the rest of his forces: but, notwithstanding his praise, his consent; which gave no other reason but that, if we met with a defeat, there was an end of our pretensions; we should, all be rebels and traitors, and be executed and forfeited by law. "

The plan of recovering the parliament, that at another time, Cromwell having proposed some scheme, to which it seemed improbable the parliament would agree, he meditated and said, My Lord, if you will stick firm to honest men, you shall find yourself at the head of a body of true men, and shall give law to king and parliament. "This discourse," continued Manchester, "made the greater impression on me, because I knew the lieutenant-general to be a man of very deep design; and he has even ventured to tell me, that he never would be well with England, till I were Mr. Montague, and there were never a lord or peer in the kingdom." So full was Cromwell of these republican projects, that notwithstanding his habits of profound dissimulation, he could not so carefully guard his expressions, but that sometimes his favourite notions would escape him.

These violent dissertations brought matters to extremity, and pushed the independents to the execution of their design. In generals, there were serious of protracting than finishing the war; and having entertained a scheme for preserving still some balance in the constitution, they were afraid of entirely subduing the king, and authorizing him to a power, which he should not be entitled to ask any concessions. A new model shone of the army could bring complete victory to the parliament, and free the nation from those calamities under which it laboured. But how to effect this project was the difficulty. The authority, as well as interests, of Essex, was very great with the parliament. Not only he had served them all along with the most exact and scrupulous honour: it was, in some measure, owing to his popularity, that they had ever been enabled to levy an army, or make head against the royal cause. Manchester, Warwick, and the other commanders, had likewise great credit with the public; nor were there any hopes of prevailing over them, but by laying the plan of an oblique and artificial attack, which would conceal the real purpose of their antagonists. The Scots and Scottish commissioners, jealous of the progress of the independents, were a new obstacle; which, without the utmost art and subtlety, it would be difficult to subdue. The methods by which the intrigue was conducted are so singular, and show so fully the genius of the age, that we shall give a detail of them, as they are delivered by Lord Clarendon.

Wednesday of every month, had been ordered by the parliament, at the beginning of these combinations; and their preachers on that day were careful to keep alive, by their vehement declarations, the popular prejudices entertained against the king, against prelate, and against popery. The king, that he might combat the parliament with their own weapons, appointed likewise a monthly fast, when the people should be instructed in the duties of loyalty and of submission to the higher powers; and he chose the second Friday of every month for the devotion of the royalists.

It was now proposed and carried in parliament, by the independents, that a new and more solemn fast should be voted, when they should implore the Divine assistance for extricating them from these perplexities in which they were at present involved. On that day the preachers, after many political prayers, took care to treat of the reigning divisions in the parliament, and ascribed them entirely to the selfish ends pursued by the members. In the hands of those members, they said, are lodged all the considerable commands of the army, all the lucrative offices in the civil administration: and while the nation is falling every day into poverty, and granaries unwarranted, those who are theable lords to retain possession on possession, and will, in a little time, he masters of all the wealth of the kingdom. That such persons, who fatten on the calamities of their country, will ever embrace any effectual measure for bringing them to a period, or insuring final success to the war, cannot reasonably be expected. Lingering expedients alone will be pursued: and operations in the field concurring in the present state of things, the station of the nation, and commotions will for ever be perpetuated in the nation. After exaggerating these disorders, the ministers returned to their prayers; and besought the Lord, that he would make him one step forward in the development of the instruments, whom he had hitherto employed, were not worthy to bring to a conclusion so glorious a design, that he would inspire others more fit, who might perfect what was begun, and, by establishing true religion, put a speedy period to that public calamity, which had continued long enough, and was to continue longer than we could wish.

On the day subsequent to these devout animadversions, when the parliament met, a new spirit appeared in the looks of many. Sir Henry Vane told the Commons, that if ever God appeared to them, it was in the ordinances of yesterday: that as he was credibly informed by many, who had been present in different congregations, the same lamentations and discourses, which the godly preachers had made before them, had been heard in other churches: that so remarkable a concurrence could proceed only from the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit: that he therefore entreated them, in vindication of their own honour, in consideration of their duty to God and their country, to entertain no schemes of a different nature, nor tamper with any project, that was not extended with profit or advantage: that the absence of so many members, occupied in different employments, had rendered the House extremely thin, and diminished the force of its numbers; and that it would be for the public interest, for his own part, assuming himself as one who enjoyed a gainful office, that of treasurer of the navy; and though he was possessed of it before the civil commotions, yet it was ready to resign it, and to sacrifice, to the welfare of his country, every consideration of private interest and advantage.

Cromwell next acted his part, and commended the preachers for having dealt with them plainly and impartially, and told them of their errors, of which they were so unwilling to be informed. Though they dwelt on many things, he said, on which he had never before reflected; yet, upon reflecting them, he could not but confess, that, till there were a perfect reformation in these particulars, nothing which they undertook could possibly prosper. The parliament, no doubt, continued he, had dwelt wisely on the commencement of the war, in engaging several of the nobility in the project, and thereby satisfying the nation, that they intended to share all hazards with the meanest of the people. But affairs are now changed. During the progress of military operations, we have arisen in such numbers, many excellent officers who are qualified for higher commands than they are now possessed of. And though it becomes not men engaged in such a cause to put trust in the arm of flesh, yet he could assure them, that their troops continued generals fit to command in any enterprise in Christendom. The army, indeed, he was sorry to say it, did not correspond, by its discipline, to the merit of the officers; nor were there any hopes, till the present vices and disorders, which prevail among the soldiers, were repressed by a new model, that their forces would ever be attended with signal success in any undertaking.

In opposition to this reasoning of the independents, many of the presbyters showed the inconvenience and danger of the projected alteration. Whitley, in particular, a man of honour, who loved his country, though in every change of government, he always attended the ruling power, said, that besides the ingratitude of discharging, and that by fraud and artifice, so many noble persons, to whom the parliament had hitherto owed its chief support; they would find it extremely difficult to supply the place of these men; without the exercise of command and authority: that the rank alone, possessed by such as were members of either House, prevented envy, retained the army in obedience, and gave weight to military orders: that greater confidence might safely be reposed in men of family and fortune, than in mere adventurers, who would be apt to entertain separate views from those which were embraced by the persons who employed them: that no maxim of policy was more important than the necessity of preserving an inseparable connection between the civil and military powers, and of retaining the latter in strict subordination to the former: that the greatest honor was due to the plain and most passionate lovers of liberty, ever intrusted to their seniors the command of armies, and had maintained an un conquerable jealousy of all mercenary forces: and that such men alone, whose interests were involved in those of the public, and whose patriotism was so elevated, would sufficiently respect the authority of parliament, and never could be tempted to turn the sword against those by whom it was committed to them. Self-denying ordinance. Notwithstanding these reasons, a com-

metic was chosen to frame what was called the Self-denying ordinance, by which the members of both Houses were excluded from all civil and military employment, except a few offices which were specified. This ordinance was the subject of great debate, and, for a long time, rent the parliament and city into factions. But at last, by the prevalence of envy with some; with others, a sense of fear of a great decay of the publican and independent views; it prevailed. The House of Commons, and was sent to the upper House. The Peers, though the scheme was, in part, levelled against their order; though all of them, at bottom, extremely averse to what had appeared, removed none to objects of so little authority, that they durst not per- severe in opposing the resolution of the Commons; and they thought it better policy, by an unlimited compliance, to avoid the head of that which was its main object. The ordinance, therefore, having passed both Houses, Essex, Warwick, Manchester, Denbigh, Waller, Bereton, and many others, resigned their commands, and received the thanks of the nation. At the pension of ten thousand pounds a year was settled on Essex. A.D. 1643. It was agreed to recruit the army to 22,000 men; and Sir Thomas Fairfax was appointed general. It is remarkable, that his commission did not run, like that of Essex, in the name of the king and parliament, but in that of the parliament alone: and the article concerning the safety of the king's person was omitted. So much had animosities increased between the parties, that though the house of Lords renewed their charges of the lesser House, it should have been discarded with the others; but this impor-tiability would have disappointed all the views of those who had introduced the self-denying ordinance. He was saved from any such suspicion, by an atonement, and was preserved from all danger, in which he was so eminent. At the time when the other officers resigned their commissions, care was taken that he should be sent with a body of horse, to relieve Taunton, besieged by the royalists. His absence being remarked, orders were despatched for his immediate attendance in parliament; and the new general was directed to employ some other officer in that service. A ready compliance was feigned; and the very day was named, on which it was averred, he would take his place in the House. But Fairfax, having appointed a rendezvous of the army, wrote to the parliament, and desired leave to return, for some days, Lieutenant-general Cromwell, whose advice, he said, would be very necessary. A member of the lower House, who had resigned, shortly after, he begged with much earnestness that they would allow Cromwell to serve that campaign. And thus the independents, though the minority, prevailed by art and cunning for the weak hystiers, and bestowed the whole military authority, in appearance, upon Fairfax; in reality, upon Cromwell. Fairfax was a person equally eminent for conduct of arms, and for humanity; and strongly infected with prejudices, or principles derived from religious and party zeal, he seems never, in the course of his public conduct, to have been diverted, by private interest or ambition, from adhering strictly to these principles. Sincere in his professions; disinterested in his motives; open in his conduct; he had formed those of the most shining characters of the age; had not the extreme narrowness of his genius, in every thing but in war, and his embarrasment and confused elocution on every occasion, but when time and place limited their use, he had merit, and rendered the part which he acted, even when vested with the supreme command, but secondary and subordinate. Cromwell, by whose sagacity and invincible spirit Fairfax, who entirely governed, is one of the most eminent and most singular personages that occurs in history. The strokes of his character are as open and strongly marked, as the schemes of his conduct were, during the time, dark and impenetrable. His extensive capacity enabled him to form the most enlarged projects; his enterprises genius was not dismayed with the boldest and most dangerous. Carried by his natural temerity to magnanimity, to grandeur, and to an impertinent and domineering policy; he yet knew, when necessary, to employ the most profound dissimulation, the most oblique and refined artifice, the semblance of the greatest moderation, and the greatest firmness, and simplicity. From his conduct was one continued violation of it; devoted to religion, though he peremptorily employed it as the instrument of his ambition; he was engaged in crimes from the prospect of sovereign power, a temptation which is, in general, irresistible to human nature. He was of that authority which he had attained by fraud and violence, he has hesitated, if not overpowered, our deter-tion of his amenities, by our admiration of his success and of his genius.

During this important transaction of the Treaty of Un-self-denying ordinance, the negotiations for bridge, peace were likewise carried on, though with small hopes of success. The representatives met two messages, one from Evesham, another from Tavistock; desiring a treaty, the parliament despatched commissioners to Oxford, with proposals as high as if they had obtained a complete victory. The advantages during the campaign, and the great distresses of the royalists, had much elevated their hopes; and they were resolved to repose no trust in men inflamed with the highest animosity against them, and who, were they possessed of power, were fully authorized by law, to punish all their opponents as rebels and traitors. The king, when he considered the proposals and the disposition of the parliament, could not expect any acaccommodation, and had no prospect but of war, or of total defeat by a land army. He now employed his own party, who were impatient for peace, he agreed to send the Duke of Richmond, and Earl of Southampton, with an answer to the proposals of the parliament, and at the same time to desire a treaty upon their mutual demands and pretensions. It now became necessary for him to retract his former declaration, that the two Houses at Westminster were not a free parliament; and accordingly he was induced, though with great reluctance, to give them, in his answer, the appellation of the parliament of England. But it appeared afterwards, by a letter which he wrote to the queen, and of which a copy was taken at Naseby, that he secretly entered an explanatory protest in his complaint, that the commissioners who had called him the parliament, he had not thereby acknowledged them for such. This subtilty, which has been frequently objected to Charles, is the most noted of those very few which are charged against him; for every principle has endeavoured to load him with the imputation of insincerity; and have inferred, that the parliament could repose no confidence in his professions and declarations, not even in his latest state of justice, if, when such a breach must be confessed, a difference universally arroled between simply giving to me the appellation which they assume, and the formal acknowledgment of their title to it; nor is any thing more common and familiar in all public transactions.

The time and place of treaty being settled, sixteen commissioners from the king met at Uxbridge, with twelve authorized by the parliament, attended by the Scottish commissioners, and, as is well known, it was agreed that the Scottish and parliamentary commissioners should give to their demands, with regard to three important articles, religion, the militia, and Ireland; and that these should be distinctly discussed and determined on in conference with the king's commissioners. It was soon found impracticable to come to any agreement with regard to any of these articles.

In the summer of 1643, while the negotiations were carried on with Scotland, the parliament had summoned an assembly at Westminster, consisting of 121 divines and 30 laymen, celebrated in their party for piety and learning. By their advice, alterations were made in the thirty-nine articles, or in the metaphysical doctrines of the church; and what was of greater importance, the liturgy was entirely abolished, and in its stead, a new directory for worship was established, by which, substantially to the spirit of the puritans, the utmost liberty, both in praying and preaching, was indulged to the public teachers. By the solemn league and covenant, episcopacy was abjured, as destructive of all true piety; and a national engagement, attended with very serious consequences, could have no promise sacred and obligatory, was entered into with the Scots, never to suffer its readmission. All these measures showed little spirit of accommodation in the parliament; and it is not surprising to find, in the establishment of presbytery and the directory positively demanded, together with the subscription of the covenant, both by the king and kingdom.

In the beginning of a disposition to neglect all theological controversies, he yet had been, in good policy, to adhere to episcopal jurisdiction, not only because it was favourable to monarchy, but because all his adherents were passionately devoted to it; and to abandon them, in what they regarded as so important an article, was for ever to relinquish their friendship and assistance. But Charles had never attained such enlarged principles. He deemed bishops essential to the very being of a Christian church; and he thought himself bound by more sacred ties than those of policy, or even of honour, to the support of that order. His concessions, therefore, on this head, he judged sufficient, when he agreed that an indulgence should be given to the presbyteries, with regard to cerimonies, that the bishops should exercise no act of jurisdiction or ordination, without the consent and counsel of such presbyters as should be chosen by the clergy of each diocese; that the same, in all church courts, should be heard constantly in the name of the bishop, and be bound to preach every Sunday; that pluralities be abolished; that abuses in ecclesiastical courts be redressed; and that a hundred thousand pounds be levied on the bishops' estates and the chapter funds, for payment of debts contracted by the parliament. These concessions, though considerable, gave no satisfaction to the parliamentary commissioners; and without abating any thing of their rigour on this head, they proceeded to their demands with regard to the militia.

The king's partisans had all along maintained, that the fears and jealousies of the parliament, after the securities so early and easily given to public liberty, were either fringed or groundless; and that no human institution could be better poised and adjusted, than was now the government of England. By the absolutions of the chamber and court of high commission, the prelates, they said, has lost all that coercive power by which it had formerly suppressed or endangered liberty: by the establishment of triennial parliaments, it can have no issue to new and oppressive taxes; and from the inspection of that vigilant assembly: by the slender revenue of the crown, no king can ever attain such influence as to procure a repeal of those salutary statutes; and with the breach of the peace, they deemed the real power in vain, by violence, attempt an infringement of laws, so clearly defined by means of late disputes, and so passionately cherished by all his subjects. In this situation, surely, it was a mark, for the present, remain in tranquillity, and try whether it be not possible, by peaceful arts, to elude that danger with which, it is pretended, its liberties are still threatened.

But though the royalists insisted on these plausible topics before the commencement of war, they were obliged to own, that the progress of civil commotions had somewhat altered the state of these matters, and that the power of the militia, said the opposite party, be intrusted to the king, it would not now be difficult for him to abuse that authority. By the rage of intestine discord, his partisans are inflamed to an extreme hatred against their countrymen, and are not afraid to commit the greatest injustices against popular privileges, which, in their apprehension, have been the source of so much disorder. Were the arms of the state, therefore, put entirely into such hands, the nation would be surprised to find that the arms of the state should be intrusted, during three years, to twenty commissioners, who should be named, either by common agreement between him and the parliament, or one half by one and the other. In the opinion of that term, he insisted that his constitutional authority over the militia should again return to him. The parliamentary commissioners at first demanded, that the power of the sword should for ever be intrusted to such persons as the parliament alone should appoint; but afterwards, they relaxed so far as to require that authority only for seven years; after which it was not to return to the king, but to be settled by bill, or by common consent of the two parties. But the king's commissioners asked, whether jealousies and fears were all on one side; and whether the prince, from such violent attempts and pretensions as he had experienced, had not, as a reason to fear, that the arms of the state should be intrusted, during three years, to twenty commissioners, who should be named, either by common agreement between him and the parliament, or one half by one and the other. In the opinion of that term, he insisted that his constitutional authority over the militia should again return to him. The truth is, after the commencement of war, it was very difficult, if not impossible, to find security for both parties, especially for that of the parliament. Amidst such violent annomities, power alone could insure safety; and the power of one side was necessarily attended with danger to the other. Few or no instances occur in history of an equal, peaceable, and durable accommodation, that has been brought about between two factions which had been inflamed into civil war.

With regard to Ireland, there were no greater hopes of agreement between the parties. The parliament demanded, that the truce with the rebels should be declared null; that the findings of the two commissions should be given to the parliament; and that, after the conquest of Ireland, the nomination of the lord-deputy and of the judges, or in other words, the sovereignty of that kingdom, should likewise be submitted to it.

What rendered an accommodation more desperate was, that the demands on these three heads, however exorbitant, were acknowledged, by the parliamentary commissioners, to be nothing but preliminaries. After all these were granted, it would be necessary to proceed to the discussion of those other demands, still more exorbitant, which a little before had been transmitted to the king at Oxford. Such exorbitant terms were then insisted on, that worse could scarcely be demanded, were Charles actually vanquished, a prisoner, and in chains. The king was required to attaint, and except from a general pardon, forty of the most considerable of his English subjects, and nineteen of the peers. A parliament was to be summoned in both kingdoms who had borne arms for him. It was insisted, that forty-eight more, with all the members who had sat in either house at Oxford, all lawyers and divines whatever, any corporation or any ecclesiastic, or of any office, if he forbade the exercise of their profession, be prohibited from coming within the verge of the court, and forfeit the third of their estates to the parliament. It was required, that whoever had borne arms for the king should forfeit the tenth of their estates, or, if that did not suffice, the sixth, for the payment of public delays. As if royal authority were not sufficiently augmented by such terms, it was demanded that the court of wards should be abolished, and that all the considerable officers of the crown, and all the judges, be appointed by parliament; and that the right of peace and war should not be exercised without the consent of that assembly. The presbyterians, it must be confessed, after insisting on such conditions, differed only in words from the independents, who required the establishment of a pure republic. When the debates had been carried on to no purpose during several days, among the conventionists they separated and returned; those of the king, to Oxford, those of the parliament, to London.

A little before the commencement of this fruitless transaction, the king having approved the execution of the death of his favourite minister of the king, was brought to the scaffold; and in this instance the public might see, that popular assemblies, as, by their very number, they are in a great measure exempt from the restraint of shame, so, when they also overleap the bounds of law, naturally break out into acts of the greatest tyranny and injustice.

From the time that Laud had been committed, the House of Commons, engaged in enterprises of greater moment, had not spared him. He had been in the jail a long time, had patiently endured so long an imprisonment without being brought to any trial. After the union with Scotland, the bugled prejudices of that nation revived the like spirit. The House, on one occasion, gave their vengeance in the punishment of this prelate, who had so long, by his authority, and by the execution of penal laws, kept their zealot spirit under confinement. He was accused of high treason in endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws, and of having raised up such high crimes and tumults within the realm. The same illegality of an accumulative crime and a constructive evidence, which appeared in the case of Strafford; the same violence and incongruity in conduct, that was conspicuous in the whole course of this prosecution. The groundless charge of popery, though beheld by his whole life and conduct, was continually urged against the prisoner; and every error rendered unpardonable by this imputation, which was supposed to injure him in the sight of all enemie.

"This man, my lords," said sergeant Wilde, concluding his long speech against him, "is like Naaman the Syran; a great man, but a leper."

We shall not enter into a detail of this matter, which, at present, seems to admit of little controversy. It suffices to say, that after a long trial, and the examination of above a hundred and fifty witnesses, the Commons found so little likelihood of obtaining a judicial sentence against Laud, that they were entirely resolved to have recourse to their legislative authority, and to pass an ordinance for taking away the life of this aged prelate. Notwithstanding the low condition into which the House of Peers was fallen, there appeared some intention of rejecting this ordinance; and the popular leaders were again obliged to apply to the multitude, and to extinguish, by threats of new tumults, the small remains of liberty possessed by the upper House.

Seven peers alone voted in this important question. The rest, either from shame or fear, took care to absent themselves.

Laud, who had behaved during his trial with spirit and vigour of genius, sunk not under the horrors of his execution; but though he had usually professed himself apprehensive of a violent death, he yet did all in his power to shew that he was insensible before that superior courage by which he was animated. "No one," said he, "can be more willing to send me out of life, than I am desirous to go. Even upon the scaffold, and during the intervals of his imprisonment, he was harassed and molested by Sir John Clotworthy, a zealot of the reigns sect, and a great leader in the lower House: this was the time he chose for examining the principles of the dying prelate, and triumphantly, in a confession, that he trusted for his salvation to the merits of good works, not to the death of the Redcemeer. Having extricated himself from these theological toils, the archbishop laid his head on the block; and it was severed from the body at one blow. Those religious opinions, for which he suffered, contributed, no doubt, to the courage and constancy of his end. Sincere he undoubtedly was, and, however misguided, actuated by pious motives in all his pursuits; and it is to be regretted, that a man of such spirit, who conducted his enterprises with so much warmth and industry, had not entertained more enlarged views, and embraced principles more favourable to the general happiness of society.

The great and important advantage which the party gained by Strafford's death may, in some degree, palliate the injustice of the sentence pronounced against him. But the greater value can be attached to the execution of his death, when we consider that only a few of the beakers, who had been an inoffensive prisoner, can be ascribed to nothing but vengeance and bigotry in those severe religionists, by whom the parliament was entirely governed. That he deserved a better fate was not questioned by any reasonable man: the degree of his merit, in other respects, was disputed. Some accused him of recommending slavish doctrines, of promoting persecution, and of encouraging superstition; while others thought that his conduct, in these three particulars, would admit of apology and extenuation.

That the letter of the law, as much as the most flattering court-sermon, inoculates passive obedience, is apparent. And though the revolution required, in extraordinary cases, some mitigation of so rigorous a doctrine; it must be confessed, that the preceding genius of the English constitution had rendered a sacrifice not to this particular of natural and existing laws, but to that of the state. To inflict death, at least on those who depart from the exact line of truth in these nice questions, so far from being favourable to national liberty, savours strongly of the spirit of tyranny and persecution.

justify themselves, as from the highest imputation, from any intendment to relax the golden reins of discipline, as they called them, or to grant any toleration: and the enemies of the church were so far from the beginning, as not to lay claim to liberty of conscience, which they called a toleration for soul-murder. They openly challenged the supremacy, and even menaced the established church with that persecution which they alleged was exercised against her with such severity. And if the question be considered in the view of policy; though a sect, already formed and advanced, may, with good reason, demand a toleration; when these nations, who, on the just point of separation from the church, and whom, it might be hoped, some wholesome and legal severities would still retain in obedience.

Whatever refusals, to a philosophical mind, may be thrown on pious ceremonious, it must be confessed, that during a very religious age, no institutions can be more advantageous to the rude multitude, and tend more to mollify that fierce and gloomy spirit of devotion, to which they are subject. Even the English church, though it had retained a share of popish ceremonious, may justly be thought too naked and unadorned, and still to approach too near the abstract and spiritual religion of the puritans. Laud and his associates, by reviving a few primitive usages, and substituting of this nature, corrected the error of the first reformers, and presented to the affrighted and astonished mind, some sensible, exterior observations, which might occasion a more due estimation of its religious ceremonies, and abate the violence of its disordered efforts. The thoughts of no longer best on that divine and mysterious essence, so superior to the narrow capacities of mankind, was able, by means of the new model of devotion, to relax itself in the contemplation of pictures, postures, vestments, buildings; and all the fine arts, which minister to religion, thereby received additional encouragement. The prince, it is true, conducted this scheme, not with the enlarged sentiments and cool reflection of a legislator, but with the intemperate zeal of a sectary; and by overlooking the circumstances of the times, served rather to inflame that religious fury which he meant to repress. But this blemish is more to be regarded as a general imputation on the whole age, than any particular failing of Laud's; and it is sufficient for his vindication to observe, that his errors were the most excusable of all those which prevailed during that zealous period.

CHAPTER LVIII

Montrose's victories—The new model of the army—Battle of Naseby—Montrose's capture—The West commanded by Drumlanrig—Defeat of Montrose—Ecclesiastical affairs—King goes to the South—End of the war—King delivered up by the Scots.

While the king's affairs declined in England, some events happened in Scotland, which seemed to promise him a more prosperous issue of the quarrel.

Montrose's

Before the commencement of these civil disorders, the Earl of Montrose, a young nobleman of a distinguished family, returning from his travels, had been introduced to the king, and had made an offer of his services; but by the impositions of the Marquis, afterwards Duke, of Hamilton, who possessed much of Charles's confidence, he had not been received with that distinction to which he thought himself justly entitled. Disgusted with this treatment, he had forwarded all the violence of the covenanters; and, agreeably to the natural humour of his genius, he led employed himself during the first Scottish insurrection, with great zeal as well as success, in levyng and conducting their armies. Being commissioned by the Tables to wait upon the king, while he was marching against Montrose, he was charged with the civilities and caresses of that monarch, that he henceforth devoted himself entirely, though secretly, to his service, and entered into a close correspondence with him.

In this correspondence, a great military command was intrusted to him by the covenanters, and was the first that passed the Tweed, at the head of their troops, in the invasion of England. He found means however, soon after, to convey a letter to the king: and by the imbecility of some of his ministers, (Hume, he was,) a copy of this letter was sent to Leven, the Scottish general. Being accused of treachery, and a correspondence with the enemy; Montrose openly avowed the letter, and asked the general, if they dared to call their sovereign an enemy: and by this bold and magnanimous behaviour, he escaped the danger of an immediate prosecution. As he was now fully known to be of the royal party, he no longer concealed his principles, and he entered more openly into a correspondence with the king, that he had entertained like sentiments, into a bond of association for his master's service. Though thrown into prison for this enterprise, and detained some time, he was not discouraged; he still continued; and by the countenance and protection of the king, disputed spirit to dispute spirit. Among other persons of distinction, who united themselves to him, was Lord Napier of Merchiston, son of the famous inventor of the logarithms, the person to whom the title of GREAT MAN is more justly due, than to any other whom his country ever produced.

There was in Scotland another party, who, professing equal attachment to the king's service, pretended only to differ in a subordinate matter; and he entered into a correspondence with the king. This nobleman had cause to be extremely devoted to the king, not only by reason of the connection of blood, which united him to the royal family; but on account of the great confidence and favour with which he had ever been honoured by his master. Being accused by Lord Hume, without any appearance of probability, of a conspiracy against the king, Charles was so far from having suspicion against him, that, the very first time Hamilton came to court, he received him into his bed-chamber, and passed alone the night with him. But such was the duke's unhappy fate or conduct, that he escaped not the interest of his deceptions by his success; for he found both an enemy, and though he at last sacrificed his life in the king's service, his integrity and sincerity have not been thought by historians entirely free from blemish. Perhaps (and this is the most probable opinion) the intemperance of his conduct, and his tempering maxims, though accompanied with good intentions, have been the chief cause of a suspicion, which has never yet been either fully proved or refuted. As much as the bold and virile spirit of Montrose prompted him to enterprising measures, as much was the cautious temper of Hamilton inclined to such as were moderate and dilatory. While the former foretold that the Scottish covenanters were secretely forming union with the English parliament, and inculcated the necessity of preventing them by some vigorous undertaking; the latter still insisted, that every such attempt would precipitate them into measures, to which, otherwise, also not unaccompanied with military skill; he put the enemy to flight, and in the pursuit did great execution upon them.3

But by this second advantage he obtained not the end which he expected. The envious nature of Huntley, jealous of Montrose’s glory, rendered him averse to join an army, where he himself must be so much eclipsed by the superior merit of the general. Argyle, reinforced by the Earl of Lindsay, and the Earl of Lovat, broke through the militia of the northern counties, Murray, Ross, Caithness, to the number of 5,000 men, opposed him in front, and guarded the banks of the Spey, a deep and rapid river. In order to divert these latter, and induce them to concur with the general presupposition, and supported by the unfortunate event of his counsels, were entertained with universal approbation. Influenced by the clamour of his party, more than his own suspicions, Charles, as soon as Hamilton appeared, sent him prisoner to Penthentic castle, in Cornwall. His brother, Lanerc, who was also put under confinement, found means to make his escape, and to fly into Scotland.

The King’s ears were now opened to Montrose’s counsels, who proposed none but the boldest and most daring, agreeably to the desperate state of the royal cause in Scotland. Though the whole nation was subjected by the command of Argyle, as a prey of spoliation, but not of freedom, foot by foot by them, and every place guarded by a vigilant administration; he undertook, by his own credit, and that of the few friends who remained to the king, to raise such confirmations, as would soon oblige the malcontents to recall those forces. The multitude of them were for the farthest part concurring with the general presupposition, and supported by the unfortunate event of his counsels, were entertained with universal approbation. of mind, in this emergence, appeared conspicuous. Instantly he called off his soldiers from plunder, put them in order, secured his retreat by the most skilful measures; and when a printed sermon was rebuked six miles north of the face of an enemy, much superior, without stopping, or allowing his soldiers the least sleep or refreshment, lie at last secured himself to the mountains.

Bullie and Urney now divided their troops, in order the better to conduct the war against an enemy, who surprised them, as much by the rapidity of his marchs, as by the boldness of his enterprises. Urney, at the head of 4000 me, met him at Aldermere, near Inverness; and, encouraged by the number of his enemy, (for the eccentrics were double the royalties,) attacked him in the post which he had chosen. Monroe, having placed his right wing in strong ground, drew the best of his forces to the other, and left no main body between them; a defect which he artfully concealed, by showing a few men through the trees and bushes, with which that ground was covered. That Urney might have no leisure to receive the stratagem, he instantly led his left wing to the charge; and making a furious impression upon the covenanter, drove them off the field, and gained a complete victory.1 In this battle, the valour of young Napier, son to the lord of that name, shone out with signal lustre.

But it is necessary, in order to revenge Urney’s discomfiture; but at Alford, he met, himself, with a like fate. Monroe, weak in cavalry, here lined his troops of horse with infantry; and after putting the enemy’s horse to rout, felt his own force upon them for want of cavalry cut in pieces, though with the loss of the gallant Lord Gordon on the part of the royalties.2 And having thus prevailed in so many battles, which his vigour everrendered as decisive as they were successful, he summoned together all his friends and partisans, and prepared himself for marching into the southern provinces, in order to put a final period to the power of the covenanter, and dissipate the parliament, which with great pomp and solemnity they had brought to meet at St. Cuthbert’s.

While the fire was thus kindled to the north of the island, it blazed out with no less fury to the south: the parliamentary and royal armies, as soon as the season would permit, prepared to take the field, in hopes of bringing their important quarrel to a quick decision. The passing of the self-denying ordinance had been protracted by so many debates and intrigues, that the spring was far advanced before it received the sanction of both Houses; and it was thought dangerous by many to introduce, so near the time of action, such great innovations into the army. Had not the punctuious principles of Essex engaged almost all the disguised men, who, as he received, took part in the explicit obedience to the parliament, this alteration had not been effected without some fatal accident; since, notwithstanding his prompt resignation of the command, a mutiny was generally apprehended.3 Fairfax, or, more properly speaking, Cromwell, under his name, introduced, at last, the new model into the army, and threw the troops into a different shape. From the same men, new regiments and new companies were formed, different officers appointed, and the whole military force put into such hands, as the independents could rely on. Besides members of parliament who were excluded, many officers, unwilling to serve under the new generals, threw up their commissions; and nowaday facilitated the project of putting the army entirely into the hands of that faction.

Though the discipline of the former parliamentary army was not contemptible, a more exact plan was introduced, and rigorously executed, by these new commanders. Valour indeed was very generally diffused over the one party as well as the other during this period: discipline also was attained by the forces of the parliament: but the perfection of the military art in concerted the general plan and execution, and the operations on both sides, to have been, in a great measure, wanting. Historians at least, perhaps from their own ignorance and inexperience, have not remarked any thing but a headlong impetuous conduct; each party hurrying to a battle, where valour and fortune chiefly determined the success. The great ornament of history during these reigns, are the civil, not the military, transactions.

Never was a more singular army new model of the army, assemblcd, than that which was now set on foot by the parliament. To the greater number of the regiments, chaplains were oôf appointed. The officers assumed the spiritual duty, and united it with every military functions. During the intervals of action, they occupied themselves in sermons, prayers, exhortations; and the same emulation there attended them, which, in the field, is so necessary to support the honour of that profession. Hence the eccentrics, for the sake of ambition and reflection; while the zealous devotees poured out their thoughts in unpremeditated harangues, they mistook that eloquence, which, to their own surprise, as well as that of others, flowed upon them, for divine illuminations, and for illusions of the Holy Spirit. Wherever they were quartered, they excluded the minister from his pulpit; and, usurping his place, conveyed their sentiments to the audience, with all the authority which followed their power, their valour, and their military exploits, united to their appearing zeal and fervour. The private soldiers, seized with the same spirit, employed their vacant hours in prayer, in perusing the Holy Scriptures, in ghostly conferences, from which they compared the number of the independents, in grace, and mutually stimulated each other to further advances in the great work of their salvation. When they were marching to battle, the whole field resounded, as well with the psalms as with the common prayers, and even with the instruments of military music; and every man endeavoured to drown the sense of present danger, in the prospect of that crown of glory which was set before him. In so holy a cause, wounds were esteemed meritorious; deaths, martyrdom; and the hurry and dangers of action, instead of banishing their pious visions, rather served to impress their minds more strongly with them.

The royalists were desirous of throwing ridicule on this fanciful and the parliament army, without being sensible how much reason they had to apprehend its dangerous consequences. The forces assembled by the king at Oxford, in the west, and in other places, were equal, if not superior, in number, to their adversaries; but actuated by a very different spirit. That licence, which had been introduced by want of pay, had risen to a great height among them, and rendered them more formidable to their friends than to their enemies. Prince Rupert, neglecting of the people, fond of the soldiery, had indulged the troops in onwarrantable liberties: Wilmot, a man of dissolute manners, had promoted the same spirit of disorder; and the heart of a king, George, of the house of Stuart, Granville, now carried it to a great pitch of enormity. In the west especially, where Goring commanded, universal spoil and havoc were committed; and the whole country was laid waste by the rapine of the army. All distinction of parties was lost in the general confusion and the same usage. Churches, mansions, and other places, were pillaged and burnt, and no respect paid to the persons or property of the inhabitants.

The disposition of the forces on both sides was as follows: part of the parliamentary army was posted in the west, the others in Yorkshire: part of it besieged Carlisle, valiantly defended by Sir Thomas Glenham. Chester, where Biron commanded, had long been defended by the government; and the army had moved to great difficulties. The king, being joined by the Princesses Rupert and Maurice, lay at Oxford, with a considerable army, about 15,000 men. Fairfax and Cromwell were posted at Windsor, with the new-modelled army, about 22,000 men. Taunton, in the county of Somerset, defended by Blake, suffered a long siege from Sir Richard Granville, who commanded an army of about 8000 men; and, though the defence had been obstinate, the garrison was now reduced to famine. Granville, instead of laying siege, entered, in the west, an army of nearly the same number. *

On opening the campaign, the king formed the project of relieving Chester; Fairfax that of relieving Taunton. The latter was first advanced. The garrison was ordered to Drarton to Shropshire, Brion met him, and brought intelligence, that his approach had raised the siege, and that the parliamentary army had withdrawn. Fairfax, having received Sir Salisbury's despatch, had made the least of the sorry supply from the command of both armies, and he hurried his force forward for the management of the war, to return and lay siege to Oxford, now exposed by the king's absence. He obeyed, after sending Colonel Weldon to the west, with a detachment of 4000 men. On Weldon's approach, Grenville, who imagined that Fairfax with his whole army was upon him, raised the siege, and allowed this pertinacious town, now half taken and half burned, to receive relief: but the royalists, being reinforced with 3000 horse under Goring, again advanced to Taunton, and shut up Weldon, with his small army, in such a posture. *

The king, having effected his purpose with regard to Chester, returned southwards; and, in his way, sat down before London. Shrewsbury made a breach to the wall, he stormed the town on all sides; and after a furious assault, the soldiers entered sword in hand, and committed all those disorders to which no line, whose infantry was completely driven before him, could resist, so much was he excited. A great booty was taken and distributed among them: fifteen hundred prisoners fell into the king's hands. This success, which struck a great terror into the parliamentary party, determined Fairfax to leave Oxford, which he was beginning to approach; and he marched towards the king, with an intention of offering him battle. The king was advancing towards Oxford, in order to raise the siege, which he apprehended was about to be lifted. He put the west in full security, would then unite his forces to those of the king, and give him an insuperable superiority over the enemy. On the other hand, Prince Rupert, whose boiling ardour still pressed him on to battle, excited the impatient humour of the officers. He urged their object, and often threatened them; and he urged the many difficulties under which the royalists laboured, and from which nothing but a victory could relieve them: the resolution was taken to give battle to Fairfax; and the royal army immediately advanced upon him.

On Thursday the 26th, and last day of this instant, June 1643, I went to Whitehall purposely to see the queen, which I did fully all the time she was there, and I observed several things that I never saw before. I was much surprised to see how much she improved by the relations, as well by her radiant and sparkling black eyes, handsome countenance, and her new suit of clothes and jewels, which she wore and looked so well, as by her speech and looks. I declare, and have observed from others that she is much improved in these last days, which I hope are the last of the true serious. See preceding dialogue.

future enterprises. A letter was brought him written by Goring to the king, and unfortunately intrusted to a spy of Fairfax's. Goring there informed the king, that in three weeks he hoped to be master of Taunton; after which he would pursue the enemy with all the force in the west; and entreated him, in the meanwhile, to avoid coming to any general action.

This letter, which, had it been safely delivered, had probably prevented the battle of Naseby, served only to direct the operations of Fairfax. After leaving a body of 3000 men to Pointz and Rossiter, with orders to attend the king's motions, he marched immediately to the west, with a view of saving Taunton, and suppressing the only considerable force which now remained to the royalists.

In the beginning of the campaign, Charles, apprehensive of the event, bad sent the Prince of Wales, then fifteen years of age, to the west, with the title of general, and had given orders, if he were pressed by the enemy, that he should make his escape into a foreign country, and save one part of the royal family from the violence of the parliament. Prince Rupert had thrown himself into Bristol, with an intention of defending that important city. Goring commanded the army before Taunton.

20th July. On Fairfax's approach, the siege of Taunton was raised; and the royalists retired to Lamport, an ancient town in the county of Somerset. Fairfax attacked them in that post, beat them from it, killed about 300 men, and took 1400 prisoners. After this advantage, he sat down before Bridgewater, a town esteemed strong, and of great consequence in that county. When he left it, the outer town was blockaded by the king's governor, who had retired into the inner, immediately capitulated, and delivered up the place to Fairfax. The garrison, to the number of 2600 men, were taken with their arms.

Fairfax, having next taken Bath and Sherborne, resolved to lay siege to Bristol, and made great preparations for an enterprise, which, from the garrison, and the reputation of Prince Rupert as the general of the west, was deemed of the last importance. But so precarious, in most men, is this quality of military courage a poorer defence was not made by any town during the whole war: and the general expectations were here extremely disappointed. No sooner had the parliamentary forces entered the lines by storm, than the prince capitulated, and surrendered the city to Fairfax. A few days before, he had written a letter to the king, in which he undertook to defend the place for four months, if no military obliged them to surrender it. Charles, who was Surrender of Bristol.

11th Sept. had the choice of forming schemes, and collecting forces, for the relief of Bristol, was astonished at so unexpected and severe a defeat, and could bear less fatal to his cause than the defeat at Naseby. Full of indignation, he instantly recalled all Prince Rupert's commissions, and sent him a pass to go bygood sea.

The king's affairs now went fast to ruin in all quarters. The Scots having made themselves masters of Carlisle, after an obstinate siege, marched southwards, and laid siege to Hereford; but were obliged to raise it on the king's approach: and this was the last glimpse of success which attended his arms. Having marched to the relief of Chester, which was anew besieged by the parliamentary forces under Colonel Jones; Pointz attacked his rear, and forced him to give battle. While the fight was going on, Grant entered Chester, with great obstinacy, and victory seemed to incline to the royalists; Jones fell upon them from the other side, and put them to rout with the loss of 600 slain, and 1000 prisoners. The king, with the rest of his broken army, fled to Newark, and thence escaped to Oxford, where he remained up the winter.

The news which he received from every quarter, was no less fatal than those events which passed where he himself was present. Fairfax and Cromwell, after the surrender of Bristol, having divided their forces, the former marched westwards, in order to complete the conquest of Devonshire and Cornwall; the latter attacked the king's garrisons which lay to the east of Bristol. The Defeas were surrendered to Cromwell; Berkley castle was taken by storm; Wincmose, captured. York was entered into, and all these middle counties of England were, in a little time, reduced to obedience under the parliament.

The same rapid and uninterrupted success attended the parliament. The parliamentary forces, having been elated by past victories, governed by the most rigid discipline, met with no equal opposition from troops, dismayed by repeated defeats, and corrupted by the licentious manners of soldiers, gathering up the quarters of the royalists at Howe-Tracey, Fairfax sat down before Dartmouth, and in a few days entered it by storm. Poulton-castle, being taken by him, and Exeter blockaded on all sides; Hopton, a man of merit, who now commanded the royalists, having advanced to the relief of that town, with an army of 6000 men, met with the parliamentary army at Torrington, where he was defeated, all his foot dispersed, and he himself, with his horse, obliged to retire into Cornwall. Fairfax followed him, and vigorously pursued the victory. Having enclosed the royalists at True, he forced the whole army, consisting of 4000 men, chiefly commanded by a man named Tenser, delivering up their horses and arms, were allowed to disband, and received twenty shillings each, to carry them to their respective abodes. Such of the officers, as desired it, had passes to return as far as they chose, but having presented no new device to bear arms, paid compositions to the parliament, and procured their pardon. And thus Fairfax, after taking Exeter, which completed the conquest of the west, marched with his victorious army to the centre of the kingdom, and fixed his camp at Newbury. The Prince of Wales, in pursuance of the king's order, retired to Scilly, thence to Jersey; whence he went to Paris; where he joined the queen, who had fled there from Exeter. The earl of Exeter conducted the parliamentary army to the west.

In the other parts of England, Hereford was taken by surprise: Chester surrendered: Lord Derby, who had attempted with 1200 horse to break into Scotland, and join Montrose, was defeated at Sherburn, in Yorkshire, by Colonel Copley; his whole force was dispersed; and himself was obliged to fly, first to the Isle of Man, then to Ireland. News too arrived that Montrose himself, and his army, made prisoners of war.

When Montrose descended into the southern counties, the covenanters, assembling their whole force, met him with a force sufficient to last him success, at Kilisly. This was the most complete victory that Montrose ever obtained. The royalists put to the sword six thousand of their enemies, and left the covenanters no remnants of any army in Scotland. The heir of the king was shaken with these repeated successes of Montrose; and many noblemen, who secretly favoured the royal cause, now declared openly for it, when they saw a force able to support them. The Marquis of Douglash, the Earls of Annandale and Haddington, the Lords Flemming, Seton, Maderty, Carney, with many others, flocked to the standard of the royalists. Edinburgh opened its gates, and gave liberty to all the prisoners there detained by the covenanters. Among the rest was Lord Argyll, whose family had contributed extremely to the victory gained at Kilisly.}

David Leslie was detached from the army in England, and marched to the relief of his distressed party in Scotland. Montrose advanced still further to the south, allured by vain hopes, both of rousing to arms the Earls of Hume, Traquair, and Roxborough, who had promised to join him; and of obtaining from England some succor. By the negligence of his scouts, Leslie, at Philp-haugh in the Forest, surprised his army, much diminished in numbers, from the descent of the people; but by a vote of the House they could not be under two years of the delinquents estate. Journ. 16th of Oct., 1645. 16th of Feb., 1645, p. 161.

4. Hist. vol. i. p. 188. These compositions were different according to the deserts of the of the Highlanders, who had retired to the hills, according to custom, in order to secure their plunder. After a sharp conflict, where Montrose exerted great valour, his forces were defeated on Montrose Hill, 5th Sept. 1645. and he retired to Montrose, where he was joined by a large force of his adherents, who had been driven from the mountains; where he again prepared himself for new battles and new enterprises.*

The covenanters used the victory with rigour. Their purpose for the present was to seize the penal laws and to substitute the national law, and to send an army to the late prince, Sir Philip Nisbet, Sir William Rollo, Colonel Nathaniel Gordon, Andrew Guthry, son of the Bishop of Murray, William Murray, son of the Earl of Tulibardine, were condemned and executed. The sole crime of these captives was to deliver to Montrose the king's commission, to be captain-general of Scotland. Lord Ogilvy, who was again taken prisoner, would have undergone the same fate, had not his sister found means to procure his escape, by changing clothes with him. For this instance of courage and dexterity, she met with harsh usage. The clergy solicited the parliament, that more royalists might be executed; but could not obtain their request.†

After all these repeated disasters, which every where befell the royal party, there remained only one body of troops, on which fortune could exercise her rigour. Lord Ashley, with a small army, that had deserted the crown, chiefly composed of drunken soldiers, marching to Oxford, in order to join the king, was met at Sowe by Colonel Morgan, and entirely defeated; himself being taken prisoner. You have done your work, said Ashley to the parliamentary officers; it is for you to play, unless you choose to fall out among yourselves.

The condition of the king, during this whole winter, was to the last degree disastrous and melancholy. As the dread of all is commonly more oppressive than their real presence, perhaps in no period of his life was he more justly the object of compassion. His vigour of mind, which, though it sometimes failed him in acting, never deserted him, was his greatest treasure; and he was determined, as he wrote to Lord Digby, if he could not live as a king, to die like a gentleman; nor should any of his friends, he said, ever have reason to blush for the prince whom they had so unfortunately served. The murmur of discontented officers, on the one hand, harassed their unhappy sovereign; while they over­ rated those services and sufferings which, they now saw, must for ever go unrewarded.‡ The affectionate duty, on the other hand, which the king perceived in them, was from him, who represented his misfortunes and his virtues, as much as his dignity, wrung his heart with a new sorrow; when he reflected, that such disinterested attachment would so soon be ex­ pressed in such a manner of dissent, if not in actual attempts, which he made for a peaceful and equitable acco­ mmodation with the parliament, served to no purpose but to convince them, that the victory was entirely in their hands. They designed not to make the least reply to several of his messages, in which he desired a passport for com­ missioners. § At last, after reproaching him with the blood spilt during the war, they told him that they were preparing bills for him; and his passing them would be the best pledge of his inclination towards peace; in other words, he must yield at discretion. He desired a personal treaty, and offered to come to London, upon receiving a safe-conduct for himself and his attendants; they absolutely refused to treat in that manner: in which he saw, that is, the seizing of his person in case he should attempt to visit them. A new incident which happened in Ire­ land served to inflame the minds of men, and to increase those calamities with which his enemies had so much loaded him, and which he ever regarded as the most grievous part of his misfortunes.

After the cessation of this business, the king was desirous of concluding a final peace with them, and obtaining their assistance in England; and he gave authority to Ormond, lord-lieutenant, to promise them an abrogation of the Oath of Allegiance, which had been enforced by the suspension of Pompian's statute, with regard to particular bills, which should be agreed on. Lord Herbert, created Earl of Glamorgan, (though his patent had not yet passed the seals,) having occasion for his private affairs to be attended to in Ireland, the king considered, that this nobleman, being a catholic, and allied to the best Irish families, might be of service: he also foresaw, that further concessions with regard to religion might probably be demanded by the haggard Irish; and that, as these concessions, however necessary, would give great scandal to the protestant zealots in his three kingdoms, it would be requisite both to conceal them during some time, and to preserve Ormond's character, by giving private orders to Glamorgan to con­ clude and sign these articles. But as he had a better opinion of Glamorgan's zeal and affection for his service, than of his capacity, he enjoined him to communicate all these measures to Ormond; and though the final conclusion of the treaty must be executed only in the name, he was required to be directed, in the steps towards it, by the opinion of the lord-lieutenant. Glamorgan, hing­ ged to his religion, and passionate for the king's service, but guided in these enterprises by no motives of gratitude or discretion, secretly, of himself, without any communication with Ormond, concluded a peace with the council of Kilkenney, and, agreed, in the king's name, that the Irish should enjoy all the churches of which they had ever been in possession since the commencement of their insurrection; on condition that they should assist the king in Eng­ land with a body of ten thousand men. This transaction was discovered by the king's agents, and the Irish team of spies, who, at the time of the meeting, were in the city of Derry. Being informed of this, the king told them, "That the Earl of Glamorgan having made an offer to raise forces in the kingdom of Ireland, and to conduct them into England for his Majesty's service, had a commission to that purpose, and to that purpose only, and that he had no commission at all to treat of any thing else, without the privity and direction of the lord­ lieutenan t, much less to capitate any thing concerning religion, or any property belonging either to church or laity. Though this declaration seems agreeable to truth, it gave no satisfaction to the parliament; and some his­ torians, even at present, when the ancient bigotry is somewhat abated, are devout in representing this very innocent transaction as an act by which the king was engrossed by the most violent necessity, as a stain on the memory of that unfortunate prince. Dr. Birch has written a treatise on this subject. It is not my business here to state the arguments urged by his lordship in this treatise, which are well known. I will therefore only produce arguments which prove that Glamorgan, when he received the commission, was not the means of procuring it, but the consent of the king, which was given with the most solemn assurance of his being entirely at the king's disposal. A)

B) It seems to be implied in the very words of the commission. Glamorgan is empowered and authorized to treat and conclude with the confederate Roman catholics in Ireland. 'It upon necessity.(any articles) the said Glamorgan, unto whom the last commission cannot so well be seen, as not fit for any such purpose to be seen. In this or any other articles it is provided, that the king, at any time, may and shall be present, and may at any time give cause to proceed, without any question or objection.' These words are from the commission, and are a clear evidence, that the king had the greatest weight in all these transactions. The words are from the commission. I refer the reader to the original commission.

Having lost all hope of prevailing over the rigour of the parliament, either by arms or by treaty, the only resource which remained to the king was derived from the intestine dissensions which raged among his enemies.

Presbyterians and independents, even before their victory was fully completed, fell into contests about the division of the spoil, and their religion as well as civil disputes agitated the whole kingdom.

The parliament, though they had early abolished episcopal authority, had not, during so long a time, substituted any other spiritual government in its place; and their committee of religion had hitherto assumed the whole ecclesiastical jurisdiction; but they now established, by an ordinance, the presbyterian model in all its forms of Ecclesiastical congregational, classical, provincial, and national assemblies. All the inhabitants of each parish were ordered to meet and choose elders, on whom, together with the minister, was bestowed the entire direction of all spiritual concerns within the congregation. A number of neighbouring parishes, commonly between twelve and twenty, formed a classis; and the court, which governed this division, was composed of all the ministers, together with two, three, or four elders chosen from each parish. The provincial assembly retained an inspection over several neighbouring classes, and was composed of clerics and national assembly; it was constituted in the same manner; and its authority extended over the whole kingdom. It is probable that the tyranny exercised by the Scottish clergy had given way to a more lavish display in the provinces; but the rulers, for the present, had paid no regard to the civil interests of the church. They allowed them nothing but the liberty of convening, and would not intrust them even with the power of electing their own chairman or his substitute, or of selecting a vestry of their own members.

While these disputes were raging between the theologians, who engaged in their spiritual contests every order of the state; the king, though he entertained hopes of reaping advantage from those divisions, was much at a loss what side it should be most for his own power and interest. The presbyterians were, by their principles, the least averse to regal authority; but were rigidly bent on the extirpation of prelacy: the independents were resolute to lay the foundation of a republican government; but as they pretended not to erect themselves into a national church, it might be hoped, that if gratified with a toleration, they would admit the re-establishment of the hierarchy. So great an advantage did the king to the episcopal jurisdiction, that he was ever inclined to put in balance even with his own power and kingly office.

But whatever advantage he might hope to reap from the divisions in the parliamentary party, he was apprehensive lest it should involve him in an engagement with which he was instantly threatened. Fairfax was approaching with a powerful and victorious army, and was taking the proper measures for laying siege to Oxford, which was so far disadvantageous to the king, that he was taken captive and led in triumph by his insenile enemies.
was what Charles justly abhorred; and every insult, if not a violation, was to be dreaded from that enthusiastic soldier, who hated his person and despised his dignity. In this desperate extremity, he embraced a measure which, in any other situation, might have been adopted by the legislature, and led to the imputation of imprudence and indiscipline.

Montroseville, the French minister, interested for the king, more by the natural sentiments of humanity than any instruction from his tutor, observed, that as soon as the Scottish parliament had solicited the Scotch generals and commissioners to give protection to their distressed sovereign; and having received many general professions and promises, he had always transmitted the same, perhaps, with some prudence, to his master. From his sagacity, Charles began to entertain thoughts of leaving Oxford, and flying to the Scottish army, which at that time lay before Newark. He considered that the Scottish nation had been fully gratified in all their demands; and having already, in their own country, annihilated both episcopacy and regal authority, had no further concessions to exact from him. In all disputes which had passed about settling the terms of peace, the Scots, he heard, had still adhered to the milder side, and laid endeavoured to soften the rigour of the English parliament. Great disgusts also, on other accounts, had taken place between the nations; and the Scotch found that the assurance became less necessary, less value was put upon them. The progress of the independents gave them great alarm; and they were scandalized to hear their beloved covenant spoken of, every day, with less regard and reverence. The return of a divine right to the government of ecclesiastical discipline from political considerations, were, to them, the subject of much offence: and the king hoped, that, in their present disposition, the sight of their native prince flying to them in this extremity of distress, would rouse every spark of generosity in their bosom, and procure him their favour and protection.

That he might better conceal his intentions, orders were given to the Scotch generals at Oxford, to send for three persons to pass; and in the night the king, accompanied by none but Dr. Hudon and Mr. Ashburnham, went out at that gate which leads to London. He rode before a post-paneteau, and called himself Ashburnham's servant. He passed through Henley, St. Albans, and came so near to London as Harrow-on-the-Hill. He once entertained thoughts of entering into that city, and of throwing himself on the mercy of the parliament. But at last, after passing Woburn, with great caution, he arrived at the Scotch camp before Newark. The parliament hearing of his escape from Oxford, issued rigorous orders, and threatened with instant death whoever should entice him to their camp.

The Scottish general and commissioners affected great surprise on the appearance of the king; and though they paid him all the external respect, due to his dignity, they instantly set a guard upon him, under colour of protection, and made him in reality a prisoner. They informed the English parliament of this unexpected incident, and assured them that they had entered into no private treaty with the king. They applied to him for orders to Bellasis, to surrender his arms, and to the Scotch camp, to surrender that town, now reduced to extremity; and the orders were instantly obeyed. And hearing that the parliament had clamour to the entire disposal of the king's person, and that the English generals, making some motions towards them; they thought proper to retire northwards, and to fix their camp at Newark.

This measure was very grateful to the king; and he thought the battle of Newbury was not the last. The Scot of course was particularly attentive to the behaviour of their preachers, on whom all depended. It was the mode of that age to make the pulpit the scene of news; and on every great event, the whole Scripture was ransacked by the clergy for passages applicable to the present occasion. The first minister who preached before the king, chose these words for his text; and blessed all the men of Israel came to the king, and said unto him, Why have our brethren, the men of Judah, stolen thee away, and have brought the king and his household, and all David's men with him, over Jordan? And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel. Behold, our brethren came from Jordan, men and cattle, to ye, and said, Why do ye anger the inhabitants of Israel? for whereas then be ye angry for this matter? Have we eaten at all of the king's cost; or hath he given us any gift? And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said, We have ten parts in the king, and we have also more right in David than ye: why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be first had, in bringing back our king, and the words of the men of Judah were more than the words of the men of Israel. But the king found, that the happiness chiefly of the allusion had tempted the preacher to employ this text, and that the coramnating zealots were nowise pacified towards him. Another preacher, after reproaching him to his face with his magisterial orders, ordered this psalm to be sung:

Why dost thou, tyrant, boast thyself? Thy wicked deeds to praise?

The king stood up, and called for that psalm which begins with these words.

Hence mercy, Lord, on me, I pray: For men would me devour:

The good-natured audience, in pity to fallen majesty, showed for once greater deference to the king than to the minister, and sung the psalm which the former had called for.

Charles had very little reason to be pleased with his situation. He not only found himself a prisoner very strictly guarded; all his friends were kept at a distance; and no intercourse, either by letters or conversation, was allowed him, with any one whom he could depend, or who was suspected of any attachment towards him. The Scotch generals would enter into no confidence with him; and still treated him with distant ceremony and faguage respect. They only proposed what they made him, tended further to his absevement and to his ruin.

They required him to issue orders to Oxford, and all his other garrisons, commanding their surrender to the parliament; and the king, sensible that there resistance was to very little purpose, willingly complied. The terms given to most of them were honourable; and Fairfax, as far as lay in his power, was very exact in observing them. Far from allowing violence, he would not even permit insults or triumph over the unfortunate royalists; and by his generous humanity, so cruel a civil war was ended, in appearance very calmly, between the parties.

Osmund, having received like orders, delivered Dublin, and other forts, into the hands of the enemy. The Scots also, after having experienced still more variety of good and bad fortune, threw down his arms and retired out of the kingdom.

The Marquis of Worcester, a man past eighty-four, was the last in England that submitted to the authority of the parliament. He defended Raglan castle to extremity; and opened not its gates till the middle of August. Four years, a few days excepted, were now elapsed, since the king first erected his standard at Nottingham. So long had the British nations, by civil and religious quarrels, been occupied in shedding their own blood, and laying waste their native country.

The parliament offered the Scots their proposals before the king. They were such as a captive, entirely at mercy, could expect from the most mercorable party; yet were they little worse than what were insisted on before the battle of Newbury. The Scotch parliament, of ten, which the king now offered, was demanded for twelve years, together with a right to levy whatever money the parliament should think proper for the support of their armies. The other conditions were, in the main, the same with those which had formerly been offered to the king.

Charles said, that proposals which introduced such important innovations in the constitution, demanded time.
for deliberation: the commissioners replied, that he must give his answer in ten days. He desired to reason about the meaning and import of some terms: they informed him, that he had no power of debate; and peremptorily required his consent or refusal. He requested a personal treaty with the parliament: they threatened, that if he delayed compliance, the parliament would, by their own authority, settle the nation.

This was the most intent upon, was, not, their treaty with the king, to whom they paid little regard, but that with the Scots. Two important points remained to be settled with that nation; their delivery of the king, and the estimation of their arrests. The Scots might pretend, that, as Charles was King of Scotland as well as of England, they were entitled to an equal vote in the disposal of his person: and that, in such a case, where the titles are equal, and the subject indivisible, the preference was due to the present possessor. The English maintained, that the king, being in England, was comprehended within the jurisdiction of that kingdom, and could not be disposed of by any foreign nation. A delicate question this, and what surely could not be decided by precedent, since such a situation is not, any where, to be found in history.

As the Scots concurred with the English, in imposing such conditions on the king, that, notwithstanding his unfortunate situation, he still refused to accept of them; it is certain that they did not desire his freedom: nor could they ever intend to join lenity and regar together to effect a measure. Before the settlement of terms, the administration must be possessed entirely by the parliaments of both kingdoms; and how incompatible that scheme with the liberty of the king, is easily imagined. To carry him a prisoner into England, were few fortuity could be supported to guard him, was a measure so full of inconvenience and danger, that, even if the English had consented to it, must have appeared to the Scots themselves altogether undesirable: and how such a plan, if attempted in baseness of such numerous and victorious armies, which were, at that time, at least seemed to be, in entire union with the parliament! The only expedient, it is obvious, which the Scots could embrace, if they consulted wholly to abandon the king, was immediately to return, fully and cordially, to their allegiance; and, uniting themselves with the royals in both kingdoms, endeavour, by force of arms, to render the English a menace to more momentous importance: but, besides that this measure was full of extreme hazard; what was it but instantly to combine with their old enemies against their old friends? and, in a fit of romantic generosity, overturn what, with so much expense and labour, and trouble, was paid, during the course of so many years, been so carefully erecting?

But, though all these reflections occurred to the Scottish commissioners, they resolved to prolong the dispute, and keep the king as a pledge for those arrests which they claimed from England, and which they were not likely, in the present disposition of that nation, to obtain by any other expedient. The sum, by their account, amounted to near two millions: for they had received little regular pay since they had entered England. And though the contributions which they had levied, as well as the prize of their living at free quarters, must be deducted; yet still the sum which they insisted on was very considerable, for many disguised. After all, it was not long agreed, that, in lieu of all demands, they should accept of 400,000 pounds, one half to be paid instantly, another in two subsequent payments.

Great pains were taken by the Scots (and the English complied with their pretended delicacy) to make this estimation and payment of arrests appear a quite different transaction from that for the delivery of the king's person. So common were these complaints of debate; and peremptorily regarded as one and the same. The English, it is evident, had they not been previously assured of receiving the king, would never have parted with so considerable a sum; and, while they weakened themselves by the same measure, have strengthened a people with whom they must afterwards have so material an interest to discuss.

Thus the Scottish nation underwent, and still undergo, (for such they do, without an end, to rally and dry up, the reproach of selling their king, and betraying their prince for money. In vain did they maintain, that this money was, on account of former services, undoubtedly due; that in their present situation, no other measure, without the utmost disregard or even contempt, could be embraced; and that, though they delivered their king into the hands of his open enemies, they were themselves as much an open enemies as those to whom they surrendered him. They did as long united the two parties in strict alliance with each other. They were still answered, that they made use of this scandalous expedient for obtaining their wages; and that after taking arms, without any prohibition, against their sovereign, who had ever loved and cherished them, they had deservedly fallen into a situation, from which they could not extricate themselves, without either inancy or improvidence.

The infamy of this bargain had such an influence on the Scottish parliament, that they once voted, that the king should be protected, and his liberty insisted on. But the general assembly interposed, and pronounced, that, if the Scots could be prevailed on, or forced on them, it became not the godly to concern themselves about his fortunes. After this declaration, it behoved the parliament to retract their vote.

Intelligence of the formering the final resolution of the Scottish nation to surrender him, was brought to the king; and he happened, at that very time, to be playing at chess. Such command of temper did he possess, that he continued his game without interruption, and none of the by-standers could perceive the letter, which he answered, had brought him news of any consequence. The English commissioners, who, some days after, came to take him under their custody, were admitted to kiss his hand. The high-est, and, in the same grave and cheerfulness, as if they had travelled on o other errand than to pay court to him. The old Earl of Pembroke, in particular, who was one of them, congratulated him on his strength and vigor, that he was still able, during such a season, to perform so long a journey in company with so many young people.

The king, being delivered over by the A.D. 1645.

Scots to the English commissioners, was conducted under a guard to Holdencly, in by the the county of Northampton. On his journey, the whole country flocked to behold him, moved partly by curiosity, partly by compassion and affection. If any still retained any trace of the violence and terror, during his imprisonment in silence; while his well-wishers, more generous than prudent, accompanied his march with tears, with acclamations, and with prayers for his safety. That ancient superstition likewise of desiring the king's touch in seculous distempers, seemed to acquire fresh credit among the people, from the general tenderness which began to prevail for this virtuous and unhappy monarch.

The commissioners rendered his confinement at Holdencly very rigorous; dismissing his ancient servants, debarring him from visits, and cutting off all communication with his friends or family. The parliament, though earnestly applied to by the king, refused to allow him spokesmen. After all, it was at last agreed, that, in lieu of all demands, they should accept of 400,000 pounds, one half to be paid instantly, another in two subsequent payments.
to be apprehended, he had resolved to conclude a peace, and to remedy, as far as possible, all those ills to which, from mistake rather than any bad intentions, he had himself given occasion. The minister and the other moderate party among the Commons, found themselves considerably weakened by his death: and the small remains of authority which still adhered to the House of Peers, were in a manner wholly extinguished

A. D. 1647.

The duration of the parliament was of short duration. No sooner had they subdued their sovereign, than their own servants rose against them, and tumbled them from their slippery throne. The sacred boundaries of the laws being once violated, nothing remained to prevent the greatest excesses, were any such fancies admitted. And every successive revolution became a precedent for that which followed it.

In proportion as the terror of the king's power diminished, the division between independent and presbyterian became every day more evident. The armes were forced on it at last requisite to seek shelter in one or the other faction. Many new writs were issued for elections, in the room of members who had died, or were disqualified by adhering to the king; yet still the presbyterians retained the suprinity among the Commons; and all the Peers, except Lord Say, were esteemed of that party. The independents, to whom the inferior sectaries adhered, predominated in the army: and the troops of the new model were universally infected with that enthusiastic spirit. To their assistance did the independent party among the Commons chiefly trust, in their projects for acquiring the ascendancy over their antagonists.

Soon after the retreat of the Scots, the presbyterians, seeing every thing reduced to obedience, began to talk of diminishing the army: and, on pretence of ease the public burthen, they levelled a deadly blow at the opposite faction. They purpose to embark a strong detachment, under Skippon and Massey, for the service of Ireland: they openly declare their intention of making a great reduction of the remainder. It was even imagined, that another new model of the army was projected, under pretence to regain to the presbyterians that suprinity which they had so imprudently lost by the former.

The army had small melimation to the service of Ireland; a condition must be attiduated, and laid waste by massacres and civil commotions; they had less inclination to disbanded, and to renounce that pay, which, having earned it through fatigues and dangers, they now pursued to enjoy in ease and tranquility. And most of the officers having risen from the drags of the people, had no other prospect, it depriving of their commission, than that of returning to languish in their native poverty and obscurity.

These motives of interest acquired additional influence, and became more dangerous to the parliament, from the religious spirit by which the army was universally actuated.

Among the generality of men, educated in regular civilized societies, the sentiments of shame, duty, honour, have considerable authority, and serve to counterbalance and direct the motives derived from private advantage: but, by the predominancy of enthusiasm among the parliamentaries, these salutary principles lost their credit, and were regularly impugned by men, yeo, moral philosophers; fitter for heathens than for Christians. The saint, resided over to superior guidance, was at full liberty to gratify all his appetites, disguised under the appearance of pious zeal. And, besides the strange corruptions engendered by this spirit, it stilled and lessened all the ties of morality, and gave entire scope, and even sanction, to the selfishness and ambition which naturally adhere to the human mind.

The military commotions were further encouraged in disobedience to superiors, by that spiritual pride to which a mistaken piety is so subject. They were not, they said, mere janissaries; mercenary troops enlisted for hire, and to be disposed of at the will of their paymasters. Rigo and liberty were the motives which had excited them to arms; and they had a superior right to see those blessings, which they had purchased with their blood, inured to future generations. By the same token the presbyterians, in contradiction to the royalists, had appropriated to themselves the epithet of godly, or the well-affected: the independents did now, in contradiction to the presbyterians, assume this magnificent appellation, and arrogate all the ascendant, which naturally belongs to it.

Hearing of parties in the House of Commons, and being informed that the minority were friends to the army, the majority enemies; the troops naturally interested themselves in that dangerous distinction, and were eager to give the superiority to their partisans. Whatever hardships they underwent, though perhaps derived from inevitable necessity, were ascribed to the enemies, oppressing them, and resented as an effect of the animosity and malice of their adversaries.

Notwithstanding the great revenue which accrued from taxes, assessments, requisitions, and compositions, conscripted to the army, to the men in arms, to the soldiers, to the private men, as well as officers, had near a twelvemonth's pay still owing them. The army suspected, that this deficiency was purposely contrived, in order to oblige them to live at free quarters; and by rendering them odious to the country, serve as a pretence for disbanding them.

When they saw such members as were employed in committees and civil offices accumulate fortunes, they accused them of rapine and public plunder. And this was pointed out by the Commons for the payment of arrears, the soldiers dreaded, that, after they should be disbanded or embarked for Ireland, their enemies, who predominated in the two Houses, would entirely defraud them of their right, and oppress them with imparity.

On this ground or pretence did the first Molly of the commotions begin in the army. A petition, army, addressed to Fairfax, the general, was handed about; crying an indemnity, and that ratified by the king, for any illegal actions, of which, during the course of the war, the soldiers might have been guilty; together with satisfaction in arrears, freedom from pressing, relief of widows and parents, and general indemnity. The Commons, aware of what combustible materials the army was composed, were alarmed at this intelligence. Such a combination, they knew, if not checked in its first appearance, was of the most dangerous consequences, and must soon exalt the military above the civil authority.

Besides surmounting some officers to answer for this attempt, they immediately voted that the petition tended to introduce mutiny, to put conditions upon the parliament, and to obstruct the relief of Ireland; and they threatened to proceed against the promoters of it, as enemies to the state and disturbers of public peace. This declaration, which may be deemed violent, especially as the army had some ground for complaint, produced fatal effects. The soldiers lamented that they were deprived of the privileges of Englishmen; that they were not allowed so much as to represent their grievances; that, while petitions from Essex and other places were openly encouraged against the army, their mouths were stopped; and that they, who were the authors of liberty to the nation, were reduced, by a faction in parliament, to the most grievous servitude.

In this disposition was the army found by Warwick, Essex, Massey, and other commissioners, who were sent to make them proposals for entering into the service of Ireland. Instead of enlisting, the generality objected to the terms; demanded an indemnity; were clamorous for their armies; and, though they expressed no dissatisfaction against Skippin, who was appointed commander, they discovered much stronger inclination to serve under Fairfax and Cromwell. Some officers were zealous of the prelates, having entered into engagements for this service, could prevail on very few of the soldiers to enlist under them. And, as these officers lay all under the grievous reproach of deserting the army, and betraying the interests of the commonwealth, the rest were further terrified in that confederacy, which they had secretly formed.

To petition and remonstrate being the most cautious method of conducting a confederacy, an application to parliament was signed by near 2000 officers; in which they made their apology with a very imperious air, asserted their right of petitioning, and complained of that imposition thrown upon them by the former declaration of the lower House. The privy men likewise of some regiments sent a letter to Skippin; in which, together with insisting on the same topics, they lamented that designs were formed against them and many of the godly party in the kingdom; and declare that they could not engage for Ireland, till they were satisfied in their expectations, and had their just desires granted. The army, in a word, felt their power, and resolved to be masters.

The parliament too resolved, if possible, to preserve their dominion and to protect their designs; they endeavored, and not retaining any much authority, it was not easy for them to employ any expedient which could contribute to their purpose. The expedient which they now made use of, was the worst imaginable. They sent Skippin, Cromwell, Ireton, Fleetwood, to the head-quarters at Saffron Walden in Essex; and empowered them to make offers in the army, by very gentle means, at least the three last, were secretly the authors of all these contents; and failed not to foment those disorders, which they pretended to appease. By their suggestion, a measure was embraced, which at once brought matters to extremity, and reduced the army to disorder.

In opposition to the parliament at Westminster, a military parliament was formed. Together with a council of the principal officers, which was appointed after the model of the House of Peers, a more free representative of the army was composed, by the election of two private men or inferior officers, under the title of agitators, from each troop or company. By this means, both the general humours, the various interests, was gratified, intent on plans of imaginary republics; and an easy method for conducting underhand, and propagating the sedition of the army.

This terrible court, when assembled, having first declared that they found no dissatisfaction in the army, but many grievances which it was necessary to relieve and offer of the parliament unsatisfactory. Eight weeks’ pay alone, they said, was promised; a small part of fifty-six weeks, which they claimed as their due; no visible security was given for the remainder; and having been declared public enemies by the Commons, they might hereafter be prosecuted as such, unless the declaration were recalled. Before matters came to this height, Cromwell had posted up to London, on pretence of laying before the parliament the rising discontent of the army.

The parliament made one vigorous effort more, to try the force of their authority; they voted that all the troops which did not engage for Ireland should instantly be dismissed in their quarters. The council of the army ordered a general rendezvous of all the regiments, in order to provide for their common interests. And while they thus prepared themselves for opposition to the parliament, they struck a blow, which at once decided the victory in their favour.

A party of five hundred horse appeared at the king’s house, Holdenby, conducted by one Joyce, by whom they were not particularly distinguished by profession; but was advanced to the rank of cornet, and was an active agitator in the army. Without being opposed by the guard, whose affections were all on their side, Joyce came into the king’s presence armed with pistols, and told him, that he must immediately go along with him. Whether said the king, To the army, replied Joyce. By what warrant? asked the king. Joyce pointed to the soldiers whom he had at his command, and added, give me the warrant, and I will follow. Your warrant, said Charles, smiling, is written in fair characters, legible without spelling. The parliamentary commissioners came into the room; they asked Joyce whether he had any orders from the parliament! He said yes, that he was a member of that body, and that he had been sent to the king. He came! He made the same reply as to the king. They would write, said they, to the parliament, to know their pleasure. You may do so, replied Joyce; but in the mean time the king must come with me. But write we, was vain. The king, after protracting the time as long as he could, went into his coach; and was safely conducted to the army, who were hastening to their rendezvous at Troop-Heath, near Cambridge. The parliament, informed of this event by their commissioners, were thrown into the utmost consternation.

Fairfax himself was no less surprised at the king’s arrival. That bold measure, executed by Joyce, had never been communicated to the general. The orders were entirely verbal; and nobody owned them. And while every one affected astonishment at the enterprise, Cromwell, by whose counsel it had been directed, arrived from London, and published the fact, as he had conceived the affair to be of importance.

This artful and audacious conductor had conducted himself in the parliament with such profound dissimulation, with such refined hypocrisy, that he had long deceived those men of business, who, in the same arts, should naturally have entertained the more suspicion against others. At every intelligence of disorders in the army, he was moved to the highest pitch of grief and of anger. He wept bitterly; he lamented the misconduct of his companions; he caused violent measures for suppressing the mutiny; and by these precipitate counsels, at once seemed to evince his own sincerity, and inflamed those discontentments, of which he intended to make advantage. He obtained hence a very hardened attachment to the parliament, which had rendered him so odious in the army, that his life, while among them, was in the utmost danger; and he had very narrowly escaped a conspiracy formed to assassinate him. But information being brought that the most active officers and agitators were entirely his creatures, the parliamentary leaders secretly resolved, that next day, when he should come to the house, an accusation should be entered against him, and it should be seconded to death. Congress, said he, was the conduct of his desperate enterprises frequently approached to the very brink of destruction, knew how to make the requisite run with proper dexterity and boldness. Being informed of this, this determined and immediate vote was received with acclamation, and was instantly invested with the supreme command, both of general and army.

Fairfax, having neither talents himself for cabinet nor penetration to discover the cabals of others, had given his entire confidence to Cromwell, who, by the best coloured pretexts, and by the appearance of an open sincerity and a scrupulous conscience, imposed on the easy nature of this brave and virtuous man. The council of officers and the agitators were moved altogether by Cromwell’s direction, and conveyed his will in the whole army. By his profound and artful conduct, he had now attained a station, where he could cover his enterprises from the view; At one time, the courtiers of his superior officer, or yield to the movements of the soldiers, could secretly pave the way for his future greatness. While the disordors of the army were yet in their infancy, he was kept at a distance, lest his counterfeit might throw a dam upon them, or his secret encouragement begot suspicion in the parliament. As soon as they came to maturity, he openly joined the troops; and in the critical moment to discover the cabals of others, he gave his king’s person, and depriving the parliament of any resource of an accommodation with him. Though one word fell off, another still remained to cover his natural consternation. Where delay was requisite, he would employ the most
The indefatigable patience which the necessity was, he flew to a determination. And by thus uniting in his person the most opposite qualities, he laid the foundation of that spirit of concord which was necessary to a suberviency to his secret purposes.

The parliament, though at present defenceless, was possessed of many resources; and the prospect of alliance with a foreign power, of being attached to the most dangerous cause, of being in danger of violence with which they were threatened. Without further deliberation, therefore, Cromwell advanced the army upon them, and arrived in a few days at St. Albans.

No compliance was made, for the simple reason that the army commenced against the parliament. As much as that assembly was once the idol of the nation, as much was it now become the object of general hatred and aversion.

The self-denying ordinance had no longer been put in execution, than till Essex, Manchester, Waller, and the other officers of that party, had resigned their commission; immediately after it was laid aside by tacit consent; and the members, sharing all offices of power and profit among them, proceeded with impunity in exercising acts of oppression on the helpless nation. Though the necessity of their situation might serve as an apology for many of their measures, the people, not accustomed to such a species of government, were not disposed to make the requisite allowances.

A small supply of 100,000 pounds a year could never be obtained by former kings from the jealous humour of parliament, and the English, of old nations in Europe, were the least accustomed to taxes: but this parliament, from the commencement of the war, according to some computations, had levied, in five years, above forty millions; but were loaded with debts and encumbrances, which, during that age, were regarded as prodigious. If these computations should be thought much exaggerated, as they probably are, the taxes and impositions were certainly far higher than in any former state of the English government. All the former exactions and exaggerations are, at least, a proof of popular discontent.

But the disposal of this money was no less the object of general complaint against the parliament than the levying of it. The sum of 300,000 pounds they openly, it is affirmed, and divided among their own members. The committees, to whom the management of the different branches of revenue was intrusted, never brought in their accounts, and had unlimited power of secreting whatever sums they pleased from the public treasury. These branches were needlessly multiplied, in order to render the revenue more intricate, to share the advantages among greater numbers, and to conceal the frauds of which they were subject to no control.

The method of keeping accounts practised in the exchequer was confessedly the exactest, the most ancient, the best known, and the least liable to fraud. The exchequer of parliament consisted, from the beginning, and the revenue put under the management of a committee, who were subject to no controls.

The excuse was an odious tax, formerly unknown to the nation; and was now extended over provinces, and the common necessaries of life. Near one half of the goods and chattels, and at least one half of the lands, rents, and revenues of the kingdom had been sequestered. To great numbers of royalty, all redress from these sequestrations was refused; to the rest, the remedy could be obtained only by paying large compositions and subscribing the covenant, which they abhorred. Besides pitting the ruin and desolation of so many ancient and honourable families, indigent spectators could not but blame the hardship of punishing, with such severity, actions which the law, in its usual and most undisputed interpretation, strictly required of every subject.

The severity, too, exceeded against the episcopal clergy, naturally affected the royalty, and even all men of courage, in a sensible manner. By the most moderate computation, it appears that the whole clergy had been turned out to beggary and want, for no other crime than that adhering to the civil and religious principles in which they had been educated, and for their attachment to those laws under whose countenance they had at first embraced that profession. To renounce episcopacy and the liturgy, and to subscribe the covenant, were only the terms which could save them from so rigorous a fate; and if the least mark of malignity, as it was called, or affection to the former, who so long had ever escaped their lips, even this hard choice was not permitted. The sacred character, which gives the priesthood such authority over mankind, becoming more venerable from the sufferings endured for the sake of principle by these distrest royals, aggrandized the general indignation against their persecutors.

But what excited the most universal complaint was, the unlimited tyranny and despotic rule of the country committees. During the war, the discretionary power of these courts was excused from the plea of necessity: but the nation was reduced to despair, when it saw neither end put to their duration, nor bounds to their authority. These could sequester, imprison, and execute, without law or remedy. They interposed in questions of private property. Under colour of malgrancy, they exercised vengeance against their private enemies. To the obnoxious, and sometimes to the innocent, they applied the death penalty.

Could any thing have increased the indignation against that slavery, into which the nation, from the too eager pursuit of liberty, had fallen, it must have been the reflection on the pretences by which the people had so long been deluded. The sanctified hypocrites, who called their oppressions the spoiling of the Egyptians, and their rigid severity the demum of the elect, interlarded all their iniquities with long and frequent prayers, saved themselves from blushing by their pious groans, and, excused, in the name of the Lord, all their cruelty on men. An undisguised violence could be forgiven: but such a mockery of the understanding, such an abuse of religion, were, with men of penetration, objects of peculiar resentence.

The parliament, conscious of their decay in popularity, seeing a formidable armed force advance upon them, were reduced to despair, and found all their resources much inferior to the pressing necessity. Leaving their seats, they resolved to place their strength of attachment to presbyterianism; and its militia, which was numerous, and had acquired reputation in wars, had by a late ordinance been put into hands in whom the people could confide. The assembly was now called out, and ordered to guard the lines which had been drawn round the city, in order to secure it against the king. A body of horse was ordered to instantly levies. Many officers, who had been cashier'd by the new model of the army, offered their service to the parliament. An army of 5000 men lay in the north under the command of General Poole, who was of the presbyterian faction; but these were too distant to be employed in so urgent a necessity. The forces destined for Ireland were quartered in the west; and though deemed faithful to the parliament, they also lay at a distance. Many inland garrisons were commanded by officers of the same party; but their troops, being so much dispersed, could at present be of no manner of service. The Scots were faithful friends, and zealous for presbytery and the covenant; but a long time was required ere they could collect their forces, and march to the assistance of the parliament.

Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy. The parliament pretended to have the sequestered clergymen employed on useful public business. Their authority is very considerable, not only in the matter of discipline, but in matters of finance. The sequestrations, however, seem much too large, especially as the sequestration, during the time of war, could not be accounted an otherwise an unnecessary and unmerited. But yet the same sum presently is assigned in another book, called Royal Treasures of the Church. See Trial, vol. iv. 417, ed. p. 361.

Clement Walker's's History of Independency, p. 166. In the year 1647, there were 120,000 clergymen in England; and of these, 11,300 were sequestered. See Bishop, ed. vi. p. 306, and Part. Hist. vol. iv. p. 120.
In this situation, it was thought more prudent to submit, and by compliance to stop the fury of the enraged army. The declaration, by which the military petitioners had been voted public enemies, was recalled on the 8th June, and erased from the journal-book. This was the first symptom which the parliament gave of submission; and the army, hoping by terror alone to effect all its ends, stopped at St. Albans, and entered into negotiation with their masters.

Here commenced the encroachments of the military upon the civil authority. The army, in their communications on the subject, conveyed exactly what they deemed the parliament itself had set them, in their recent usurpations on the crown.

Every day they rose in their demands. If one claim was refused, they asked for still more; if they were rejected, they demanded what the army must have on certain other points. They appeared, in fact, more numerous and exorbitant; and were determined never to be satisfied. At first they pretended only to petition for what concerned themselves as soldiers; next, they must have a vindication of their character; then it was necessary that their enemies be punished: at last they claimed a right of modelling the whole government, and settling the nation.

They preserved, in words, all deference and respect to the parliament; but, in reality, insulted them and tyrannized over them. That assembly they pretended not to accuse: it was only evil counsellors, who seduced and betrayed it.

They proceeded so far as to name eleven members, whom, in general terms, they charged with high treason, as enemies to the army and evil counsellors to the parliament. Their names were Holli^, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotevorth, Sir William Johnston, Sir John Maynard, Massey, Glyn, Long, Harley, and Nicholas. These were the very leaders of the presbyterian party.

They insisted, that these members should immediately be expelled from the parliament, and be cast into prison. The Commons replied, that they could not, upon a general charge, proceed so far. The army observed to them, that the cases of Strafford and Laud were direct precedents for that purpose; that had eleven men among themselves not been given occasion for discourse, begged leave to retire from the House; and the army, for the present, seemed satisfied with this mark of submission.

Preceding that the parliament intended to levy war upon them, and to involve the nation again in blood and confusion, they required that all new levies should be stopped. The parliament complied with this demand.

There being no signs of resistance, the army, in order to save its own reputation, was removed, at the desire of the parliament, to a greater distance from London, and fixed their head quarters at Reading. They carried the king along with them in all their marches.

The whole situation appeared to him as a better situation than at Holdenby, and had attained some greater degree of freedom, as well as of consideration, with both parties.

All his friends had access to his presence: his correspondence with the queen was not interrupted: his chaplains were restored to him, and he was allowed the use of the library: his children were once allowed to visit him, and they passed a few days at Caversham, where he then resided. He had not seen the Duke of Gloucester, his youngest son, and the Princess Elizabeth, since he left London, at the commencement of the civil disorders; nor the Duke of York, since he went to the Scottish army. He was gratified with the pleasures of a court and the tumult of a camp, more passionately loved his family, than did this good prince; and such an instance of indulgence in the army was extremely grateful to him. Cromwell, who was always ready to the tune of the army, very unwillingly, confessed that he had never been present at so tender a scene; and he extremely applauded the benignity which displayed itself in the whole disposition and behaviour of Charles.

That artful politician, as well as the leaders of all parties, e Rush. vol. v. p. 505. 547. Clarendon. vol. r. p. 45.

The parliament, afraid of continuing any connection with the army, addressed him in a more respectful style than formerly; and invited him to reside at Richmond, and contribute his assistance to the settlement of the nation. The chief officers were treated with regard, and spoke in all occasions of restoring him to his lawful situation, of removing all obstructions and refractories. In the public declarations of the army, the settlement of his revenue and authority were insisted on. The royalists every where entertained hopes of the restoration of more ancient authority; and some of them, who had been some hours in arms for the cause, and who had contributed very much to discourage the parliament, and to forward their submission.

The king began to feel of what consequence he was, that the nation thought he should be restored; and he was confident that all parties would, at length, have recourse to his lawful authority as the only remedy for the public disorders. You cannot be without me, said he, on several occasions; You cannot settle the nation but by my existence. A people without government and without liberty, a parliament without authority, an army without a legal master: distractions every where, terrors, oppressions, confusions; from himself in this condition, whether long or short, all men, he hoped, would be brought to reflect on that ancient government, under which they and their ancestors had so long enjoyed happiness and tranquility.

Though Charles kept his ears open to all proposals, and expected to hold the balance between the opposite parties, he entertained more hopes of accommodation with the army. He had experienced the extreme rigour of the parliament, and that the irruptions of the people had still continued, he was never more desirous of being the representative of the nation, than that he would have the possession of the throne; he wished neither on the abolition of episcopacy, nor on the punishment of the royalists; the two points to which the king had the most extreme reluctance. And they demanded that he should form some accommodation with the army; the event for which he most ardently longed.

His conjunction too seemed more natural with the generals, than with that usurping assembly, who had so long assumed the entire sovereignty of the state, and who had declared their resolution still to continue masters. By gratifying a few persons with titles and preferments, he might draw over, he hoped, the whole military power, and, in an instance like this, at the scene of civil war. If they would offer the lieutenant of the Tower to Cromwell, the garter, the title of Earl of Essex, and the command of the army. Negotiations to this purpose were secretly conducted. Cromwell pretended to hearken to them; and was very ready to keep the door open for reconnoitration, if the course of events should, at any time, render it necessary. And the king, who had no suspicion that one born a private gentleman could entertain the daring ambition of seizing a sceptre transmitted through a long line of monarchs, indulged hopes that he would, at last, embrace a measure which, by all the motives of duty, interest, and safety, seemed to be recommended to him.

While Cromwell allowed the king by these expectations, he still continued his scheme of reducing the parliament to subjection, and depriving them of all means of resistance. To gratify the army, the parliament invested Fairfax with the title of Duke of Cambridge, in England and Ireland; and intrusted the whole military authority to a person who, though well inclined to their service, was no longer at his own disposal. The parliament, afraid of this forming some accommodation, had censured it for Ireland, and desired the rebellious army should be disbanded, or, in other words, punished for their fidelity. The forces in the north, under Ponte, had already mutinied against their general, and had entered into an association with that body of the army which was so successfully employed in exalting the military above the civil authority.  They accused as authors of the tumult, were expelled; and most of them retired beyond sea: seven peers were impeached; the mass of the rest, together with the Speaker, submitted to the Tower: several citizens and officers of the militia committed to prison: every deed of the parliament annulled, from the day of the tumult till the return of the eleventh so violent, that the city levies not only surrendered to the independents: regiments quartered in Whitehall and the Mews: and the parliament The army being reduced to a regular formed servitude, was the parliament at once, was appointed solemn thanksgiving for the restoration of their liberty.

The independent party among the Commons exulted in their victory. The whole authority of the nation, they imagined, was now lodged in their hands; and they had a clear prospect of moulding the government into that imaginary republic which had long been the object of their wishes. They had secretly concurred in all encroachments of the military upon the civil power; and they expected, by the terror of the sword, to impose a more perfect system of liberty on the reluctant nation. All parties, the king, the church, the parliament, the prelates, had been guilty of errors since the commencement of these disorders: but it must be confessed, that this delusion of the independents was, of all others, the most contrary to common sense and the established maxims of policy. Yet were the leaders of that party, Vane, Wilmot, St. John, Martyn, the men in England the most celebrated for prudence and humanity, and by their coloured pretences and professions, they had overreached the whole nation. To deceive such men, would argue a supererogative capacity in Cromwell; were it not that, besides the great difference there is between dark, crooked councils and true wisdom, an exorbitant passion for rule and authority will make the most prudent overlook the dangerous consequences of such measures as seem to tend, in any degree, to their own advantage.

The leaders of the army having established their dominion over the parliament and cut, ventured to bring the king to Hampton-court, and he lived, for some time, in that palace with an appearance of dignity and freedom. Such equality of temper did he possess, that, during all the variety of fortune which he underwent, no difference was perceived in his countenance or behaviour; and though a prisoner, in the bands of his most inveterate enemies, he supported, towards all who approached him, the majesty of a monarch; and that neither with less nor greater state than he had been accustomed to maintain. His manner, which was not in itself popular or gracious, now appeared amiable, from its great meekness and equity.

The parliament was informed of the application to him, and presented him with the same conditions which they had offered at Newcastle. The king declared accepting them, and desired the parliament to take the proposals of the army into consideration, and make the necessary orders for settling the public estate. He still entertained hopes that his negotiations with the generals would be crowned with success; though every thing, in that particular, daily bore a worse aspect.

Most historians have thought that Cromwell never was sincere in his professions; and that, having by force rendered himself master of the king's person, and, by fair pretences, acquired the countenance of the royalists, he had employed these advantages to the clearing of the parliament and afterwards thought of nothing but the establishment of his own unlimited authority, with which he esteemed the restoration, and even life of the king, altogether incompatible. This opinion, so much warranted by the boundless ambition and profound dissimulation of his character, meets with ready belief; though it is more agreeable to the narrowness of human views, and the darkness of futurity, to suppose that this daring usurper was guided by events, and did not yet foresee, with any assurance, that unparalleled greatness which he afterwards attained.

Many writers of that age have asserted, that he really intended to make a private bargain with the king; a measure which carried the most plausible
Intelligence being daily brought to the king, of menaces thrown out by the agitators, he began to think of retiring from Hampton-court, and of putting himself in some place of safety. The guards were trusted to the promiscuous concourse of people restrained; a more jealous care exercised in attending his person; all under colour of protecting him from danger; but really with a view of preventing him from escaping in his present situation. These artifices soon produced the intended effect. Charles, who was naturally apt to be swayed by counsel, and who had not then access to any good counsel, took suddenly a resolution of withdrawing himself, though without any concert, at least without any constitutional, leave for the future possession of his person.

11th Nov. Sir John Berkeley, Ashburnham, and Leg, he privately left Hampton-court; and his escape was not discovered till the following day when one of those who ensured his safety, his chamber found on the table some letters directed to the parliament, to the general, and to the officer who had attended him. All night he travelled through the forest, and arrived next day at Titchfield, a seat of the Earl of Southampton's, where the countess dowager resided, a woman of honour, to whom the king knew he might safely intrust his person. Before he arrived at this place, he had come to the sea coast; and expressed great anxiety, that a ship which he seemed to look for had not arrived; and thence, Berkeley and Leg, who were not in the secret, conjectured that his intention was to transport himself beyond sea.

The king could not hope to remain concealed at Titchfield; what measure should next be embraced was the question. In the neighbourhood lay the Isle of Wight, of which Lord Clarendon was governor. This man was entirely dependent on Cromwell, was the son and ward of that renowned daughter of the famous Hambden, who, during his lifetime, had been an intimate friend of Cromwell, and whose memory was ever respected by him. These circumstances were very acceptable; yet, because the king had great dread of Dr. Hammond, he thought proper to have recourse to him in the present exigency, when no other rational expectation of safety could be entertained by him. The king and Berckley were despatched to the island. They had orders not to inform Hammond of the place where the king was concealed, till they had first obtained a promise from him not to deliver up his majesty, though the parliament and the army should require him; but to restore him to liberty, if he could oot protect him. This promise, it is evident, would have been a very slender security; yet, as was thought, Leg, Ashburnham, imprudently, if not treacherously, brought Hammond to Titchfield; and the king was obliged to put himself into his hands, and to attend him to Carisbrooke-castle, in the Isle of Wigt, where, though received with great demonstrations of respect and affection, he was still under a suspicion.

Cromwell, being now entirely master of the parliament, and free from all anxiety with regard to the custody of the king's person, applied himself seriously to quell those disorders in the army, which he himself had so unfruitfully raised, and to restore the necessary instruments of government, both in the state, and by various measures against both king and parliament. In order to engage the troops into a rebellion against their masters, he had encouraged an arrogant spirit among the inferior officers and private men, and by the threat of misfortune against the appearance of civil liberty than of military obedience. The troops themselves were formed into a kind of republic; and the plans of imaginary republics, for the settlement of the state, were even forcefully employed against both king and parliament. Treasurier and Assessor would, by the general voice of mankind, be indisputably ascribed to the actors in such a villany. Some unexpected procedure must be attempted, which would astonish the world by its novelty, would bear the semblance of justice, and would cover its barbarity by the audaciousness of the enterprise. Striking in with the fanatical notions of the entire equality of mankind, it would ensure the devoted obedience of the army, and serve as a general engagement against the royal family, whom, by their open and united deed, they would so herculeanly affront and injure.

This measure, therefore, being secretly resolved on, it was requisite, by the king, to the state, and to conduct them from violence to violence, till this last act of atrocious iniquity should seem in a manner wholly inevitable. The king, in order to remove those fears and probabilities, which were perfectly pleaded as reasons for every invasion of the constitution, had offered, by a message sent from Carisbrooke-castle, to resign, during his own life, the power of the militia and the nomination to all the great offices; provided that, after his demise, these prerogatives should revert to the crown. But the parliament acted entirely as victors and enemies; and, in all their transactions with him, paid no longer any regard to equity or reason. At the instigation of the independents and army, they neglected his office and powers, and being now fully reduced to subjection, he proposed to make, for the future, the instruments of his authority. But the tenders, for so that party in the army was called, had no longer any effect in the court, and were not de facto made, and he was not divided of it. They secretly continued their meetings; they asserted, that their officers, as much as any part of the church or state, needed reformation; several arguments gained in solemn remonstrances and petitions. Separate rendezvous were concerted; and every thing tended to anarchy and confusion. But this distemper was soon cured by the rough but dexterous hand of Cromwell. He chose the opportunity of a return to the city, and spread the terror of the war. He seized the ringleaders before their companions: held in the field a council of war; shot one mutineer instantly; and struck such dread into the rest, that they presently threw down the symbols of sedition, which they had displayed, and thenceforth returned to their wanted discipline and obedience.

Cromwell had great deference for the counsels of Ireton; a man who, having grafted the soldier on the lawyer, the statesman on the samt, had adopted such principles as were fitted to introduce the severest tyranny, while they served no end, and the most unshodded license in human society. Fierce in his nature, though probably sincere in his intentions, he proposed by arbitrary power to establish liberty, and in prosecution of his imagined religious purposes, he thought himself dispensed from all the ordinary rules of morality by which inferior mortals must allow themselves to be governed. From his suggestion, Cromwell secretly called, at Windsor, a council of the chief officers, in order to deliberate concerning the settlement of the nation, and the future disposal of the king's person. In this conference, which commenced with devout prayers, poured forth by Cromwell himself, and other inspired persons, (for the officers of this army received instruction with thePRESSION of the Parliament,) was first opened the daring and unheard-of counsel, of bringing the king to justice, and of punishing, by judicial sentence, their sovereign, for his pretended tyranny and mal-administration. With these lives lived in prison, conspiracies, they knew, and insurrections, would never be wanting in favour of a prince, who was so extremely revered and beloved by his own party, and whom the nation in general began to regard with great affection and esteem. Cromwell thought it unbecoming the person in any case to be deprived of his property, imprisonment, conspiracies, they knew, and insurrections, would never be wanting in favour of a prince, who was so extremely revered and beloved by his own party, and whom the nation in general began to regard with great affection and esteem. The proclamation, which the House of Commons, on the 27th of November, had published against the king, was received by the army with the utmost approbation, and the highest gratitude. Cromwell, in a council of war, very justice his name was not publicly mentioned. Cromwell, in a council of war, very justice his name was not publicly mentioned.

The king regarded the pretension as unexampled, and exorbitant, that he should make such concessions to the army for settlement; and should boldly try his enemies for the conditions which they were afterwards to grant him. He required, therefore, a personal treaty with the parliament, and desired, that all the terms on both sides should be adjusted, before any concession on either side should be mustered on. The republican party in the House pretended to take fire at this answer; and openly inveighed, in violent terms, against the person and government of the king; whose name, at the same time, renounced for the future the power of making peers within the power of parliament, without consent of parliament. Only the fourth, he gave the two Houses power to adjourn as they thought proper: a demand seemingly of no great importance, but contrived by the independents, that they might be able to remove the parliament to places where it should remain in perpetual subjection to the army.

nate man, whose heart God had hardened; that those who, at the expense of their blood, had hitherto defended the parliament from so many dangers, would still continue, with fidelity and courage, to protect them against all opposition in this vigorous measure. "Teach them not," added he, "by your neglecting your own safety and that of the kingdom, (in which theirs too is involved,) to imagine themselves abandoned, and their interests abandoned to the rage and malice of an irreconcilable enemy, whom, for your sake, they have dared to provoke. Beware, (and at these words he laid his hand on his sword,) beware of doing that which may cause the security by some other means than by adhering to you, who know not how to consult your own safety." Such arguments prevailed, though ninety-one members had still the courage to oppose. It was voted that no more addresses be made to the king, nor any letters or messages be received from him; and that it be treason for any one, without leave of the two Houses, to have any intercourse with him. The Lords concurred in the same ordinance.

By this vote of non-addresses, (so it was called,) the king was in reality dethroned, and the whole constitution formally overthrown. So violent a measure was supported by the demand of the Commons for less violent measures. The blackest calamities were then thrown upon the king; such as, even in their famous remonstrance, they thought proper to omit, as incredible and extravagant: the poisoning of John Doe, the burning of Hoche, and the converting Irish massacre. By blazing his fame, laid that injury in their power, they formed a very proper prelude to the executing of violence on his person. No sooner had the king refused his assent to the four bills, than Hammond, by orders from the army, removed all his servants, cut off his correspondence with his friends, and shut him up in close confinement. The king afterwards showed to Sir Philip Warwick a decrepit old man, who, he said, was not capable of fire, and was the best company he enjoyed, during several months that this rigorous confinement lasted. No amusement was allowed him, nor society, which might relieve his anxious thoughts: to be speedily poisoned or assassinated was the only prospect which he had every moment before his eyes: for he entertained no apprehension of a judicial sentence and execution; an event of which no history hitherto furnished an example. Meanwhile, the parliament was very industrious in publishing, from time to time, the intelligence which they received from Hammond; how cheerful the king was, how pleased with every one that approached him, how satisfied in his present condition as if the view of their present slavery and captivity neither made him proper to infirmity, than alacrity, the general compassion of the people. The great source whence the king derived consolation amidst all his calamities, was undoubtedly religious; in which, he seems to have had nothing fierce or gloomy, nothing which enraged him against his adversaries, or terrified him with the dismal prospect of futurity. While every thing around him bore a hostile aspect; while friends, family, relations, whom he passionately loved, were placed at a distance, and unable to serve him; he reposed himself with confidence in the arms of that Being who penetrates and sustains all nature, and whose seventy, if received with piety and resignation, he regarded as the surest pledges of unexhausted favour.

The parliament and army, meanwhile, enjoyed not in tranquillity that power which they had obtained, with so much violence and injustice. Combinations and conspiracies, they were sensible, were everywhere forming around them; and Scotland, whence the king’s cause had received the first fatal disaster, seemed now to support and advance it. Before the surrender of the king’s person at Newcastle, and much more since that event, the subjects of discontent had been daily multiplying between the two kingdoms. The independents, who began to prevail, took all measures for opposing the parliament, and the presbyterians looked on with the greatest affection and veneration. When the Scottish commissioners, who, joined to a committee of English Lords and Commons, had managed the war, were ready to depart, it was proposed in parliament to give them thanks for their services and good offices. The independents insisted, that the words good offices should be struck out; and thus the whole brotherly and friendly intercourse between the two states of Scotland was turned itself into an acknowledgment of their being well-bred gentlemen.

The advance of the army to London, the submission of the parliament to the seige of the king at Holdenhuy, his confinement in Carisbrooke castle, were so many blows sensibly felt by that nation, as threatening the final overthrow of presbytery, to which they were so passionately devoted. The covenant was profanely called in the House of Commons an almanack out of date; and Scots priests, though complained of, had passed unencestred. Instead of being able to determine and establish orthodoxy by the sword and by penal statutes, they saw the sectarian army, who were absolute masters, claim an unbounded liberty of conscience, which the presbyterians regarded with the utmost abhorrence. All the violations put on the king, they loudly blamed, as repugnant to the covenant, and to the institution of the crown. And those very actions of which they themselves had been guilty, they denounced as treason and rebellion, when executed by an opposite party.

The First Lords, Holles, Lauderdale, and Lanerc, who were sent to London, protested against the four bills; as containing too great a diminution of the king’s civil power, and providing no security for religion. They complained, that notwithstanding this protestation, the bills were still persisted in; and contrary to the solemn league, and to the treaty between the two nations. And when they accompanied the English commissioners to the isle of Wight, they secretly formed a treaty with the king, for arming Scotland.

Three parties, at that time, prevailed in Scotland: the Royalists, who insisted upon the restoration of the king’s authority, without any regard to religious sect or tenet of church government; the Presbyterians, though complaining of, had passed unencestred. Instead of being able to determine and establish orthodoxy by the sword and by penal statutes, they saw the sectarian army, who were absolute masters, claim an unbounded liberty of conscience, which the presbyterians regarded with the utmost abhorrence. All the violations put on the king, they loudly blamed, as repugnant to the covenant, and to the institution of the crown. And those very actions of which they themselves had been guilty, they denounced as treason and rebellion, when executed by an opposite party.

When Pendennis castle was surrendered to the parliamentarians, the king, who then obtained his liberty, returned into Scotland; and being generously determined to remember ancient favours, more than recent injuries, he immediately embraced, with zeal and success, the protection of the royal cause. He obtained a vote from the Scottish parliament to arm 40,000 men in support of the king’s authority, and to call over a considerable body under Monro, who commanded the Scottish forces in Ulster. And though he openly protested, that the covenant was the foundation of all national security, he had entered into correspondence with the English royalists, Sir Marmaduke Langdale and Sir Philip Musgrave, who had levied considerable forces in the north of England.

The general assembly who sat at the same time, and was guided by Argyle, dreaded the consequence of these measures, and foresaw that the opposite party, if successful, would effect the restoration of monarchy, without the establishment of presbytery. The king, before he had subscibed the covenant was, in their eyes, to restore him to his honour before Christ had obtained his ; and they thundered out anathemas against every one who paid obedience to the parliament. Two supreme independent judicaries were erected in the kingdoms;
one threatening the people with damnation and eternal torments; the other with imprisonment, banishment, and military execution. The people were distracted in their choice; and the armament of Hamilton’s party, though seconded by all the civil power, went on but slowly. The royalists he would not as yet allow to join him, lest he might give offence to the ecclesiastical party; though he secretly promised them trust and preference as soon as his victory should be complete. While the Scots were making preparations for the invasion of England, every part of that kingdom was agitated with tumults, insurrections, conspiracies, and disorders. It is said that the people gave, from their prejudices in government; because the new settlement, jealous and insecure, must commonly be supported with more expense and severity than the old: but on no occasion was the truth of this maxim more sensibly felt, than in the present situation of England. Complaints against the oppression of ship-money, against the tyranny of the star-chamber, had roused the people to arms; and having gained a complete victory over the crown, they found themselves loaded with a multitude of taxes, formerly known: and scarcely an appearance of law and liberty remained in the administration. The presbyterians, who had chiefly supported the war, were enraged to find the prize, just when it seemed within their reach, snatched from them by violence from the royalists. The royalty, disappointed in their expectations, by the cruel treatment which the king now received from the army, were strongly animsted to restore him to liberty, and their efforts were unavailing. All the eleven impeachments were revoked, and the king himself, by which they were expelled, was reversed. The vote too of non-addresses was repealed; and commissioners, five Peers and ten Commons, were sent to Newport in the Isle of Wight, in order to treat with the king. He was allowed to summon, but not to choose, his Parliament; his bill against the trading and shipping of the people, that he might have their advice in this important transaction. The theologians on both sides, armed with their syllogisms and quotations, attended as auxiliaries. By them the idea of the superiority of the crown was maintained, and the assurance was but a bad prognostic of its extinction. Any other instruments seemed better adapted for a treaty of pacification.

When the king presented himself to this company, a great and sensible alteration was remarked in his aspect, from what it appeared the year before, when he resided at Hampton-court. The moment his servants had been removed, he laid aside all care of his person, and had allowed his beard and hair to grow, and to hang dishevelled and neglected. His hair was become almost entirely grey; either from the decline of years, or from that load of sorrows, under which he laboured, and which, it is said, inwardly and tenderly, made him prey upwardly on his sensible and tender mind. His friends beheld with compassion, and perhaps even his enemies, that grey and discrowned head, as he himself terms it, in a copy of verses, which the truth of the sentiment, rather than any elegance of expression, renders very pathetic. Having in vain endeavoured by courage to defend his throne from his armed adversaries, it now behoved him, by reasoning and persuasion, to save some fragments of it from these peaceable, and no less implacable, negociators.

The vigour of the king’s mind, notwithstanding the seeming decline of his body, here appeared unchanged and decayed. The parliamentary commissioners would allow none of his counsel to be present, and refused to enter into reasoning with any but himself. He alone, during the transactions of two months, was obliged to maintain the argument against fifteen men of the greatest parts and capacity in both Houses; and no advantage was ever obtained over him. This was the scene, above all others, in which he was qualified to excel. A quick conception, a cultivated understanding, a clear and luminous imagination, by these accomplishments he triumphed in all discussions of cold and temperate reasoning. The king is much changed, said the Earl of Salisbury to Sir Philip Warwick: He is extremely trifling; and of the same opinion, Sir Philip; he was always so: but you are now at last sensible

The establishment of the army was at this time 26,000 men; but by enlarging supernumeraries, the regiments were greatly augmented, and commonly consisted of more than double stating, and thus increased the cord of Hennamer’s regiment, 2500 men, and sent them to Pembroke, and were there closely besieged, and soon after taken by Cromwell. Lambert was opposed to Langrave and Musgrave in the north, and gained their adherents. Sir Michael Livesey defeated the Earl of Holland at Kingston, and, pursuing his victory, took him prisoner at St. Neots. Fairfax, having routed the Kentish royalists at Maidstone, followed the broken army; and when they joined the royalists of Essex, and threw themselves into Colchester, he had siege to that place, which defended itself to the last extremity. A new fleet was manned and set out under the command of Warwick, to oppose the revolting ships of which the prince had taken the command.

While the forces were employed in all quarters, the parliament regained its liberty, and began to act with its renewed courage and spirit. The victorious army, which had withdrawn, from terror of the army, returned; and infusing boldness into their companions, restored to the presbyterian party the ascendant which it had formerly lost. The collection of the money which had been raised by proclamation, and for which the king had been rejected, was a triumph, by which they were expelled, was reversed. The vote too of non-addresses was repealed; and commissioners, five Peers and ten Commons, were sent to Newport in the Isle of Wight, in order to treat with the king. He was allowed to summon, but not to choose, his Parliament; his bill against the trading and shipping of the people, that he might have their advice in this important transaction. The theologians on both sides, armed with their syllogisms and quotations, attended as auxiliaries. By them the idea of the superiority of the crown was maintained, and the assurance was but a bad prognostic of its extinction. Any other instruments seemed better adapted for a treaty of pacification.

When the king presented himself to this company, a great and sensible alteration was remarked in his aspect, from what it appeared the year before, when he resided at Hampton-court. The moment his servants had been removed, he laid aside all care of his person, and had allowed his beard and hair to grow, and to hang dishevelled and neglected. His hair was become almost entirely grey; either from the decline of years, or from that load of sorrows, under which he laboured, and which, it is said, inwardly and tenderly, made him prey upwardly on his sensible and tender mind. His friends beheld with compassion, and perhaps even his enemies, that grey and discrowned head, as he himself terms it, in a copy of verses, which the truth of the sentiment, rather than any elegance of expression, renders very pathetic. Having in vain endeavoured by courage to defend his throne from his armed adversaries, it now behoved him, by reasoning and persuasion, to save some fragments of it from these peaceable, and no less implacable, negociators.

The vigour of the king’s mind, notwithstanding the seeming decline of his body, here appeared unchanged and decayed. The parliamentary commissioners would allow none of his counsel to be present, and refused to enter into reasoning with any but himself. He alone, during the transactions of two months, was obliged to maintain the argument against fifteen men of the greatest parts and capacity in both Houses; and no advantage was ever obtained over him. This was the scene, above all others, in which he was qualified to excel. A quick conception, a cultivated understanding, a clear and luminous imagination, by these accomplishments he triumphed in all discussions of cold and temperate reasoning. The king is much changed, said the Earl of Salisbury to Sir Philip Warwick: He is extremely trifling; and of the same opinion, Sir Philip; he was always so: but you are now at last sensible

The establishment of the army was at this time 26,000 men; but by enlarging supernumeraries, the regiments were greatly augmented, and commonly consisted of more than double stating, and thus increased the cord of Hennamer’s regiment, 2500 men, and sent them to Pembroke, and were there closely besieged, and soon after taken by Cromwell. Lambert was opposed to Langrave and Musgrave in the north, and gained their adherents. Sir Michael Livesey defeated the Earl of Holland at Kingston, and, pursuing his victory, took him prisoner at St. Neots. Fairfax, having routed the Kentish royalists at Maidstone, followed the broken army; and when they joined the royalists of Essex, and threw themselves into Colchester, he had siege to that place, which defended itself to the last extremity. A new fleet was manned and set out under the command of Warwick, to oppose the revolting ships of which the prince had taken the command.

While the forces were employed in all quarters, the parliament regained its liberty, and began to act with its renewed courage and spirit. The victorious army, which had withdrawn, from terror of the army, returned; and infusing boldness into their companions, restored to the presbyterian party the ascendant which it had formerly lost. The collection of the money which had been raised by proclamation, and for which the king had been rejected, was a triumph, by which they were expelled, was reversed. The vote too of non-addresses was repealed; and commissioners, five Peers and ten Commons, were sent to Newport in the Isle of Wight, in order to treat with the king. He was allowed to summon, but not to choose, his Parliament; his bill against the trading and shipping of the people, that he might have their advice in this important transaction. The theologians on both sides, armed with their syllogisms and quotations, attended as auxiliaries. Having in vain endeavoured by courage to defend his throne from his armed adversaries, it now behoved him, by reasoning and persuasion, to save some fragments of it from these peaceable, and no less implacable, negociators.

The vigour of the king’s mind, notwithstanding the seeming decline of his body, here appeared unchanged and decayed. The parliamentary commissioners would allow none of his counsel to be present, and refused to enter into reasoning with any but himself. He alone, during the transactions of two months, was obliged to maintain the argument against fifteen men of the greatest parts and capacity in both Houses; and no advantage was ever obtained over him. This was the scene, above all others, in which he was qualified to excel. A quick conception, a cultivated understanding, a clear and luminous imagination, by these accomplishments he triumphed in all discussions of cold and temperate reasoning. The king is much changed, said the Earl of Salisbury to Sir Philip Warwick: He is extremely trifling; and of the same opinion, Sir Philip; he was always so: but you are now at last sensible him the more in those religious principles, which had ever a considerable influence over him. His desire, however, of finishing an accommodation induced him to go as far in both these particulars, as he thought anywise consistent with the exigencies of reason.

The estates of the royalists being, at that time, almost entirely under sequestration, Charles, who could give them no protection, consented that they should pay such compositions as the law required. He prevented the king only begged that they might be made as moderate as possible. He had not the disposal of offices; and it seemed but a small sacrifice to consent, that a certain number of their friends should be allowed to serve in the army, militia, and other employments. But when the parliament demanded a bill of atonement and punishment against seven persons, the Marquess of Newcastle, Lord Digby, Lord Biron, Sir Marwood Langdale, Sir Richard Granville, Sir Francis Dodg-

Donnington, and Judge Jenkyns, the king absolutely refused compliance: their demand for a limited time he was willing to agree to.

Religion was the final point about which the differences had arisen; and of all others, it was the least susceptible of composition or moderation between the contending parties. The parliament insisted on the establishment of presbyteries, the sale of the church lands, the abolition of all forms of government in the church; and the king offered to refer every thing which he did not esteem of apostolical institution: he was willing to abolish archbishops, deans, prebends, causes: he offered, that the church lands, and all other offices made by parliament, should be valid, unless the whole treaty of pacification were concluded. He agreed that the parliament should retain, during the term of twenty years, the power over the militia and army, and that of levying what money they pleased for their support. He even yielded to them the right of remunerating, at any time afterwards, this authority, whenever they should find good reason for it, and that no contract made by consent should be valid, unless the whole treaty of pacification were concluded.

He agreed, that all the great offices, during twenty years, should be held by both houses of parliament. He also compromised with them the entire government of Ireland, and the conduct of the war there. He renounced the power of the wards, and accepted of 100,000 pounds a year in lieu of it. He acknowledged the validity of their great seal, and agreed to give them over his own, as a sort of accommodation. He abandoned the power of creating peers without consent of parliament: and he agreed that all the debts, contracted in order to support the war against him, should be paid by the people.

The king was accordingly confirmed in the English constitution by this treaty, that the king said, not without reason, that he had been more an enemy to his people by these concessions, could he have prevented them, than by any thing in his life.

Of all the demands of the parliament, Charles refused only two. Though he relinquished almost every power of the crown, he would not give up his friends to punishment, nor deers what he esteemed his religious duty. The severe renunciation, which he had undergone, for abandoning Strafford, had no doubt, confirmed him in his resolution never again to be guilty of a like error. His long solitude and severe afflictions had contributed to rivet pect them and himself from so dangerous an enemy. But the terms on which they insisted were so rigorous, that the king, fearing no worse from the most implacable enemies, was not so readily exclaimed to a conciliator. And so great, was the bigotry on both sides, that they were willing to sacrifice the greatest civil interests, rather than relinquish the most minute of their theological contentions. From them having used up the artifices of the independents, the treaty was spun out to such a length, that the invasions and insurrections were everywhere subdued; and the army had leisure to execute their violent and sanguinary purposes.

Civil war and attempts to recover those great views

Hamilton, having entered England with a numerous, though undisciplined, army, pressed not unite his forces with those of Langdale; because the English royals had refused to take the covenant; and the Scottish presbyterians, though engaged for the king, refused to join them on any other terms. The two armies marched together, though at some distance; nor could even the approach of the parliamentary army, under Cromwell, oblige the covenanters to consult their own safety, by a close union with the royals. When principles are so absurd and so destructive of human society, it may safely be averred, that the more sincere and the more disinterested they are, they only become the more ruinous and the more odious.

Cromwell feared not to oppose 8000 men, to the numerous armies of 20,000, commanded by Hamilton and Langdale. He attacked the latter by surprise, near Preston in Lancashire, and was driven by the covenanters in a heavy action, yet, not being succoured in time by their federates, they were almost entirely cut in pieces. Hamilton was next attacked, put to rout, and pursued to Uttoxeter, where he surrendered himself prisoner. Cromwell followed his advantage; and, marching into Scotland with a considerable body, joined Argyle, who was also in arms; and having suppressed Lamere, Montrose, and other moderate presbyterians, he placed the power entirely in the hands of his own party. The execration of the ecclesiastical authority, exalted above the civil, exerted the severest vengeance on all who had a share in Hamilton's engagement, as it was called; nor could any of that party recover trust, or even live in safety, but by doing solemn and public penance for taking arms, by authority of parliament, in defence of their lawful sovereign.

The Chancellor London, who had, at first, countenanced Hamilton's enterprise, being terrified with the menaces of the clergy, had, some time before, gone over to the other party; and he now openly in the church, though invested with the highest civil character in the kingdom, did penance for his obedience to the parliament, which he then refused to recognize. He also had, with many tears, and such pathetical addresses to the people for their prayers in this his uttermost sorrow and distress, that a universal weeping and lamentation took place among the deluded audience.

The loan of great sums of money, often to the ruin of families, was exacted from all such as by any suspicion of favouring the king's party; though their conduct had been ever so inoffensive. This was a device, fallen upon by the ruling party, in order, as they said, to reach Heart Malignants. Never, in this island, was known a more severe and arbitrary government, than was generally exercised by the patrons of liberty in both kingdoms.

The siege of Colchester terminated in a manner so less unfortunate than Hamilton's engagement for the royal cause. After suffering the utmost extremities of famine, after feeding on the vilest algums, the garrison desired, at last, to capitulate. Fairfax required them to surrender at discretion; and he gave such an explanation of these terms, as to reserve to himself power, if he pleased, to put them in the place of his soldiers. The officers endeavoured, though in vain, to persuade the soldiers, by making a vigorous sally, in break through, at least to sell their lives as dear as possible. They were obliged to accept of the conditions offered; and Fairfax, instigated by Ireton, to whom Cromwell, in his absence, committed over the government of the passive general, seized Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle, and resolved to make them instant sacrifices to military justice. This unusual severity was approved by all the leading generals; Col. Capel, fearful of danger, reproached Ireton with it; and challenged him, as they were all engaged in the same honourable cause, to exercise the same impartial vengeance on both of them. Sir John Hotham was at first shot, and he himself gave orders to fire, with the same alacrity as if he had commanded a platoon of his own soldiers. Lisle instantly ran and kissed the dead body, then cheerfully presented himself to a like fate. Thinking that the sirdens, destined for this execution, stood them the greater a comfort to them to come nearer: one of them replied, I'll warrant you, Sir, we'll hit you: he answered, smiling, Friends, I have been nearer you when you have missed me. Thus perished this generous spirit, not less beloved for his modesty and humanity, than esteemed for his courage and military conduct.

Soon after, a gentleman appearing in the king's presence, clothed in mourning for Sir Charles Lucas; that humane prince, suddenly recollecting the hard fate of his friends, paid them a tribute, which none of his own unparalleled misfortunes ever extorted from him; he dissolved into a flood of tears.

By these multiplied successes of the army, they had subdued all their enemies; and none remained but the helpless king and parliament, to oppose their violent measures. From Cromwell's suggestion, a remonstrance was drawn by the council of state, and presented to the parliament. They there complained of the treaty with the king; demand his punishment for the blood spilt during the war; require a dissolution of the present parliament, and assert, that though servants, they are entitled to represent these important points to their masters, who are themselves no better than servants and trustees of the people. At the same time, they advanced with the army to Windsor, and sent Colonel Eure to seize the king and his person at Hurst-castle in the neighbourhood, where he was detained in strict confinement.

This measure being foreseen some time before, the king was exhorted to make his escape, which was conceived to be very easy: but having given his word to the parliament not to attempt the recovery of his liberty during the treaty, and three weeks after, he would not, by any persuasion, be induced to hazard the reproach of violating that promise. In vain was it urged, that a promise given in the parliament could no longer be binding; since they could no longer afford him protection from violence threatened him by other persons, to whom he was bound in no tie or engagement. The kind and humane refections of casuistry, however plausible, in such delicate subjects; and was resolved, that what depredateions soever fortune should commit upon him, she never should forgive him of his honour.

The parliament lost not courage, notwithstanding the danger with which they were so nearly menaced. Though without any plan for resisting military usurpations, they resolved to withstand them to the uttermost; and rather to bring on a violent and visible subversion of government, than lend their authority to those illegal and sanguinary measures which they proposed. They set aside the remonstrance of the army, without design to answer it; they voted the sitting of the king's person to be without their consent, and sent a message to the general, to know by what authority that enterprise had been executed; and they issued orders, that the army should advance no nearer to London.

Hollis, the present leader of the presbyterians, was a man of unconquerable intrepidity; and many others of that party seconded his magnificent spirit. It was professed by them all, and this party everywhere; that they should, for their disobedience and usurpations, be proclaimed traitors by the parliament.

But the parliament was dealing with men who would not be frightened by words, nor retarded by any enemical delicacy. The generals, under the name of Fairfax, for he still allowed them to employ his name,) marched the army to London, and placing guards in Whitehall, the Mews, St. James’s, Durham-house, Covent-garden, and Palace-yard, surrounded the parliament with their hostile armaments.

The parliament, destitute of all hopes of prevailing, returned, however, courage to resist. They attempted, in the name of the nation, to detain the army with the king’s name, and though they had formerly voted his concessions with regard to the church and delineants to be unsatisfactory, they now took into consideration the final resolution with regard to their persons. After a sitting of three days, it was carried, by a majority of 129 against 83, in the House of Commons, that the king’s concessions were a foundation for the Houses to proceed upon in the settlement of the kingdom. When the Commons were to meet, Colonel Pride, formerly a drayman, had enclosed the House with two regiments; and, directed by Lord Grey of Groby, he seized in the passage forty-one members of the House of the presbyterian party, and sent them to a judget room, which passed by the appellation of hell; whence they were afterwards carried to several mans. Above 160 members more were excluded; and none were allowed to enter but the most furious and the most determined of the independents; and these exceeded not the number of fifty or sixty. This invasion of the parliament commonly passed under the name of Colonel Pride’s march, which opposed was a motion to make a war with the disaffection of those members, who had violently arrested the whole authority of government; and deprived the king of his legal prerogatives.

This same degree of the extremity, if this diminutive assembly desire that honourable name, retain not the least appearance of law, equity, or freedom. They instantly reversed the former vote, and declared the king’s concern for the people, and for the safety and well-being of the nation, and the necessity of the measure agreed upon; and, in short, they determined that no member, absent at this last vote, should be received, till he subscribed it as agreeable to his judgment. They renewed their former vote of non-addresses. And they ordered the person of Mr. William Waller, Sir John Covel, the general Massey, Brown, Copley, and other leaders of the presbyterian party, and sent them to a purged volun.

The seceding members having published a paper, containing an account of the violence which had been exercised upon them, and a protestation, that all acts were void, which from that time had been transacted in the House of Commons, the remaining members encountered it with a decree to the effect, that they pronounced it false, scandalous, seditious, and tending to the destruction of the visible and fundamental government of the kingdom. These sudden and violent revolutions filled the whole nation in terror and astonishment. Every man dreaded to be tampered with, in the contention between those mighty powers which disputed for the sovereignty of the state. Many began to withdraw their effects beyond sea; foreigners scrambled to give any credit to a people, so torn by domestic faction, and oppressed by military usurpation; even the internal commerce of the kingdom began to stagnate. And in order to remedy these growing evils, the generals, in the name of the army, published a declaration, in which they expressed their resolution of supporting law and justice.

The more to quiet the minds of men, the council of officers took into consideration a scheme, called The agreement for the peace; being the plan of a treaty to be substiuted in the place of that government which they had so violently pulled in pieces. Many parts of this scheme, for correcting the inequalities of the representative, are plausible; and the nation been disposed to receive it, or had the army intended to impose it. Other parts are too perfect for human nature, and savour strongly of that fanciful spirit so prevalent throughout the kingdom.

The height of all iniquity and fanatical extravagance yet remained; the public trial and execution of their sovereign. To this period was every measure precipitated by the zealots and tenders. The parliament, by the leaders of that party had intended that the army, themselves, should execute that daring enterprise; and they deemed so irregular and lawless a deed best fitted to such irregular and lawless measures. The people, however, renewed their address, and proposed the king’s taking into consideration the advancement of their common ends of safety and ambition. In the House of Commons, therefore, a committee was appointed to bring in a charge against the king. On the report a vote passed, declaring it treason in a king to levy war against his parliament, and appointing a High Court of Justice, to try Charles for this new invented treason. This vote was sent up to the House of Peers.

The House of Peers, during the civil wars, had, all along, been of small account; but it had lately, since the king’s fall, become totally contemptible; and very few members would submit to the mortification of attending it. It happened this time that besides the number of fifteen, of which there were assembled, to the number of sixteen. Without one dissenting voice, and almost without deliberation, they instantly rejected the vote of the lower House, and adjourned themselves to the next day, for the purpose of being able to retard the furious career of the Commons.

The Commons were not to be stopped by this so small an obstacle. Having first established a general council, which is noble in its spirit and seems specious, but is belied by all history and experience, That the people are the origin of all just power; they next declared, that the Commons of England, assembled in parliament, and no other than such chosen by the people, are the supreme authority of the nation, and that whatever is enacted and declared to be law by the Commons, hath the force of law, without the consent of king or House of Lords. The ordinance for the trial of Charles Stuart, King of England, as too, they called him, was again read, and unanimously assented to.

In proportion to the enormity of the violations and usurpations, were augmented the pretences of sanctity as those regarded. "Should any one have voluntarily proposed," said Cromwell in the House, "to bring the king to punishment, I should have regarded him as the greatest traitor; and whatever he have done afterwards, I would have punished it. I will pray to God for a blessing on your councils; though I am not prepared to give you any advice on this important occasion. Even myself, I had no such passions. When there was treachery, I was open to the supervision of the king, and considered this preternatural movement as the answer which Heaven, having rejected the king, has sent to my supplications." A woman of Hertfordshire, illuminated by prophetic visions, desired admittance into the military council, and communicated to the officers a revelation, which assured them that their measures were consecrated from above, and ratified by a heavenly sanction. This intelligence gave them great comfort, and much confirmed them in their present resolutions.

Colonel Harrison, the son of a butcher, and the most furious enthusiast in the army, was sent with a strong party to conduct the king to London. At Windsor, Hamilton, who was there detained a prisoner, was admitted into the king’s presence; and falling on his knees, the king, in a passionate appeal, declared that the blood I have indeed seen to you, replied Charles, embracing him. No further intercourse was allowed between them. The king was instantly hurried away. Hamilton long followed him with his eyes, all suffused in tears, and prognosticated, that in this short salutation, he had given the last adieu to his sovereign and his friend.

Charles himself was assured, that the period of his life...
was now approaching; but notwithstanding all the preparations which were making, and the intelligence which he received, he could not, even yet, believe that his enemies really meant to conclude their violations by a public trial and execution. A private assassination he every moment looked for, and, though Harrison assured him, that his apprehensions were entirely groundless, it was by that catastrophe, so frequent with dethroned princes, that he expected to terminate his life. In appearance, as well as in his character, the scene was painful. All the external symbols of sovereignty were withdrawn, and his attendants had orders to serve him without ceremony. At first, he was shocked with instances of rudeness and familiarity, to which he had been used in his own person, and which were at first intended in the number: but as they had affirmed, that it was contrary to all the ideas of English law to try the king for treason, by whose authority all accusations for treason must necessarily be conducted; their names, as well as those of some Peers, were afterwards struck out. Bradshaw, a lawyer, was chosen president. Coke was appointed solicitor for the people of England. Darnal, Steele, and Aske, were named assistants. The court sat in Westminster-hall.

It is remarkable, that, in calling over the court, when the crier pronounced the name of Fairfax, which had been inserted in the number, a voice came from one of the spectators, and said: 'He lays not what he is to be hanged. When the change was read against the king, In the name of the people of England; the same voice exclaimed, not a tenth part of them. Acted the officer, who guarded the court, giving orders to fire into the box whence these insolent speeches came; it was discovered that Lady Fairfax was there, and that it was she who had had the courage to utter them. She was a person of noble extraction, daughter of Horace, Lord Vere of Tilbury; but being seduced, by the false promises of love, her husband's band's zeal against the royal cause, and was now, as well as he, struck with abhorrence at the fatal and unexpected consequence of all his boasted victories.

The king's trial, as this transaction corresponded to the greatest conception that is suggested in the annals of human kind; the delegates of a great people sitting in judgment upon their supreme magistrate, and trying him for his misgovernment and breach of trust. The solicitor, in the name of the Commons, represented, that Charles Stuart, being admitted King of England, and intrusted with a limited power; yet nevertheless from a wicked design to erect an unlimited and tyrannical government, had traitorously and maliciously levied war against the present parliament, and the people whom they represented, and was therefore impeached as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth. After the charge was finished, the president directed his discourse to the king, and told him, that the court expected his answer.

The king, though long detained a prisoner, and now produced as a criminal, sustained, by his magnanimous courage, the majesty of a monarch. With great temper and dignity, he declined the authority of the court, and refused to submit himself to their jurisdiction. He represented, that having been engaged in treaty with his two Houses of parliament, and having finished almost every article, he had expected to be brought to his capital in another manner, and ere this time, to have been restored to his liberty; that he could not now perceive any appearance of the upper House, so essential a member of the constitution; and had learned, that even the Commons, whose authority was pretended, were subdues by lawless force, and were bereaved of their liberty: that he himself was their native hereditary king; nor was the whole authority of the military, which he was committed to try him, who derived his dignity from the Supreme Majesty of heaven; that, admitting those extravagant principles which levelled all orders of men, the court could plead no power derived from the people; unless the appearance of every individual, down to the meanest and most ignorant peasant, had been previously asked and obtained: that he acknowledged, without scruple, that he had a trust committed to him, and one most sacred and inviolable; he was intrusted with the liberties of his people, and would not now betray them, by recognising a power founded on the most atrocious violence and usurpation; that having taken arms, and frequently exposed his life in defence of public liberty, of the constitution, of the fundamental laws of the kingdom, he was willing, in this last and most solemn scene, to seal with his blood those precious rights for which, though in vain, he had so long contended: that those who arrogated a title to sit as his judges, were born his subjects, and born subjects to those laws, which determined, that the king can do no wrong: that he was not reduced to the necessity of sheltering himself under the protection of any thing but the English monarch, even the least deserving; but was able, by the most satisfactory reasons, to justify those measures, in which he had been engaged: that to the whole world, and even to them, his pretended judges, he was desirous, if called upon in a manner, to prove the integrity of his conduct, and assert the justice of those defensive arms, to which, unwillingly and unfortunately, he had had recourse; but that, in order to preserve a uniformity of conduct, he must at present forego the only source of his innocence; lest, by ratifying an authority, no better founded than that of robbers and pirates, he be justly branded as the betrayer, instead of being applauded as the martyr, of the constitution.

The president, in order to support the majesty of the people, and maintain the supremacy of his court above the prisoner, still inculcated, that he must not decline the authority of his judges; that they overruled his objections; that they were delegated by the people, the only source of every lawful power; and that kings themselves acted but in trust from that community, which had invested this high court of justice with its jurisdiction. Even according to those principles, in which the king was placed he was perhaps obliged to adopt, his behaviour in general will appear not a little harsh and barbarous; but when we consider him as a subject, and one too of no high character, his address, addressed to his unfortunate nation, in a style will be esteemed, to the last degree, audacious and insolent.

Three times was Charles produced before the court, and as often declined their jurisdiction. On the fourth, the judges having examined some witnesses, by whom it was proved that the king had appeared in arms against the forces commissioned by the parliament; they pronounced sentence against him. He seemed very anxious, at this time, to be admitted to a conference with the two Houses; and it was supposed, that he intended to resign the crown to his son: but the court refused compliance, and considered that request as nothing but a delay of justice.

It is confessed, that the king's behaviour, during this last scene of his life, does honour to his memory; and that in all appearances before his judges, he never forgot his part, either as a prince, or as a man. He maintained, in each reply, the utmost perspicuity and justice both of thought and expression; mild and equable, he rose into no passion at that unusual authority which was assumed over him. His soul, without effort or affection, seemed only to remain in the situation familiar to it, and to look down with contempt on all the efforts of human malice and injustice. The soldiers, instigated by their superiors, were brought, though with difficulty, to cry aloud for justice. "Why, fools! said the king, to one of his attendants; for a little money they would do as much against their commanders. Some of them were permitted to go the utmost length of brutal insolence, and to spit in his face, as he was conducted along the passage to the court. To exact a sentiment of party was the only effect which this inhuman insult was able to produce upon him.

The people, though under the rod of lawless unlimited power, could not forbear, with the most ardent prayers, pouring forth their wishes for his preservation; and, in his presence, to commend him, to their generous clamours for their monarch, whom, in their misguided fury, they had before so violently rejected.

The king was softened at this moving scene, and expressed his gratitude for their dutiful attention. One soldier, too, sustained by constant hours sympathy, demanded from Heaven a blessing on oppressed and fallen majesty: his officer, overhearing the prayer, beat him to the ground in the king's presence. The punishment, methinks, exceeds the offence: this was the reflection which Charles formed on that occasion. As soon as the intention of trying the king was known in foreign countries, so enormous an action was exclaimed against by the general voice of reason and humanity; and all men, under whatever form of government they were born, rejected this example, as the utmost effort of undisguised usurpation, and the most heinous insult on law and justice. The French, especially, by orders from the court, interposed in the king's behalf: the Dutch employed their good offices: the Scots exclaimed and protested against the violence: the queen, the prince, wrote pathetic letters to the parliament. All solicitations were found fruitless, with men whose resolutions were fixed and irrevocable.

Four of Charles's friends, persons of virtue and dignity, Richard, Herbert, Southampton, Lindsey, applied to the king, and procured that authority represented they were the king's best councillors, and had concurred, by their advice, in all those measures which were now imputed as crimes to their royal master: that in the eye of the law, and according to the rules of common justice, they alone were guilty, and were alone exposed to censure for every blamable action of the prince: and that they now presented themselves, in order to save, by their own punishment, that precious life, which it became the Commons themselves, and every subject, with the utmost hazard, to protect and defend. Such a generous effort tended to their honour; but contributed nothing towards the king's safety.

The people remained in that silence and astonishment which with all great passions, when they have not an opportunity of exerting themselves, naturally produce in the human mind. The soldiers being incessantly plagued with prayers, sermons, and exhortations, were wrought up to a determination to hasten their own ruin, to such acts of the most extreme disloyalty towards their prince, consisted their greatest merit in the eye of Heaven.

Three days were allowed the king between his sentence and his execution. The interval he passed with great tranquillity, chiefly in reading and devotion. All his family that remained in England were allowed access to him. It consisted only of the Princess Elizabeth and the Duke of Gloucester; for the Duke of York had made his escape. Gloucester was little more than an infant: the princess, notwithstanding her tender years, showed an advanced judgment; and the calumnies of her family had made a deep impression upon her. After many pious consolations and advices, the king gave her in charge to tell the queen, that, during the whole course of his life, he had never once, even in thought, failed in his fidelity towards her; and that his conjugal goodness and his life should have an equal duration. To the young duke, too, he could not forbear giving some advice, in order to season his mind with early principles of loyalty and obedience towards his brother, who was about to perform his sovereign duty. Holding him on his knees, he was about to say, "Now they will cut off thy father's head." At these words the child looked very steadfastly upon him. "Mark, child! what I say: they will cut off my head, and execute a sentence of pest: yet I say, though I am a king, as long as thy brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off thy brothers' heads, when they can catch them! And thy head too they will cut off at last! Therefore, I charge thee, do not be made a king by them!" The duke, sighing, replied, "I will be born in pieces first." So determined an answer, from one of such tender years, filled the king's eyes with tears of joy and admiration.

Every night, during this interval, the king slept sound as usual; though the noise of crowds, the noise of framing the scaffold, and other preparations for his execution, continually resounded in his ears. The morning of the fatal day he rose early; and calling Herbert, one of his attendants, he bade him employ more than usual care in dressing him so as to make him look as great and solemn as possible. Bishop Juxon, a man endowed with the same mild and steady virtues by which the king himself was so much distinguished, assisted him in his devotions, and paid the last melancholy duties to his friend and sovereign.

The street before Whitehall was the place destined for the execution: for it was intended, by choosing that very place, in sight of his own palace, to display more evidently the triumph of popular justice over royal majesty. When the king came upon the scaffold, he was found so surrounded with soldiers, that be could not but be heard by the crowd. They addressed therefore his discourse to the few persons who were about him; particularly Colonel Tomlinson, to whose care he had lately been committed, and upon whom, as upon many others, his amiable deportment had wrought an intense compassion. He justified his own innocence in the late fatal wars, and observed that he had not taken arms till after the parliament had enlisted forces; nor had he any other object in his warlike operations, than to preserve the constitution of the kingdom. He deputed his power towards his people, he acknowledged the equity of his execution in the eyes of his Maker; and observed, that an unjust sentence, which he had suffered to take effect, was now punished by an unjust sentence upon himself. He forgave all his enemies, even the chief instruments of his death; but exhorting them and the whole nation to return to the ways of peace, by paying obedience to their lawful sovereign, his son and successor, and of advising the people who were preparing for the block, Bishop Juxon called him, "Thou art, Sir, but one stage more, which, though turbulent and troublesome, is yet a very short one. Consider, it will soon carry you a great way; it will carry you from your present room to the place of your body; and then you will have the greatest joy, the prize to which you hasten, a crown of glory."

"I go," replied the king, "from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown; where no disturbance can have place." At one blow he was prepared for his fate. The workmen, in the full triumph of success and victory, were more dear to his people, than his misfortunes and magnanimity, his patience and piety, had rendered this unhappy prince. In proportion to their former delusions, which had animated them against him, was the violence of their return to duty and affection; while each reproached himself, either with active dissoluteness towards him, or with too indolent defence of his oppressed cause. On weaker minds, the effect of their example was insensible; and if they were said to have cast forth the untimely fruit of their womb: others fell into convulsions, or sunk into such a melancholy as attended them to their grave: now, some, unmindful of their own lives, were so confused by the loss of their beloved prince, it is reported, suddenly fell down dead. The very pullets were bedewed with unsuborned tears; those pulps, which had formerly thundered out the voices of impiety and anathemas against him. And all men united in their detestation of those hypocritical partizans, who, by sanctified pretences, had so long discredited those works of piety and piety of which they had torn an indefinable stain upon the nation.

A fresh instance of hypocrisy was displayed the very day of the king's death. The generous Fairfax, not content with the epithet of a good prince, which he had given to the king, on which he yet retained, to prevent the execution of the fatal sentence; and had even employed personation with his own regiment, though none else would follow him, to rescue the king from his disloyal murderers. Cromwell and Hopton, who had opposed him, were persuaded to recog- nize him that the Lord had rejected the king; and they exhorted him to seek by prayer some direction from heaven on this important occasion; but they concealed from him that they had already signed the warrant for the execution. Harrison was the person appointed to join in prayer with the unwary general. By agreement, he prolonged his doleful cant, till intelligence arrived, that the fatal blow was struck. He then rose from his knees, and insisted, with Fairfax, that this event was a miraculous and provo- cant answer, which heaven had sent to their devout supplications.2

The character of this prince, as that of most men, if not of all men, was mixed; but his virtues predominated extremely above his vices, or, more properly speaking, his imperfections: for scarce any of his faults rose to that pitch as to merit the appellation of vices. To consider him in the most favourable light, it may be affirmed that his dignity was free from pride, his humanity from weakness, his bravery from rashness, his temperance from austerity, his sagacity from jealousy, his suitableness from prolixity, his judgment from excess, his memory from forgetfulness, his temper from impetuousness, his judgment from harshness, his life from intemperance, his government from blindness, his actions from excess, his virtue from insincerity, his knowledge from obscurity, his piety from ostentation, his virtue from uncouthness, his reputation from turbulence, his humanity from indifferency. If it be granted that he was not without imperfections, and that his judgment and practice sometimes did not correspond to his understanding, the defects were of such a nature as may be cured by experience, and such as are to be regretted, but not imputed to his character.

To speak the most harshly of him, we may affirm, that many of his good qualities were attended with some latent frailty, which, though seemingly inconsiderable, was able, when seconded by the extreme inactivity of his fortune, to disappoint them of all their influence: his beneficient disposition was clouded by a manner not very gracious; his virtue was tempered with a disposition not free from hesitation, was disfigured by a deference to persons of a capacity inferior to his own; and his moderate temper exempted him from hasty and precipitate resolutions. He deserved to be reproached with a too frequent breach of promise; and was more fitted to rule in a regular established government, than either to give way to the encroachments of a popular assembly, or finally to subdue their pretensions. He wanted suppleness and dexterity sufficient for the first measure; he was not equal to take the second, to curb the rising ferment of the people. But he had been born an absolute prince, his humanity and good sense had rendered his reign happy and his memory precious; had the limitations on preroga- tive been in his time quite fixed and certain, his integrity had made him regard as sacred the boundaries of the consti- tution. Unhappily, his fate threw him into a period when the precedents of many former reigns savoured strongly of arbitrary power, and the genius of the people ran violently towards liberty. And if his political prudence was not sufficient to extricate him from so pernicious a situation, he may be excused; since even after the event, when it is commonly easy to discern, he stretched out his neck to the executioner, had said to Juxton, with a very earnest accent, the single word Rem- ember, great mysteries were supposed to be concealed under that expression; and the generals vehemently im- persuaded him that he should not doubt the king's meaning. Juxton told them, that the king, having frequently charged him to inculcate on his son the forgive- ness of his murderers, had taken this opportunity, in the last hours of his life, to sign the commission of which they would be regarded as sacred and inviolable, to reiterate that desire; and that his mild spirit thus terminated its present course, by an act of benevolence towards his grand- children.

This prince was of a comely presence; of a sweet, but melancholy, aspect. His face was regular, handsome, and well complexioned; his body strong, healthy, and justly proportioned. In a word, being of a natural frame, he was capable of enduring the greatest fatigues. He excelled in horsemanship and other exercises; and he possessed all the exterior, as well as many of the essential, qualities which form an accomplished prince.

The history of Charles I. is a question, whether the people, in any case, were entitled to judge and to punish their sovereign; and most men, regarding chiefly the atrocious usurpation of the pretended judges, and the manner in which the sentence was executed, were inclined to condemn the republican principle as highly sedulous and extravagant: but there still were a few who, abstracting from the particular circumstances of this case, were able to consider the question in general, and were inclined to moderate, not contradictory, the prevailing sentiment. Such might have been their reasoning. If ever, on any occasion, it were laudable to conceal truth from the populace, it must be confessed, that the doctrine of resistance affords an example: if all speculative consideration ought to be observed, with regard to this principle, the same cautious silence, which the laws in every species of government have ever prescribed to themselves. Government is, in order to reconcile the fury and detestation of the people; and being always founded on opinion, not on force, it is dangerous to weaken, by these speculations, the reverence which the multitude owe to authority, and to instruct them beforehand, that the case can ever occur, that they may be prepared and ready for it. Or should it be found impossible to restrain the license of human disquisitions, it must be acknowledged, that the doctrine of obedience ought alone to be inculcated, and that the exceptions, which are rare, ought seldom or never to be mentioned in popular reasonings and discourses. Nor is there any danger, that mankind, by this prudent reserve, should universally degenerate into licentiousness. For when the exception really occurs, even though it be not previously expected and descanted on, it must, from its very nature, be so obvious and undisputed, as to remove all doubt, and overpower the restraint, however great, imposed by teaching the general doctrine of obedience. But between resisting a prince and detesting him, there is a wide interval; and the abuses of power, which can warrant the latter violence, are greater and more enormous than those which will justify the former. History, however, supplies us with examples even of this kind; and the reality of the supposition, though, for the future, it ought ever to be little looked for, must, by all candid inquirers, be acknowledged in the past. But between detesting a prince and resisting him, there is a wide interval; and it was not strange, if even men of the most enlarged thought should question, whether human nature could ever in any monarch reach that height of depravity, as to warp, in uncontrolled hands, this last act of extraordinary jurisdiction. That illusion, if it be an illusion, which teaches us to pay a sacred regard to the persons of princes, is so salutary, that to dissipate it by the formal trial and punishment of a sovereign, will have more pernicious effects upon the people, than those which will justify the former. History, however, supplies us with examples even of this kind; and the reality of the supposition, though, for the future, it ought ever to be little looked for, must, by all candid inquirers, be acknowledged in the past. When and on the pedestal these words were inscribed: Exuit TYRANNUS, REGNUM ULTIMUS: The tyrant is gone, the last of the kings.

Duke Hamilton was tried by a new high court of justice, which sat in an appeal, and for the first time in England, in the twelfth, and indeed one of the great-some for treason. This sentence, which was certainly hard, but which ought to save his memory from all imputations of treachery to his master, was executed on a scaffold erected before Westminster-hall. Lord Capel underwent the same fate. Both these men had escaped from prison, but were afterwards discovered and taken. To all the solicitations of their friends for pardon, the generals and parliamentary leaders still replied, that it was certainly the purpose of Providence they should suffer; since it had permitted them to fall into the hands of their enemies,
after they had once recovered their liberty.

The Earl of Holland lost his life by a like sentence.
Though of a polite and curious behaviour, he died imolated by no party. His ingratitude to the king, and his frequent changing of sides, were regarded as great stains on his memory. The Earl of Norwich, and Sir John Owen, being condemned by the same court, were pardoned by the Commons.
The king left six children; three males, Charles, born in 1630, James, Duke of York, born in 1633, Henry,
Duke of Gloucester, born in 1641; and three females,
Mary, Princess of Orange, born 1631, Elizabeth, born 1635, and Henrietta, afterwards Duchess of Orleans, born at Exeter, 1644.
The Archbishops of Canterbury in this reign were Albemarle, Lord-Lieutenant; the Bishop of Lincoln, Lord Coventry, Lord Finch, Lord Latimer, and Sir Richard Lane; the high admirals, the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earl of Northumberland; the treasurer,
The Earl of Marlborough, the Earl of Portland, Juson, Bishop of London, and Lord Cottinon; the secretaries of state, Lord Conway, Sir Albertus Moreton, Coke, Sir Henry Vane, Lord Falkland, Lord Digby, and Sir Edward Nicholas.

It may be expected, that we should here mention the Icon Boulivi', a work published in the king's name a few days after his execution. It seems almost impossible, in the controverted parts of history, to say any thing which will satisfy the zealous of both parties: but with regard to the genuineness of that production, it is not easy for an historian to fix any opinion which will be entirely to his own satisfaction. The proofs brought to enforce this work is or is not the king's are so convincing, that if an impartial reader were on one side apart, he would feel it impossible that arguments could be produced, sufficient to counterbalance so strong an evidence: and when he compares both sides, he will be some time at a loss to fix any thing as a standard. Should an absolute suspension of judgment be found difficult or disagreeable in so interesting a question, I must confess, that I much incline to give the preference to the arguments of the royalists. The testimonies which prove that performance to be the king's, are more numerous, certain, and direct, than those on the other side. This is the case, even if we consider the external evidence: but when we weigh the internal, derived from the style and composition, there is no manner of comparison. These meditations resemble, in elegance, purity, neatness, and simplicity, the genius of those perfomances which we know with certainty to have flowed from the royal pen: but are so unlike the bombast, per-mixed, rhetorical, and corrupt style of Dr. Gauden, to whom they are ascribed, that no human testimony seems sufficient to convince us that he was the author. Yet all the evidences which would rob the king of that honour, tend to prove that Dr. Gauden had the merit of writing so fine a performance, and the fitness of imposing it on the world for the king's.

It is not easy to conceive the general compassion exitiated towards the king, by the publishing, at so critical a juncture, a work so much at variance with the present state of the nation; and inhuman and human,

Many have not scrupled to ascribe to that book the subsequent restoration of the royal family. Milton con-

but they had still many prejudices to overcome, many fears and jealousies to be allayed, ere they could cordially entertain thoughts of restoring the family, which they had so long sought, and whose principles they regarded with such violent abhorrence.

The only solid support of the republican independent faction, which, though it formed so small a part of the nation, had violently usurped the government of the whole, was an army of near half-twousand men. But this army, formidable from its discipline and courage, as well as its numbers, was actuated by a spirit that rendered it dangerous to the assembly which had assumed the command over it. Acquainted to indulge every chimeras in politics, every frenzy in religion, the soldiers knew little of the subordination of citizens, and had only learned, from apparent necessity, some maxims of military obedience. And while they still maintained that all those enormous violations of law and equity, of which they had been guilty, were justified by the success with which Providence had blessed them; they were ready to break out into any new disorder, wherever they had the prospect of a sanction and authority.

What alone gave some stability to all these unsettled humours was, the great influence both civil and military acquired by Oliver Cromwell. This man, suited to the age in which he flourished, and to that absolute feeling to gain the affection and confidence of men, by what was mean, vulgar, and ridiculous in his character; as to command their obedience by what was great, daring, and extraordinary. Familiar even to the Latitudinarians with the most respectable sentiments, he never lost his authority: transported to a degree of madness with religious ecstases, he never forgot the political purposes to which they might serve. Hating monarchy, while a subject; despising liberty, while a citizen; though he retained for a time all orders of men under a seeming obedience to the parliament, he was secretly paving the way, by artifice and courage, to his own unlimited authority.

The parliament, for so we must henceforth call a small and inconsiderable part of the House of Commons, having murdered their sovereign with so many appearing circumstances of solemnity and justice, and so much real violence and ever fury, began to assume more the air of a civil, legal power, and to enlarge a little the narrow bottom upon which they stood. They admitted a few of the excluded and absent members, such as were liable to least exception; but on condition that these members should sign an approbation of whatever had been done in their absence with regard to the king's trial: and some of them were willing to acquire a share of power on such terms: the greater part disclaimed to lend their authority to such absurd propositions. They issued writs for new elections, in places where they hoped to have interest enough to bring in their own friends and dependents. They named a council of state, thirty-eight in number, to whom all addresses were made, who gave orders to all generals and admirals, who executed the laws, and who digested all business before it was introduced into parliament. They pretended to employ themselves entirely in adjusting the laws, forms, and plan of a new representative; and as soon as they should have settled the nation, they professed their intention of restoring the power to the people, from whom they acknowledged they had entirely derived it.

The commonwealth found every thing in England composed into a seeming tranquillity by the terror of their arms. Foreign powers, occupied in wars among themselves, had no leisure or inclination to interpose in the domestic dissensions of this island. The young king, poor and neglected, living sometimes in Holland, sometimes in France, sometimes in Jersey, comforted himself amidst his present distresses with the hopes of better fortunes. The citizenship of Scotland and Ireland gave any immediate inequitude to the new republic.

After the successive defeats of Montrose and Hamilton, and the min of their parties, the whole authority in Scotland fell into the hands of Argyle and the rigid churchmen, that party which was most averse to the interests of the royal family. Their power, however, against the dangerous innovations of Scotland and Ireland was but small: and the party of Ormond, which had in the settlement of presbyterian discipline in England, carried them to embrace opposite maxims to their political conduct. Though invited by the English parliament to assume the government for the time being, they most resolved still to adhere to monarchy, which had ever prevailed in their country, and which, by the express terms of their covenant, they had engaged to defend. They considered besides, that as the prosperity of the kingdom lay in the support of this party, it could be done only by establishing a commonwealth, or without some chief magistrate, invested with royal authority, to preserve peace or justice in the community. The execution, therefore, of the king, against whom they had always protested, having occasioned a vacancy of the throne, they immediately proclaimed his son and successor, Charles II.; but upon condition of his good behaviour and strict observance of the covenant, and his entertaining no other persons about him, but such as were godly men and faithful to that obligation. These unusual clauses, inserted in the very first acknowledgment of their prince, sufficiently showed their intention of limiting extremely his authority. And the commonwealth of England did not care, at this time, for the affairs of that kingdom, allowed the Scots for the present to take their own measures in settling their government.

The dominion which England claimed over Ireland was of such importance, and the dangers of their efforts for subduing that country, in order to convey a just notion of Irish affairs, it will be necessary to look backwards some years, and to relate briefly those transactions which had passed during the memorable revolutions in England. When the late king agreed to that cessation of arms with the popish rebels, which was become so requisite, as well for the security of the Irish protestants as for promoting his interests in England, the parliament, in order to blacken his conduct, reproached him with favouring that odious rebellion, and exclaimed loudly against the terms of the cessation. They even went so far as to declare it entirely null and invalid, because finished without their consent; and to this declaration the Scots in Ulster, and the Earl of Inchiquin, a nobleman of great authority in Munster, professed to adhere. By their means the war was still kept alive; but as the dangerous distractions in England hindered the parliament from sending any considerable assistance to their allies in Ireland, the Marquis of Ormond, lord-lieutenant, being a native of Ireland, and a person endowed with great prudence and virtue, formed a scheme for composing the disorders of his country, and maintaining the harmony of his engagement with the royal master. There were many circumstances which strongly invited the natives of Ireland to embrace the king's party. The maxims of that prince had always led him to give a reasonable indulgence to the catholics throughout all his dominions; and one principal ground of that clemency, which the puritans professed against him, was that tacit toleration. The parliament, on the contrary, even when unprovided, had ever massacred the papists with the most rigid restraint; and if not a total extermination; and immediately after the commencement of the Irish rebellion, they put to sale all the estates of the rebels, and had engaged the public faith for transferring them to the adherents of the king, and already advanced in the same principles. The success, therefore, which the arms of the parliament met with at Naseby, struck a just terror into the Irish; and engaged the council of Kilkenny, composed of deputies from all the catholic counties and cities, to conclude a peace with the Marquis of Ormond. They professed to return to their duty and allegiance, engaged to furnish ten thousand men for the support of the king's authority in Ireland, and to prevent any sedition for their rebellion and toleration of their religion.

Ormond, not doubting but a peace, so advantageous and even necessary to the Irish, would be strictly observed, advanced with a small body of troops to Kilkenny, in order to concert measures for common defence with his new allies. The Pope had sent over to Ireland a nuncio, Rigg, who, with their other council, commanded him to empower him to direct the spiritual concerns of the Irish, was imbosed, by their ignorance and bigotry, to assume the chief authority in the civil government. Foreseeing that a general submission to the lord-lieutenant was not to be expected, he employed the priest, Owen O'Neal, who commanded the nature Irish, in Ulster, and who bore a great jealousy to Preston, the general chiefly trusted by the council of Kilkenny. By concert, these two malcontents seduced the new forces, and were ready to fall on Ormond, who remained in security, trusting to the pacification so lately concluded with the rebels. He received intelligence of their treachery, made his retreat with celerity and conduct, and sheltered his small army in Dublin and the other fortieth towns, which still remained in the hands of the insurgents.

The nuncio, full of arrogance, levity, and ambition, was not contented with this violation of treaty. He summoned an assembly of the clergy at Waterford, and engaged them to declare against that pacification, which the civil council had concluded with their sovereign. He even thundered out a sentence of excommunication against all who should adhere to it, and, to support this, a Catholic religion; and the deluded Irish, terrified with his spiritual menaces, ranged themselves everywhere on his side, and submitted to his authority. Without scruple, he carried in, the government, and threatened with a siege the protestant garrisons, which were, all of them, very ill provided for defence.

Meanwhile, the unfortunate king was necessitated to take shelter in the Scottish army; and being there reduced to close confinement, and secluded from all commerce with his friends, despaired that his authority, or even his liberty, would ever be restored to him. He sent orders to Ormond, if he could not defend himself, rather to submit to him than to invade Ireland. Accordingly, the lord-lieutenant, being reduced to extremities, delivered up Dublin, Tredah, Dundalk, and other garrisons, to Colonel Michael Jones, who took possession of them in the name of the English parliament. Ormond himself went over to England, was admitted into the king's presence, received a grateful acknowledgement for his past services, and during some time lived in tranquillity near London. Being banished, with the other royalists, to a distance from that city, and seeing every event turn out unfortunately for his royal master, and threaten him with a catastrophe still more direful, he thought proper to retire into France, where he joined the queen and the Prince of Wales.

In Ireland, during these transactions, the authority of the nuncio prevailed without control among all the catholics; and that prejudice, by his insinuation and insolence, soon made them repent of the power with which they had intrusted him. Prudent men likewise were sensible of the total destruction which was hanging over the nation from the English parliament, and saw no resource or safety but in giving support to the declining authority of the king. The Earl of Clanricarde, a nobleman of an ancient family, a person too of merit, who had ever preserved his loyalty, was sensible of the ruin which threatened his countrymen, and was resolved, if possible, to resist it. He formed a combination among the catholics, he entered into a correspondence with Inchiquin, who preserved great authority over the protestants in Munster; he attacked the nuncio, whom he chased out of the island; and he sent to Paris a deputation, inviting the lord-lieutenant to return, and take possession of his government.

Ormond, on his arrival in Ireland, found the kingdom divided into many factions, among which either open war or secret intrigue was1. He so far prevailed, that even the smallest of the English parliament was established in Dublin, and the other towns, which he himself had delivered into their hands. O'Neal maintained his credit in Ulster; and having entered into a secret intrigue with presbyterianism, there was more intent on schemes for his own personal safety, than anxious for the preservation of his country or religion. The other Irish, divided between their clergy, who were adverse to Ormond, and their nobility, who were attached to him, were very uncertain in their motions and feeble in their measures. The Scots in the north, enraged, as well against Ormond, as the new sect of catholics, emulated the example of the Irish, and formed a sect of their own, the presbyterians, professing their adherence to the king; but were still hindered, by many prejudices, from entering into a cordial union with his lieutenant. All these distracted councils and contrary humours checked the progress of the parliament, and enabled the young king to maintain their ground against him. The republican faction, meanwhile, in England, employed in subduing the revolted protestants, in reducing the parliament to subjection, and by the most forsooth he be attained to, it is much more likely that the parliament, totally neglected the supplying of Ireland, and allowed Jones, and the forces in Dublin, to remain in the utmost weakness and necessity. The lord-lieutenant, though surrounded with difficulties, neglected not the favourable opportunity of promoting the royal cause. Having at last assembled an army of 16,000 men, he advanced upon the parliamentary garrisons. Dundalk, where Monk commanded, was delivered up by the troops, who mutinied against their governor. Tredah, New, and other forts, were taken. Dublin was threatened with a siege; and the affairs of the lieutenant appeared to be so prosperous a condition, that the young king entertained thoughts of coming over into Ireland.

When the English commonwealth was brought to some tolerable settlement, men began to cast their eyes towards the neighbouring island. During the contest of the two churches, Ireland had become the object of intrigue; and the presbyterians endeavoured to obtain the allegiance for Waller, the independents for Lambert. After the execution of the king, Cromwell himself, being eminent for his conduct, retook the city; and, when his forces had taken it, marched out of it, to avenge his defeat, and to destroy his friends. The parliament, with his consent, distrusted the king of Scots, and ordered him to be brought to trial in London, where he was committed, on the 5th of March, to the Tower. The king was accused to be the cause of all the disorders among the Scotch, was charged with all the deeds of iniquity committed by his subjects, and was arraigned for the murder of the Duke of Buckingham. He denied all the charges, and declared his innocence. He was found guilty by the court, and sentenced to death. He was conveyed to the place of execution by word of command, and there suffered on the 17th of November, 1651, in the 5th year of his reign. He was then thirty years old; and, in that short space of time, had afforded a new and striking instance of the sudden transition from good to evil, which is so common in human affairs. The spirit of fanaticism, by which that assembly had at first been strongly supported, was now turned, in a great measure, against them. The pulpits being chiefly filled with presbyterian sermons, the newspapers for many years long been the scene of news and politics, could by no penalties be restrained from declarations unfavourable to the established government. Numberless were the extra-vagances which broke out among the people. Everard, a disband-Ed soldier, having procured that the time was now come when the community of goods would be renewed among Christians, led a band of followers to take possession of the land; and, having carried before the general, he refused to salute him; because he was but his fellow-creature. What seemed more dangerous, the army itself was infected with like humors. Though the levellers had for two years been suppressed, by the same spirit of the pamphlet of Cromwell, they still continued to propagata their doctrines among the private men and inferior officers, who pretended a right to be consulted, as before, in the administration of justice. They were contented against the present officers the same lesson which they had been taught against the parliament. They framed a remonstrance, and sent five agitators to present it to the general and council of war; these were received with indignation by sentence of a court-martial. One Locker, having carried his sedition further, was sentenced to death; but this punishment was so far from quelling the mutinous spirit, that above a thousand of his companions showed their adherence to him, by attending his funeral, and wearing in their hats black and scarlet ribbons, by way of favour. About four thousand assembled at Burford, under the command of Thompson, a man formerly condemned for sedition by a court-martial, but pardoned by the general. Colonel Reynolds, and afterwards Fairfax and Cromwell, fell upon them, while unprepared for defence, and seduced by the appearance of so many powerful armed men taken prisoners; some of them capitulated: the rest parted: and this tumultuous spirit, though it still lurked in the army, and broke out from time to time, seemed for the present to be suppressed.

Petitions, framed in the same spirit of opposition, were presented to the parliament by Lieutenant-colonel Lliburn, the person who, for dispersing seditious labels, had formerly been treated with such severity by the star-chamber. His petition was as attended with the same disturbance, and he was thrown into prison, as a promoter of sedition and disorder in the commonwealth. The women applied by petition for his release; but were now desired to mind their household affairs, and leave the government of the state to the men. From all quarters the parliament was harassed with petitions of a very free nature, which strongly spoke the sense of the nation, and proved how ardently all men longed for the restoration of their laws and liberties. For a time, which the city gave to the parliament and council of state, it was deemed a requisite precaution, if we may credit Walker and Dugdale, to swear all the cooks that they would serve nothing but wholesome food to them.

The parliament judged it necessary to enlarge the laws of high-treason beyond those narrow bounds, within which they had been confined during the monarchy. They even comprehended verbal oaths, many inten- tions, though they had never appeared in any overt act against the state. To affirm the present government to be a usurration, to assert that the parliament or council of state were tyrannical or illegal, to endeavour subverting their authority, or stirring up sedition against them; these offences were declared to be high-treason. The power of imprisoning, of which the petition of right had been a king, it was now found necessary to restore to the council of state; and all the loose and fears of the ruling party had represented as dangerous. The taxes, continued by the new government, and which, being unusual, were esteemed heavy, increased the general ill-will among which it laboured. The king's crusade to the East, the expulsion of one month was levied on had for the subsistence of the army. The sequestrations and compositions of the royals, the sale of the crown lands, and of the dean and chapter lands, though they yielded great sums, were not without some ill-effects, and, as was sus-pected, the great redeductions, of the parliament and of their creatures.

Amidst all these difficulties and disturbances, the strength of the Commons was behind the embarrassment, still pursued its purpose. While he was collecting an army of twelve thousand men in the west of England, he sent to Ireland, under Reynolds and Venables, a reinforcement of four thousand horse and foot, in order to strengthen Jones, and enable him to defend himself against the Marquis of Ormond, who lay at Finglass, and was making preparations for the attack of Dublin. Lechquane, who had now made a treaty with the king's lieutenant, having, with a separate body, taken Tredagh and Dundalk, gave a defeat to O'Farrell, who served under O'Neal, and to young Oot, who commanded some parliamentary forces. After he had joined his troops to the main army, with whom he was now furnished for some time, he went up along the river Lidy, and took post at Rathmines, two miles from Dublin, with a view of commencing the siege of that city. In order to cut off all further supply from Jones, he had assaulted and taken the island of Inchicore, about four miles of Dublin; and being exhausted with continual fatigue for some days, he had retired to rest, after leaving orders to keep his forces under arms. He was sud- denly awakened with the noise of firing; and, starting from his bed, saw every thing already in tumult and confusion. Jones, an excellent officer, formerly a lawyer, had rallied out with the reinforcement newly arrived; and, attacking the party employed in repairing the fort, he had succeeded the advantage, and fell in with the army, which had neglected Ormond's orders. Thse: he soon threw into disorder; put them to flight, in spite of all the efforts of the lord-lieutenant, closed them off the field; saved all their tents, baggage, ammunition; and returned victorious to Swezey. O'Farrell had not sailed out with his army, where he was welcomed with shouts and rejoicings. He hastened to Tredagh. That town was well fortified: Ormond had thrown it into a good garrison of three thousand men, under Sir Arthur Aston, an officer of reputation. He expected that Tredagh, lying in the neighbourhood of Dublin, would first be attacked by Cromwell, and he was desirous to employ the enemy some time in that place, while he himself should repair his broken forces. But Cromwell knew the importance of despatch. Having made a breack, he ordered a general assault. Sept.

Though twice repulsed with loss, he renewed Tredagh stormed, the attack, and himself, along with Ireton, led on his men. All opposition was taken when the jerry troops. The town was taken sword in hand; and, orders with revellions and imprisonments. And here I should put out my third leg: & c. being issued to give no quarter, a cruel slaughter was made of the garrison. Even a few, who were saved by the soldiers, saturated with blood, were next day massacrecl by the English. Had he well known, that almost the whole garrison was English; and his justice was only a barbarous policy, in order to terrify all other garrisons from resistance. His policy, however, had the desired effect. Having led the army without delay to Wexford, he advanced with a slight, formed defence, offered to capitulate; but, before they obtained a cessation, they imprudently neglected their guard; and the English army rushed upon them. The same severity was exercised at Tredagh.

Every town before which Cromwell presented himself, now opened its gates without resistance. Ross, though strongly garrisoned, was surrendered by Lord Talbot. Having taken Estmona, Cromwell threw a bridge over the Barrow, and made himself master of Passage and Carrig. The English had no further difficulties to encounter than what arose from fatigue and the advanced season. Fluxes and contagious distempers commenced among the soldiery in great numbers. Jones himself, the brave governor of Dublin, died at Wexford. And Cromwell had so far advanced with his decayed army, that he began to find it difficult, either to supply him with victual, or to retreat to his own garrisons. But while he was in these November, straits, Cork, Kinsale, and all the English garrisons in Munster, deserted him, and opening their gates, resolved to share the fortunes of their victorious countrymen.

This desertion of the English put an end to Ormond's authority, which was already much diminished by the misfortunes of his garrisons, Tredagh, and Wexford. The Irish, actuated by national and religious prejudices, would no longer be kept in obedience by a protestant governor, who was so unsuccessful in all his enterprises. The clergy renewed their excommunications against him and his adherents, and added the terrors of superstition to those which arose from a victorious enemy. Cromwell, having received a reinforcement from England, again took the field early in the spring. He made himself master of Kilkenny and Clonmel, the only places where he met with any vigorous resistance. The whole frame of the Irish union being in a manner dissolved, Ormond soon after left the island, and delegated his authority to Chauncerie, who held affiant promise out of no remedy. The Irish were glad to embrace this opportunity of commencing above 40,000 men passed into foreign service; and Cromwell, well pleased to free the island from enemies, who never could be cordially reconciled to the English, gave them full liberty and leisure for their embarkation.

While Cromwell proceeded with such uninterrupted success in Ireland, which in the space of nine months he had almost entirely subdued, fortune was preparing for him a new scene of victory and triumph in Scotland. Charles was at the Hague when Sir Joseph Douglas brought him intelligence that he was proclaimed king by the Scottish parliament. At the same time, Douglas informed him of the harsh conditions annexed to the proclamation, and extremely departed that joy which might arise from his being recognised sovereign in one of his kingdoms. Charles too considered, that those who pretended to acknowledge his title were at that time in actual rebellion against his family, and would be sure to intrust very little authority in his hands, and scarcely would afford him personal liberty and security. As the prospect of affairs in Ireland was at that time not promising, he intended to take his most furious and bgatoted of that party, which, notwithstanding his gentle government, had first excited a rebellion against the late king; after the most unlimited concessions, had renewed their rebellion, and stopped the progress of his victories in England; and after he had intrusted his person to them in his utmost distress, had basely sold him, together with their own honour, to his enemy, they had as their term of repentance, and even in the terms which they now proposed, displayed the same antimonarchical principles, and the same jealousy of their sovereign, by which they had been actuated as when they had no other principle than that the king, in his first enterprise, should sacrifice, merely for the empty name of royalty, those principles for which his father had died a martyr, and in which he himself had been strictly educated; that by this hypocrisy he might lose the royalists, who alone were sincerely attached to him; but never would gain the Presbyterian, who were averse to his family and his cause, and would ascribe his compliance merely to policy and necessity; that the Scots had refused to give him any assurances of their intending to restore him to the throne of Scotland, but would give him the next best; and had he made such an attempt, it had sufficiently appeared, by the event of Hamilton’s engagement, how unequal their force was to so great an enterprise: that on the first check which the opposers of Argyll gave him, his enemies would hold the quickest expedient for reconciling themselves to the English parliament, and would betray the king, as they had done his father, into the hands of his enemies; and that, however desirous the royal cause, it must still be regarded as highly imprudent to the king to make a sacrifice of his honour, where the sole purchase was to endanger his life or liberty.

The Earl of Lauderdale, and others of that party, who had been banished their country for the late engagement, were then with the king; and being desirous of returning home in his retinue, they joined the opinion of the young Duke of Buckingham, and earnestly pressed him to submit to the conditions required of him. It was urged that nothing would more gratify the king’s enemies than to see him fall into the snare laid for him, and by so scrofulous a means of his dominions. The pope was also of the same opinion, but for a pretext of excluding him: that Argyll, not during so far to oppose the bent of the nation as to throw off all allegiance to his sovereign, had embraced this expedient, by which he hoped to make Charles dethrone himself, and refuse a kingdom which was offered him: that it was not to be doubted but the same national spirit, assisted by Buckingham and his party, would rise still higher in favour of their prince after he had intrusted himself to their fidelity, and would much abate the rigour of the conditions now imposed upon him; that whatever might be the present intentions of the ruling party, they must unavoidably be engaged in a war with England, and must accept the assistance of the king’s friends of all parties, in order to support themselves against a power so much superior: that how much sooner a steady, uniform conduct might have been suitable to the advanced age and strict engagements of the late king, no one would throw any blame on a young prince for complying with conditions which necessity had extorted from him: that even the rigour of those principles professed by his father, though with some it had cast his character, had been extremely prejudicial to his interests, and could any thing be more than the royal cause, than to give all parties room to hope for more equal and more indulgent maxims of government: and that, where affairs were reduced to so desperate a situation, dangers ought little to be considered; and the king’s honour lay rather in showing some early symptoms of courage and activity, than in choosing strictly a party among theological controversies, with which, it might be supposed, he was as yet, very little acquainted.

These arguments, seconded by the advice of the queen-mother, and of the Prince of Orange, the king’s brother-in-law, who both of them thought it ridiculous to refuse a kingdom merely from regard to episcopacy, had great influence on Charles. But what chiefly determined him to comply, was the account brought him of the fate of Montrose, who, with all the circumstances of rage and contumely, had been put to death by his zalous countrypeople. Though in this instance the king saw, more evidently, the furious spirit by which the Scots were actuated, he had now no further resource, and was obliged to grant whatever was demanded of him.

Montrose, having laid down his arms at the command of the late king, had retired into France, and, contrary to his natural disposition, had lived for some time inactive at Paris. He there became acquainted with the famous Cardinal de Richelieu, and that great statesman celebrated him in his memoirs as one of those heroes, of whom there are no longer any remains in the world, and who are only to be met with in Plutarch. Desirous of improving his martial genius, he took a journey to Germany, was caressed by the emperor, received the title of marquis, and proposed to levy a regiment for the imperial service. While employed for that purpose in the Low Countries, he heard of the tragic death of the king; and at the same time received from his young master a renewal of his commission from his family; the king sending his arms and daring spirit needed but this authority to put him in action. He gathered followers in Holland and the north of Germany, whom his great reputation allured to him. The King of Denmark and Duke of Holstein sent him some small supply of money; the Queen of Sweden furnished him with arms; the Prince of Orange with ships; and Montrose, hastening his enterprise, lest the king’s agreement with the Scots should make him revoke his commissiou, set out for the Orkneys with about 500 men, most of them Germans. These were all the preparations which he could make against a kingdom, settled in domestic peace, supported by a disciplined army, fully apprised of his enterprise, and prepared against him. Some of his retainers having told him of a prophecy, that to him and him alone it was reserved to restore the king’s authority in all his dominions; he lent a willing ear to suggestions which, however wild or improbable, were so conformable to his own daring character.

He armed several of the inhabitants of the Orkneys, though an unwarlike people, and carried them over with him to their friends, who deservedly rejoiced in the king’s service, and the fame of his former exploits, would make the highlanders flock to his standard. But all men were now harassed and fatigued with wars and disorders: many of those who formerly adhered to him, had been severely punished by the covenanters; and no prospect of success was entertained in opposition to so great a force as was drawn together against him. But however weak Montrose’s army, the memory of past events struck a great terror into the committee of estates. They immediately ordered Lesley and Holbourne to march against him with an army of 4000 men. Strahan was sent before, with a body of cavalry to check his progress. He fell unexpectedly on Montrose, who had no horse to bring him intelligence. The royalists were put to flight; all of them either killed or taken prisoners; and Montrose Montrose himself, having put on the disguise of a peasant, was perfidiously delivered in his hands by his enemies, by a friend to whom he had intrusted his person.

All the insolence, which success can produce in ungenious minds, was exercised by the covenanters against Montrose, whom they so much hated and so much dreaded. The king’s party were very desirous of avenging injuries towards a person, whom they regarded as impious, on account of the excommunication which had been pronounced against him. Lesley led him about for several days in the same low habitat under which he had disguised himself. The vulgar, wherever he passed, were instigated to reproach and vilify him. When he came to Edinburgh, every circumstance of elaborate rage and insult was put in practice by order of the parliament. At the gate of the city he was met by the magistrates, and put into a new cart, purposely made with a high chair or bench, where he was placed, that the people might have a full view of him. He was led with a cord, chains had his feet from under him, and his shoulders, and fastened through holes made in the cart. The hangman then took off the hat of the noble prisoner, and rode himself before the cart in his livery, and with his bonnet on; the other officers, who were taken prisoners with the marquis, walking two and two before them.

The populace, more generous and humane, when they saw so mighty a chance of fortune in this great man, so lately their dread and terror, into whose hands the magistrates, for a few days before, had delivered on them the keys of the city, were struck with compassion, and viewed him with silent tears and admiration. The preachers, next Sunday, exclaimed against this movement of rebel nature, as they had done against the late measures, his profane tenderness towards the capital enemy of piety and religion.
When he was carried before the parliament, which was then sitting, Loudon, the chancellor, in a violent declaration, reproached him with the breach of the national covenant, which he had subscribed; his rebellion against God, the King, and the kingdom; and the many horrible murders, treasons, and impieties, for which he was now to be brought to condign punishment. Montrose, in his answer, maintained the same supremacy above his enemies, to which he had long been set up, and that by the free and conscious recognition of a good cause, he was justly entitled. He told the parliament, that since the king, as he was informed, had so far avowed their authority, as to enter into a treaty with them, he now appeared uncovered before their tribunal; a respect to himself, he said, had spared him from the solemnity of a trial; but his sovereign, they would in vain have required of him. That he acknowledged, with infinite shame and remorse, the errors of his early conduct, when their plausible pretences had seduced him to tread with them the paths of rebellion, and bear arms against his prince and country. That his following services, he hoped, had sufficiently testified his repentance; and his death would now alone for that guilt, the only one with which he could justly reproach himself. That in all his warlike enterprises he was warranted by that commission, which he had received from his master, against whose lawful authority they had entered into rebellion; and that, in his venture for life for his sovereign was the least part of his duties, he had even thrown down his arms in obedience to the sacred commands of the king; and had resigned to them the victory, which, in defiance of all their efforts, he was still enabled to obtain, and which he had shared in the field of battle; and many persons were now in his eye, many now dared to pronounce sentence of death upon him, whose life, forfeited by the laws of war, could not now be spared for any other purpose than that he might be put to death by him in the field of battle; and many persons were now in his eye, many now dared to pronounce sentence of death upon him, whose life, forfeited by the laws of war, could not now be spared for any other purpose than that he might be put to death by him in the field of battle. That he was sorry to find no better testimony of their return to allegiance than the murder of so faithful a subject, in whose death the king's commission must be, at other times, and in other places, false, for they had in vain endeavoured to vilify and degrade him by all their studied indignities; the justice of his cause, he knew, would ennoble any fortune; nor had he other afflictiun than the loss of the authority of his prince, with which he was invested, traded with so much impunity. And that he now joyfully followed, by a like unjust sentence, his late sovereign; and should be happy if, in his future destiny, he could follow him to the same blissful mansions, when his fate should overtake him. He had, without doubt, secured him an eternal recompence.

Montrose's sentence was next pronounced against him, "That he, James Graham, for this was the only name they had ever heard him use, called Montrose, had fled to Edinburgh cross, and there he been hanged, gibbet, thirty feet high, for the space of three hours; then be taken down, his head been cut off upon a scaffold, and affixed to the prison; his legs and arms been stuck up on the four chief towns of the kingdom: his body been buried in the place appropriated for common malefactors; except the church, upon his repentance, shall take off his excommunication."

The clergy, hoping that the terrors of immediate death had now given them an advantage over their enemy, flounced about him, and insulted over his fallen fortunes. They pronounced his damnation, and assured him, that the warlike virtues which he had show'd, would be a strange but an easy prologue to that which he must undergo hereafter. They next offer'd to pray with him: but he was too well acquainted with those forms of imprecation which they called prayers. None of his English friends, who had served his father, were allowed to remain in the kingdom. The king himself found that he was considered as a mere pageant of state, and that the few remains of his royalty, by which he possessed, served only to draw on him the greater indignities. One of the quarters of Montrose, his faithful servant, who had borne his commission, had been sent to Aberdeen, and was still allowed to hang over the gates when he passed by that place.

The general assembly, and afterwards the committee of estates and the army, who were entirely governed by the assembly, set forth a public declaration, in which they protested, "that they did not espouse any malignant quarrel or party, but fought merely on their former grounds of principles; that they disclaimed all the sins and guilt of the king, and of his house; nor would they own himself or his interest, otherwise than with a subordination to God, and so far as he owned and prosecuted the cause thereof, was contented to accomplish a measure, which nothing but the necessity of his affairs, and his great youth and inexperience, could excuse. He issued a declaration, such as they required of him. He gave thanks for the merciful dispensations of Providence, by which he was recovered from the snare of evil counsel, had attained a full persuasion of the righteousness of the covenant, and was induced to cast himself and his interests wholly upon God. He desired to be deeply humbled and afflicted in spirit, because of his father's following wicked measures, opposing the covenant and the work of reformation, and shedding the blood of God's people throughout all his dominions. He disdained the influence of his mother, and the toleration of it in his father's house; a matter of great offence, he said, to all the protestant churches, and a great provocation to him who is a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children. He disclaimed, that he would have no enemies but the enemies of the covenant; and that he detested all popery, superstition, prelacy, heresy, schism, and profaneness: and was resolved not to tolerate, much less to countenance, any of them in any of his dominions; but to declare, that he would never love or favour those who had so little conscience as to follow his interests, in preference to the gospel and the kingdom of Jesus Christ. And he expressed his hope, that whatever will succeed him, will be drawn upon his cause, yet now, having obtained mercy to be on God's side, and to acknowledge his own cause subordinate to that of God, divine Providence would crown his arms with victory.

Still the covenanters and the clergy were diffident of the king's sincerity. The facility which he discovered in yielding whatever was required of him, made them suspect, that he retained some of his opinions merely as ridiculous farces, to which he must of necessity submit, when he was not so far as a man. They had another trial prepared for him. Instead of the solemnity of his coronation, which was delayed, they were resolved that he should pass through a public humiliation, and do penance in the presence of the people. To this end several articles of repentance, which he was to acknowledge; and the king had agreed, that he would submit to this indignity. The various transgressions of his father and grandfather, together with the idolatry of his mother, are against enumerated and aggravated in these articles; and further declarations were insisted on, that he sought the restoration of his rights for the sole advancement of religion, and in subordination to the kingdom of Christ. In short, having exalted the altar above the throne, and brought royalty under their feet, the clergy were resolved to trample on it, and vilify it, by every instance of contumely, which their present influence enabled them to impose upon their unhappy monarch.

Charles in the mean time found his authority entirely annihilated, as well as his character degraded. He was consulted in no public measure. He was not called to assist at any council. His favor was sufficient to discredit any pretender to office or advancement. All efforts which he made to unite the opposite parties, increased the suspicion which the covenanters had entertained of him, as a flatterer, who, by art, reputation and compliances was partly led and partly governed by this wild faction, still turned a deaf ear to all advances which the king made to enter into confidence with him. A multitude of words were continued to be the objects of general hatred and persecution; and whoever noxious to the clergy, failed not to have one or other of these epithets affixed to him. The fanaticism which prevailed, being so full of sour and angry principles, and so overcharged with various antipathies, had acquired a new object of abhorrence: these were the Souverains. So prevalent was the opinion of witchcraft, that great numbers, accused of that crime, were burnt by sentence of the magistrates throughout all parts of Scotland. In a village near Edinburgh, which contained fourteen persons were punished by fire; and it became a science, every where much studied and cultivated, to distinguish a true witch by proper trials and symptoms.

The gathering of affairs under Cromwell was not able to appease or soften the animosities among the parties in Scotland. The clergy were still resolved to exclude all but their most zealous adherents. As soon as the English parliament found that the treaty between the king and the Scots would probably terminate in an accommodation, they made preparations for a war, which, they saw, would in the end prove inevitable. Cromwell, having broken the force and courage of the Irish, was sent for; and he left the command of Ireland to Ireton, who governed that kingdom in the character of deputy, and with vigilance and industry persevered in the work of subduing and expelling the natives.

It was supposed that Fairfax, who still retained the name of general, would continue to act against Scotland, and appear at the head of the forces; a station for which he was well qualified, and where alone he made any figure. But Fairfax, after the use of his name in murdering their sovereign, and offering violence to the parliament, had entertained insurmountable scruples against invading the Scots, whom he considered as zealous presbyterians, and united to England by the sacred claim of kinsmanship. He declared that he would never love or favour those at the extremities into which he had already been hurried; and was confirmed in his repugnance by the exhortations of his wife, who had great influence over him, and was herself a member of the presbyterian clergy. A committee of parliament was sent to reason with him; and Cromwell was of the number. In vain did they urge that the Scots had first broken the covenant by their invasion of England under Hamilton; and that they would soon renew their hostile attempts, if not prevented by the vigorous measures of the commonwealth. Cromwell, who knew the rigid inflexibility of Fairfax in every thing which he regarded as matter of principle, ventured to solicit him with the single recommendation of his humanity and tears of grief and vexation on the occasion. No one could suspect any ambition in the man who laboured so zealously to retain his general in that high office which he knew, from the character of Fairfax, to be the object of temper which made Cromwell a frantic enthusiast, rendered him the most dangerous of hypocrites; and it was to this turn of mind, as much as to his courage and capacity, that he owed all his wonderful successes. By the contagious ferment of his zeal, he engaged every one to co-operate with him in his measures; and entering easily and affectionately into every part which he was disposed to act, he was enabled, even after multiplied defeats, to cover, under a tempest of passion, all his crooked schemes and profound artifices.

Fairfax having resigned his commission, it was bestowed on Cromwell, who was declared captain-general of all the forces in Scotland. This command was intrusted to him, which stood entirely by arms, of the utmost importance; and was the chief step which this ambitious politician had yet made towards sovereign power. He immediately marched his forces, and entered Scotland with an army of 16,000 men.

The command of the Scottish army was given to Leslie, an experienced officer, who formed a very proper plan of defence for Edinburgh. A Rise in the supply of men, between Edinburgh and Leith, and took care to remove from the counties of Merse and the Lothians every thing which could serve to the subsistence of the English army. Cromwell, in the camp of the Scotch army, was discouraged by every expedient to bring Leslie to a battle, and the pro-

dent. The Scottishman knew that, though superior in numbers, his army was much inferior in discipline to the English; and he carefully kept himself within his entrenchments. By skirmishes and small encounters he tried to confirm his dispositions and even into the English lines, and shrewdly attacked the camps. His army daily increased both in numbers and courage. The king came to the camp; and having exerted himself in an action, gained on the affections of the soldiers. More was said of this young prince of spirit and vivacity, than under a committee of talking gossamens. The clergy were alarmed. They ordered Charles immediately to leave the camp. They also had some about 4000 Madogards and Englishmen, whose zeal had led them to attend the battle; who were the soldiers of chief credit and experience in the nation. They then concluded, that they had an army composed entirely of saints, and could not be beaten. They murmured extremely, not only against their prudent general, but also against the Lord, on account of his delays in giving them deliverance; and they plainly told him, that if he would not save them from the English sectaries, he should no longer be their God. An advantage having been offered itself on a Sunday, they hindered the general from making use of it, lest he should involve the nation in the guilt of Sabbath-breaking.

The defeat of the Scots was regarded by the English as a fortunate event. The army, which fought on both sides, were almost equally his enemies; and the vanquished were now obliged to give him some more authority, and apply to him for support. They had been forced to meet them at Dunbar, in Hamilton, Lauderdale, and all the English, were admitted into court and camp, on condition of doing public penance, and expressing repentance for their late transgressions.

The intended humiliation or penance of the king was changed into the ceremony of his coronation, which was performed at Scone with great pomp and solemnity. But all appearances of respect, Charles remained in the hands of the most rigid covenanters: and though treated with civility and courtesy by Argyle, a man of parts and address, he was little better than a prisoner, and was still exposed to all the rancor and pedantry of the ecclesiastics.

This young prince was in a situation which very ill suited his temper and disposition. All those good qualities which he possessed, his affability, his wit, his guile, his three or four gentleman-like, dissipated manners, which here so much recommended him in his private and public services; and his love of ease, liberty, and pleasure, was regarded as the highest enormity. Though arithmic in the practice of courtly dissimulation, the sanctified style was his own. He never allowed his countenance to give any hint of the court, in either the countenance, disposition, or deportment into that starched grime which the covenanters required as an infallible mark of conversion. The Duke of Buckingham was the only English courtier allowed to attend him; and by his lenient talent for ridicule, he had rendered himself extremely agreeable to his master. While so many objects of derision surrounded them, it was difficult to be altogether insensible to the temptation, and wholly to suppress the laugh. Obliged to attend from morning to night at prayers and sermons, they betrayed evident symptoms of weariness or contempt. The clergy never could esteem the king sufficiently regeneratized: and by continual exhortations, monitions, and reproaches, the remnant endeavoured to bring him to a juster sense of his spiritual duty.

The king's passion for the fair could not altogether be restrained. He had once been observed using some familiarity with a young woman, and a committee of ministers was appointed to reprove him for a behaviour so unbecoming a covenanting monarch. The spokesman of the committee, one Douglas, began with a severe aspect, informed the king that great scandal had been given to the godly, enlarged on the baneful nature of sin, and concluded with exhorting his majesty, whenever he was disposed to amuse himself, to be more careful, for the future, in shutting the windows. This delicacy, so unusual to the place and the character of the men thus regarded by the king, and he never forgot the obligation.

The king, shocked at all the indignities, and, perhaps, still more tired with all the formalities, to which he was obliged to submit, made an attempt to renew his liberty with General Middleton, at the head of some royalists, been persuaded by the covenanters, kept in the mountains, expecting some opportunity of serving his master. The king returned to the royal body. He secretly made his escape from Argyle, and fled towards the highlands. Colonel Montgomery, with a troop of horse, was sent in pursuit of him. He overtook the king, and persuaded him to return.
The royalists being too weak to support him, Charles was the more easily induced to comply. This incident procured him, afterwards, better treatment and more authority;
the covenanters being afraid of driving him, by their rigours,
to some desperate resolution. Argyle renewed his court-ships to the king, and the king, with equal dissimulation, pretended to repose great confidence in Argyle. He even went so far as to drop hints of his intention to marry that nobleman's daughter; but he had to do with a man too
wise, and too such a character as Argyle.

As soon as the season would permit, the Scottish army was assembled under Hamilton and Lesley; and the king was allowed to join the camp. The forces of the wars expedition, notwithstanding the imminent danger which threatened their country, were resolute not to unite their cause with that of an army which admitted any engagors or malcontents among them; and they kept in a body, as under Kames. They called themselves the Prestesters; and their frantic declamations equally against the king and against Cromwell. The other party were denominated Revolutioners; and these distinctions continued long after to divide and agitate the kingdom.

Charles encamped at the Torwood; and his generals
resolved to conduct themselves by the same cautious maxims, which, so long as they were embraced, had been successful during the former campaign. The town of Stirling lay at his back, and the whole north supplied him with provisions. Strong entrenchments defended his front; and it was in vain that Cromwell made every temptation to bring him to an engagement. After losing much time, the Scots determined to send Lambert over the Forth into Fife, with an intention of cutting off the provisions of the enemy. Lambert fell upon Holborne and Brown, who commanded a party of the Scots, and put them to the sword. Lambert also passed over, with his whole army; and lying at the back of the king, made it impossible for him to keep his post any longer.

Charles, reduced to despair, embraced a resolution worthy of a young prince contending for empire. Having the way open, be resolved immediately to march into England; where he expected that all his friends, and all those who were discontented with the present government, would flock to his standard. He persuaded the generals to enter into the same views; and with one consent, the army, to the number of 14,000 men, rose from their camp,
and advanced by great journeys towards the south.

He was not disappointed at this movement of the royal army. Wholly intent on offending his enemy, he had exposed his friends to imminent danger, and saw the king with numerous forces marching into England; where his personal general hatred with prevailed against the parliament, was capable of producing some great revo-

But if this conduct was an oversight in Cromwell, he quickly repaired it by his vigilance and activity. He despatched letters to the parliament, exhorting them not to be dismayed at the approach of the Scots; he sent orders every where for assembling forces to oppose the king: he ordered Lambert with a body of cavalry to hang upon the rear of the royal army, and infest their march;
and he himself accompanying Monk. At the reduction of Scotland, followed the king with all the expedition possible.

Charles found himself disappointed in his expectations of increasing his army. The Scots, terriified at the prospect of so hazardous an enterprise, fell off in great numbers. The English presbyterians, having no warning given them of the king's approach, were not prepared to move; and those who had him was himself, was rejected by whom the king expected; and they were further deterred from joining the Scottie army, by the orders which the committee of ministers had issued, not to admit any, even to this desperate extremity, who would not subscribe the covenant.

The Earl of Derby, leaving the isle of Man, where he had hitherto maintained his independence, was employed in levying forces in Cheshire and Lancashire; but was soon suppressed, and, by the order of the parliament, forced for the king, when he arrived at Worcester, found that his forces, extremely harassed by a hasty and fatiguing march, were not more numerous than when he rose from his camp
in the Torwood.

Such is the influence of established government, that the commonwealth, though founded in usurpation the most unjust and unpopular, had authority sufficient to raise every where the militia of the counties; and these, armed with the popular forces, bent all their efforts against the king. With an army of about 30,000 men, Cromwell fell upon Worcester; and attacking it on all sides, and meeting with but little resistance, was kept from Du ger, and General
Middleton, broke in upon the disordered royalists.
The streets of the city were strewn with dead. Hamilton, a noblemen of bravery and honour, was mortally wounded;
and Colonel Marsey, who became commanding, having made many proofs of personal valour, was obliged to fly. The whole Scottish army was either killed or taken prisoners. The country people, inflamed with national anguish, put to death the few that escaped from the field of battle.

The king left Worcester at six o'clock in The king's the afternoon, and, without halting, travelled about twenty-six miles, in company with fifty or sixty of his friends. To provide for his safety, it thought best to separate himself from his companions; and he left them without communicating his intentions to any of them. By the Earl of Derby's directions, he went to Boscobel, a lone house, in the borders of Staffordshire, habited by one Penderell, a farmer, to this man Charles intrusted himself. The man had dignity of sentiments much above his condition; and though death was his natural enemy, he had a strong regard for himself. If Charles should be taken, by his conduct, he had promised to any one who should betray him, he professed and maintained unshaken fidelity. He took the assistance of his four brothers, equally honourable with himself, and with him he attempted the danger. On their own, they led him into the neighbouring wood, put a bill into his hand, and pretended to employ themselves in cutting faggots. Some nights he lay upon straw in the house, and fed on such homely fare as it afforded.
For a better concealment, he mounted upon an eak, where he sheltered himself among the leaves and branches for twenty-four hours. He saw several soldiers pass by.
All of them were intent in search of the king; and some expressed, in his hearing, their earnest wishes of seizing him.
This tree was afterwards denominated the Royal Oak; and for many years was regarded by the neighbourhood with great veneration.

Charles, in the middle of the kingdom, and could neither stay in his retreat, nor stir a step from it, without the most imminent danger. Fears, hopes, and parties zeal interested multitudes to discover him: and even the smallest indiscretion of his friends might betray him. The king, joined Lord Wingate, who was skilful in the neighbourhood, agreed to put themselves into the hands of Colonel Lane, a zealous royalist, who lived at Pendray, not many miles distant. The king's feet were so hurt by walks in the night, that the Duke of Hamilton, who was sent out to find the king, did not fit him, that he was obliged to mount on horseback; and he travelled in this situation to Bentley, attended by the Pendrells, who had been so faithful to him. Lane sent several of his relations to join the parliament, but it was hoped, he would find a ship, in which he might transport himself. He had a near kinswoman, Mrs. Nor-the quiet. With her, even inclinations of a artisan were largely exposed and enlightened, but she was alarmed, but made the better promise that he would keep the secret from every mortal, even from his master; and he was faithful to his engagement.

No ship, it was found, would, for a month, set sail from Bristol, either for France or Spain; and the king was obliged to go elsewhere for a passage. He intrusted himself to Colonel Windham of Dorsetshire, an affectionate partisan of the royal family: the natural effect of the long civil war, and of the furious rage to which all men were wrought up in their different factions, was, that every one's inclinations and affections were thoroughly known, and either fully revealed or most men, the variety of incidents, had been put to trial. The royalists too, had, many of them, been obliged to make concealments in their houses for themselves, their friends, or more valuable effects; and the arts of studying the enemy had been frequently put to the test, and the betters were generally favourable to the king in the present exigency. As he often passed through the hands of Catholics, the Priest's Hole, as they called it, the place where they were obliged to conceal their presents, was sometimes employed for sheltering their distressed sovereign.

Windham, before he received the king, asked leave to intrust the important secret to his mother, his wife, and four servants, on which divers were chosen to try the king; these were, no one proved wanting either in honour or discretion. The venerable old matron, on the reception of her royal guest, expressed the utmost joy, that having lost, without regret, three sons and a grand-child in defence of his father, she was now restored, in her declining years, to be instrumental in the preservation of himself. Windham told the king, that Sir Thomas, his father, in the year 1636, a few days before his death, called to him his five sons: "My children," said he, "we have hitherto seen serene and quiet times under our last three sovereigns: but I must now warn you to prepare for clouds and storms. Factions arise on every side, and threaten the tranquillity of the kingdom. But do not you, faithfully honour and obey your prince, and adhere to the crown. I charge you never to forsake the crown, though it should hang upon a bush." "These last words," added Windham, "made such impressions on all our breasts, that the many afflictions of these sad times could never efface their indelible characters." From innumerable instances it appears, how deep-rooted in the minds of the English nation of that age was the principle of loyalty to their sovereign; that noble and generous principle, inferior only in excellence to the more enlarged and more enlightened affection towards a legal constitution. But during those times of military usurpation, these passions were the only principles in use.

The king continued several days in Windham's house: and all his friends in Britain, and in every part of Europe, remained in the most anxious suspense with regard to his fortunes: But when he was made known, that they were neither dead or alive; and the report of his death being generally believed, happily relaxed the vigilant search of his enemies. Trials were made to procure a vessel for his escape; but he was detained. "I made," said Windham, "many inquiries. Having left Windham's house, he was obliged again to return to it. He passed through many other adventures; assumed different disguises; in every step was exposed to imminent perils; and amidst every grief of uncorrected fidelity and attachment. The sagacity of a smith, who remarked that his horse's shoes had been made in the oorh, not in the west, as he pretended, once detected him; and he narrowly escaped. At Shoreham, in Sussex, a vessel was at last found, to which he embarked. He had been known to so many, that if he had not set sail in that critical moment, it had been impossible for him to escape. After one and forty days' concealment, he arrived safely at Fes-
camp in Normandy, where several who less than himself had, at different times, been privy to his concealment and escape. The battle of Worcester afforded Cromwell what he called his crowning mercy. So he was, that he intended to pursue the king to the sea, landed in the bay, and of Lambert and Fleetwood; but was dissuaded by his friends from exerting this act of regal authority. His power and ambition were too great to brook submission to the empty name of a republic, which stood chiefly by his influence, and was supported by his victories. How early he entertained thoughts of taking into his hand the reins of government is uncertain. We are only assured, that he now discovered to his intimate friends these aspiring views; and even expressed a desire of assuming the rank of king, which he had contributed, with such seeming zeal, to abolish. The little popularity and credit acquired the commonwealth by the republicanists further stimulated the wealth ambition of this enterprising politician. These men had not that large thought, nor those comprehensive views, which might qualify them for acting the part of legislators: their selfish aim was to increase their particular country's power. They carried their rigid austerity so far as to enact a law, declaring fornication, after the first act, to be felony, without benefit of clergy. They made small progress in that important work, which they professed to have so much at heart, the setting of a new model of representation, and fixing a plan of government. The nation began to apprehend that they intended to establish themselves as a permanent and spiritual legislature, and to define the power of 60 or 70 persons, who called themselves the parliament of the commonwealth of England. And while they pretended to bestow new liberties upon the nation, they found themselves obliged to infringe every title of those, which, through time immemorial, had been transmitted from their ancestors. Not daring to intrust the trials of treason to juries, who, being chanced indifferently from among the people, would have been little favourable to the commonwealth, and would have formed their verdict upon the ancient laws, they eluded that noble institution, by which the government of this island has ever been so much distinguished. They had evidently seen in the trial of Lilburne what their own fate would have been, if the most turbulent, but the most upright and courageous, of human kind, was tried for a transgression of the new statute of treasons: but though he was plainly guilty, he was acquitted to the great joy of the people. Westminster-hall, may the whole city, rang with shouts and acclamations. Never did any established power receive so strong a declaration of its usurpation and invalidity; and from no institution, besides the admirable one of juries, could be expected this magnanimous effort.

That they might not for the future be exposed to affrauds, which so much lessened their authority, the parlia-mant erected a high court of justice, which was to receive indictments from the council of state. This court was composed of men devoted to the ruling party, without name or character, determined to sacrifice everything to their own safety or ambition. Colonel Essebus Andrews and Colonel Walter Slingsby were tried by this court for conspiracy, and condemned to death. They were royalists, and refused to plead to before so illegal a jurisdiction. Love, Gibbons, and other prey-bearers, having entered into a plot against the life of the king, were also the accusers, and executed. The Earl of Derby, Sir Timothy Featherstooe, Bemboe, being taken prisoners after the battle of Worcester, were put to death by sentence of a court martial; a method of proceeding of unexampled rigour, and violation of right, for which a former parliament had so stern-budy contended, and which, after great efforts, they had estored to the king.

Excepting their principles of toleration, the maxims by which the republicans regulated all their public affairs were founded mainly on the principles of a perpetual peace, and a civil co-operation for the self-defense of the nation, and for the maintenance of a tolerable settlement, than those by which they conducted their civil concerns. The presbyterian model of congregation, classes, and assemblies, was not allowed to be finished: it seemed even the intention of many leaders in the parliament to resist of no established church, and to leave every one, without any guidance of the magistrate, to embrace whatever sect, and to support whatever clergy, were most agreeable to him.

The parliament went so far as to make some approaches in one province, to their independent model. Almost all the clergy of Wales being ejected as malcontents, itinerant preachers with small salaries were settled, not above four or five in each county; and these, being furnished with horses at the public expense, hurried from place to place, and carried, as they expressed themselves, the glad tidings of the gospel. They were all of them men of the lowest birth and education, who had deserted mechanical trades, in order to follow this new profession. And in this particular, as well as in their wandering life, they pretended to be more truly apostolical.

But, however, the court had, by the turn of their disposition, and by the nature of the instruments which they employed, better qualified for acts of force and vigour, than for the slow and deliberate work of legislation. Notwithstanding the distresses of the country, three counties, which in an earlier period, the power of England had never, in any period, appeared so formidable to the neighbouring kingdoms as it did at this time, in the hands of the commonwealth. A numerous faction, who had reason to return a vote in impeachment of the subjection to established authority, and to strike a terror into foreign nations. The power of peace and war was lodged in the same hands with that of imposing taxes; and now, that a power, so often the object of the members of the legislature, could any longer be apprehended. The present impressions, though much superior to what had ever formerly been experienced, were in reality moderate, and so much a sop opulent could easily bear. The military genius of the people had, by the civil contests, been rouzed from its former lethargy; and excellent officers were formed in every branch of service. The confusion into which all things had been thrown, had given opportunity to men of low stations to break through their obscuracy, and to raise themselves by their courage to commands which they were well qualified to exercise, but to which their birth could never have admitted them; and while so great a number were employed in such active hands, no wonder the republic was successful in all its enterprises.

Blake, a man of great courage and a generous disposition, the same person who had defended London. Tonnage, and provided with an abundance of provisions they were all alike. The king, which the late king was made an admiral; and though he had hitherto been accustomed only to land-service, into which too he had not entered till past fifty years of age, he soon raised the naval glory of the nation to a greater height than it had ever attained in any former period. A fleet was put under his command, and he received orders to pursue Prince Rupert, to whom the king had intrusted that squadron which had deserted to him. Rupert took shelter in Kings, and, escaping thence, fled towards the coast of Portugal. Blake pursued and chased him into the Tagus, where he intended to make an attack upon him. But the city of Portugal, moved by the same motives, which, throughout all Europe, attended the royal cause, refused Blake admittance, and aided Prince Rupert in making his escape.

To be avenged of this partiality, the English admiral made preparations for a descent upon the Spanish coast; and he threatened still further vengeance. The King of Portugal, dreading so dangerous a foe to his newly acquired dominion, and sensible of the unequal contest in which he was engaged, made all possible submissions, and, at the request of his emissaries, was invited to the haughty royal table.

public, and was at last admitted to negotiate the renewal of his alliance with England. Prince Rupert, having lost a great part of his squadron on the coast of Spain, made sail towards the westward with his fleet of thirty vessels, under his brother Rupert, who had a ship with a squadron to reduce them. Bermudas, Antigua, and Virginia, were soon subdued. Barbadoes, commanded by Lord Wil- loughby of Parham, made some resistance; but was at last obliged to submit.

With equal ease were Jersey, Guernsey, Scilly, and the Isle of Man, brought under subjection to the republic; and the sea, which had been much infested by privateers from these islands, was rendered safe to the English commerce. The Countess of Derby defended the Isle of Man; and with great reluctance yielded to the necessity of surrendering to the enemy. This lady, a daughter of the illustrious Henry, earl of Truro, illustrious in many actions during the civil war, displayed a manly courage by her obstinate defence of Latham-house against the parliamentary forces; and she retained the glory of being the last person in the island, who submitted to the victorious commonwealth.

Ireland and Scotland were now entirely subjected and reduced to tranquility. Ireton, the new deputy of Ire- land, at this time, set up a commonwealth, 30,000 strong, to subdue the work of subduing the revolted Irish; and he defeated them in many encounters, which, though of themselves now of no great moment, proved fatal to their declining cause. He himself, however, was not unmixedly happy, as he had no hand in the massacres. Sir Philip O'Neale, among the rest, was, some time after, brought to the gibbet, and suf- fered an agonous death, which he had so well meritied by his inhuman cruelties. Limencote, a considerable town, still remained in the hands of the Irish; and Ireton, after a vigorous siege, made himself master of it. He was here infected with the plague, and shortly after died; a memo- rable personage, much celebrated for his vigilance, intellec- tual, capacity, even for the strict execution of justice in that unlimited command which he possessed in Ireland. He was observed to be infallible in all his purposes; and it was believed by many, that he was assisted by a sincere and passionate love of liberty, and never could have been induced by any motive to submit to the smallest appear- ance of regal government. Cromwell appeared to be much affected with his death, as a fate to be visited upon the republicans, who posessed great confidence in him, which he did not show their regard for his merit and services, they bestowed an estate of two thousand pounds a-year on his family, and honoured him with a magnificent funeral at the public charge. Though the established government was lost, the mere shadow of a commonwealth, yet was it beginning, by proper arts, to encourage that public spirit which no other species of civil polity is ever able fully to inspire.

The command of the army in Ireland discharged on Lieutenant-General Ludlow. The civil government of the island was intrusted to commissioners. Ludlow continued to push the advantages against the Irish, and every where obtained success. The Irish, it was believed, were disgusted with the king on account of those violent de- clarations against them and their religion, which had been uttered by the Scots, applied to the King of Spain, to the Duke of Albecester, and the Chars, while Charles, unable to resist the prevailing power, made submis- sions to the parliament, and retired into England, where he soon after died. He was a steady cathoie; but a man more amiable by all just and impartial principles. I detain your favours: I labour your freemos, and am so far from delivering this island to your advantage, that I shall keep it to the utmost of my power and means, to the great plague, and I hope, that I should please you, friends, according to my promise; since you have delivered me from the enemy, in your late majesty's service, from which principles of fidelity I am not what devoted. I scawn your
The successes which attended Monk in Scotland were no less decisive. That able general laid siege to Stirling castle; and, though it was well provided for defence, it was soon surrendered to him. He there became master of all the northern provinces of the kingdom, and bore the title of Duke of Ermine. The Earl of Leven, and the Earl of Crawford, Lord Ogilvy, and other noblemen, having met near Perth, in order to concert measures for raising a new army, were suddenly taken by Lord Cockburn, and conveyed into Dalkeith. Sir Philip Musgrave, with some Scots, being engaged at Dumfries in a like enterprise, met with a like fate. Dundee was a town well fortified, supplied with provisions, and a council situated in the midst of all the rich furniture, plate, and money of the kingdom, which had been sent thither as a place of safety. Monk appeared before it; and having made a breach, gave a general assault. He carried the town; and following the example and instigation of Cromwell, put all the inhabitants to the sword, in order to strike a general terror into the kingdom. Warned by this example, Aberdeen, St. Andrews, Inverness, and other towns and forts, yielded, of their own accord, to the enemy's demands. This parliament, the English commonwealth; and excepting a few royalists, who remained some time in the mountains, under the Earl of Glencarne, Lord Balcarras, and General Middleton, that maintained independent governments, the acceptance of the independence, of poverty, and valour, maintained its independence, was reduced to total subjection.

The English parliament sent Sir Harry Vane, St. John, and some other commissioners, to the Kingdom of Scots; these men, who possessed little of the true spirit of liberty, knew how to maintain the appearance of it; and they required the voluntary consent of all the counties and towns of this continent of kingdom; and he sent them to the same commonwealth with England. The clergy protested; because, they said, this incorporating union would draw along with it a subordination of the church to the state in the things of Christ. The English judges, joined to some Scottish, were appointed to determine all causes; justice was strictly administered; order and peace maintained; and the Scots, freed from the tyranny of the ecclesiastics, were not much dissatisfied with the present government. The prudent conduct of Monk, a man who possessed a capacity for the arts both of peace and war, served much to reconcile the minds of men, and to allay their prejudices.

symptoms of an unfriendly, if not a hostile, disposition in the States. The States, alarmed at these steps, sent orders to their ambassadors to endeavour the renewal of the treaty of alliance, which had been broken off by the abrupt departure of St. John. Not to be unprepared, they equipped a fleet of a hundred and fifty sail, and took care, by their ministers at London, to inform the council of State of their intentions. The minister of England, instead of striking terror into the Dutch republic, was considered as a menace, and further confirmed the parliament in their hostile resolutions. The minds of men in both states were every day more irritated, not only by reason of this affair, but also by the constant reports, which was not long before these humours broke forth into action.

Tromp, an admiral of great renown, received from the States the command of a fleet of forty-two sail, in order to protect the Dutch navigation against the privateers of the English. He was forced, by stress of weather, as he alleged, to take shelter in the road of Dover, where he met with Blake, who commanded an English fleet much inferior in number. Who was the aggressor in the action, which ensued between these two admirals, both of them men of such prompt and fiery dispositions, it is not easy to determine; since each of them sent to his own state a relation totally opposite in all its circumstances to that of the other, and yet supported by the testimony of every captain in his fleet. Blake pretended that, having given a signal to the Dutch admiral to strike, Tromp, instead of complying, had attacked him, and found that he was preparing to strike, and that the English admiral, nevertheless, began hostilities. It is certain that the admiralty of Holland, who are distinct from the council of state, had given Tromp no orders to strike, but had left him to his own discretion with regard to that vain but much contested ceremonial. They seemed willing to introduce the claim of an equality with the new commonwealth, and to interpret the former respect paid the English flag as a deference due only to the monarch. The Dutch court therefore, a strong presumption against the narrative of the Dutch admiral. The whole Orange party, it must be remarked, to which Tromp was suspected to adhere, were desirous of a war with England.

Blake, though his squadron consisted only of fifteen vessels, reinforced, after the battle began, by eight under Captain Bourne, maintained the fight with bravery for five hours, and sunk one ship of the enemy, and took another. Night parted the combatants, and the Dutch fleet retired towards the coast of Holland. The populace of London were enraged, and would have insulted the Dutch ambassadors in England, had not the council of state sent guards to protect them.

When the States heard of this action, of which the consequences were easily foreseen, they were to the utmost confusion, and desirous to have a squadron of Holland, as their ambassador extraordinary to London, and ordered him to lay before the parliament the narrative which Tromp had sent of the late encounter. They entreated them, by all the laws of their common religion and common liberties, not to precipitate themselves into hostile measures, but to appoint commissioners, who should examine every circumstance of the action, and clear up the truth, which lay in obscurity. And they pretended that they had given no orders to their admiral to offer any violence to the English, but would severely punish him, if they found, upon inquiry, that he had been guilty of an action which they so much disapproved. The imperious parliament would have token to none of these reasons or remonstrances. Elated by the numerous successes which they had obtained over their domestic enemies, they thought that every thing must yield to their fortunate army to endeavour the renewal of the treaty which they sought, of making war upon the States. They demanded that, without any further delay or inquiry, reparations should be made for all the damages which the English had sustained, and that when this demand was not complied with, they despatched orders for commencing war against the United Provinces.

Blake sailed northwards with a numerous fleet, and fell upon the herring-busses, which were escorted by twelve men of war. All these he either took or dispersed. Tromp followed him with a fleet of above a hundred sail. When these two admirals were within sight of each other, and preparing for battle, a furious storm attacked them. Blake took shelter in the English harbours. The Dutch fleet was dispersed, and received great damage.

Sir George Ayscue, though he commanded only forty ships, according to the English accounts, managed to make a successful night attack on De Ruyter, who had under him fifty ships of war, with thirty merchantmen. The Dutch ships were indeed of inferior force to the English. De Ruyter, the only admiral in Europe who has attained a renown equal to that of the greatest general, defeated himself, for he killed, that Ayscue should over him. Night parted them in the greatest heat of the action. De Ruyter next day sailed off with his convoy. The English fleet had been so shattered in the fight, that it was not restored to the sea entirely of all English vessels.

Near the coast of Kent, Blake, seconded by Bourne and Pen, met a Dutch squadron nearly equal in numbers, commanded by De Witte and De Ruiter. A battle was fought much to the disadvantage of the Dutch. Their rear-admiral was boarded and taken. Two other vessels were sunk, and one blown up. The Dutch next day made sail towards Holland. The English were not deterred by the Mediterra nean. Van Galen, with much superior force, attacked Captain Badity, and defeated him. He fought, however, his victory with the loss of his life.

Sea-fight, indeed, had proved so far as to disable the vanquished from making head in a little time against the victors. Tromp, seconded by De Ruyter, met, near the Goodwins, with Blake, whose fleet was inferior to the Dutch, but who resolved not to decline the combat. A furious battle commenced, where the admirals on both sides, as well as the inferior officers and seamen, exerted great bravery. In this action the Dutch had the advantage. Blake himself was wounded. The Garland was taken, the Gloire was captured, the English were burned, and one sunk; and might have come home to save the English fleet. After this victory, Tromp, in a bravo, fixed a broom to his mastarm, as if he were resolved to sweep the sea entirely of all English vessels.

Great preparations were made in England, in order to wipe off this disgrace. A gallant fleet of eighty sail was fitted out. Blake commanded, and one, who had been sent from Scotland when the English lay off Portland, they descried, near break of day, a Dutch fleet of seventy-six vessels, sailing up the channel, along with ninety vessels of 300 men each. De Ruyter received orders to wait at the isle of Rhoë, till the fleet should arrive to escort them. Tromp, and under him, De Ruyter, commanded the Dutch. This battle was the most furious ever yet between two maritime and rival nations. Three days was the combat continued with the utmost rage and obstinacy; and Blake, who was victor, gained not more honour than Tromp, who was vanquished. The Dutch admiral made a skilful retreat, and saved all the merchant ships, except thirty. He lost, however, eleven ships of war, had 2000 men slain, and near 1500 taken prisoners. The English, though many of their ships were extremely shattered, had but one sunk. Their fleet were not much inferior in number to those of the enemy.

All these successes of the English were chiefly owing to the superior size of their vessels; an advantage which all the skill and bravery of the English in trials could not compensate. By means of ship-money, an imposition which had been so much complained of, and in some respects with reason, the late king had put the navy into a situation in which it was now superior in quality which they sought, of making war upon the States. They demanded that, without any further delay or inquiry, reparations should be made for all the damages which the English had sustained, and that when this demand was not complied with, they despatched orders for commencing war against the United Provinces.

Blake sailed northwards with a numerous fleet, and fell upon the herring-busses, which were escorted by twelve men of war. All these he either took or dispersed. Tromp necessity; but from vain points of honour and personal resentments, of which it was difficult to give a satisfactory account to the public. They resolved, therefore, to gratify the pride of the parliament, and to make some advances towards peace. They met not, however, with a favourable reception; and it was not without pleasure that they learned the dissolution of that haughty assembly, by the violence of Cromwell; an event from which they expected a more peaceful and beneficial issue.

The zealous republicans in the parliament had not been the chief or first promoters of the war; but when it was once entered upon, they endeavoured to draw from it every possible advantage. On all occasions they set up the Restorist opposition to the army, and celebrated the glory and successes of their naval armaments. They insisted on the intolerable expense to which the nation was subjected, and urged the necessity of diminishing it, by a reduction of the land forces. They had ordered some of the regiments to serve on board the fleet in the quality of marines. And Cromwell, by the whole train of their proceedings, evidently saw that they had entertained a jealousy of his power and ambition, and were resolved to bring him to a subordination under their authority. Without scruple or delay he resolved to prevent them.

On such firm foundations was built the credit of this extraordinary man, that though a great master of fraud and dissimulation, he judged it superfluous to employ any disguise in conducting this bold enterprise. If summoned to account, he could point out his motives; for he knew that they were disposed to receive whatever impressions he was pleased to give them. Most of them were his creatures, had owed their advancement to his favour, and relied entirely upon him for their future preferment. The breach being already made and the powers, when the late king was seized at Holmby; the general officers regarded the parliament as at once their creature and their rival; and thought that they themselves were entitled to protection among those officers and retons, of which its members had so long kept possession. Harrison, Rich, Overton, and a few others who retained some principle, were guided by notions so extravagant, that they were easily deluded into measures the most violent and most criminal. And the whole army had already been guilty of such illegal and atrocious actions, that they could entertain no further scruple with regard to any entreprise for which they were prepared.

In the council of officers it was presently voted to frame a remonstrance to the parliament. After complaining of the arrears due to the army, they there desired the parliament to reflect how many years they had sitten, and what profit they had derived from these; how they had introduced the new model the representative, and established successive parliaments, who might bear the burden of national affairs, from which they themselves would gladly, after so much danger and fatigue, be at last relieved. They remonstrated that the parliament had achieved great enterprises, and had surmounted mighty difficulties; yet was it an injury, they said, to the rest of the nation to be excluded from bearing any part in the service of their country. It was now full time for them to give place to others; and they therefore desired them, after settling a council who might execute the laws during the interval, to summon a new parliament to discharge that free and independent government, which they had so long promised to the people.

The parliament took this remonstrance in ill part, and made a sharp reply to the council of officers. The officers insisted on their application, and by mutual altercation and opposition the breach became still wider between the army and the commonwealth. Cromwell, finding matters ripe for his purpose, called a council of officers, in order to come to a determination with regard to the public settle to which he had here many friends, so had he also some opponents. Harrison having assured the council that the general sought only to pave the way for the government of Jesus and his saints, Major Strasser briskly replied, that Jesus ought then to come quickly: for if he delayed it till after Christmas, he would come too late; he would find his place occupied. While the officers were in debate, Colonel Ingoldsby informed Cromwell, that the parliament was sitting, and had come to a resolution not to dissolve themselves, but to fill up the House by new elections; and was at that very time engaged in deliberations with regard to this expedient. Cromwell, in a rage, immediately hastened to the House, and carried a body of 300 soldiers before him to the door of him placed at the door, some in the lobby, some on the stairs. He first addressed himself to his friend St. John, and told him, that he had come with a purpose of doing what grieved him to the very soul, and what he had earnestly with tears besought the Lord not to impose upon him; but there was a necessity, in order to the glory of God and good of the nation. He sat down for some time, and heard the debate. He beckoned Harrison, and told him, that he now judged the parliament ripe for a dissolution. "Sir," said Harrison, "the work is very great and dangerous; I desire you seriously to consider, before you engage in it. You say well," replied the general; and thereupon sat still about a quarter of an hour. When the question was ready to be put, he said again to Harrison, "This is the time: I must do it." And suddenly starting up, he loaded the parliament with the vilest reproaches, for their tyrannical disposition, oppression, and oppression of the public. Then stamping with his foot, which was a signal for the soldiers to enter, "For shame," said he to the parliament, "let you go; give place to honest men; to honest men who are not now the soldiers of Cromwell. There are no longer a parliament: I tell you, you are no longer a parliament. The Lord has done with you: he has chosen other instruments for carrying on his work." Sir Harry Vane excusing himself against this proceeding, he had heard a loud voice, "O Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" Taking hold of Martin by the cloak, "Thou art a whoremaster," said he. To another, "Thou art an adulterer." To a third, "Thou art an drunkard and a glutton;" "and thou an extortioner," to a fourth. He commanded a soldier to seize the mace. "What shall we do with this babbler? Here, take it away. It is you," said he, addressing himself to the House, "that have forced me upon this. I have sought the Lord night and day, that he would rather slay me than put me upon this work." Having commanded the soldiers to clear the hall, he himself went out the last, and ordering the doors to be locked, departed to hide himself in Whitehall.

In this furious manner, which so well denotes his genuine character, did Cromwell, without the least opposition, or even murmuring, annihilate that famous assembly which had filled all Europe with the renown of its actions, and with astonishment at its crimes, and whose commencement was not more ardently desired by the people than was its final dissolution. All parties now reaped successively the melancholy pleasure of seeing the injuries which they had suffered revenged on their enemies; and that by the same arts which had been practised against them. The king had, in some instances, stretched his prerogative beyond its just bounds; and aided by the church, had well nigh put an end to all the liberties and privileges of the nation. The presbyterians checked the progress of the court and clergy, and excited, by cant and hypocrisy, the populace, first to tumults, then to war, against the king, the peers, and all the royalists. No sooner had the king reached the pinnacle of grandeur, than the independents, under the appearance of still greater sanctity, instigated the army against them, and reduced them to subjection. The independents amidst their empty dreams of liberty, or rather of dominion, were oppressed by the rebelliousness of their own servants, and found themselves at once exposed to the insults of power and hatred of the people. By recent, as well as all ancient, example, it was become evident, that illegal violence, with which men were oppressed, could not be subdued, and whatever object it may pursue, must inevitably end at last in the arbitrary and despotic government of a single person.

Olivier Cromwell, in whose hands the Cromwell's birth dissolution of the parliament had left the and after the temporary, of three kingdoms, was born at Huntington, the last year of the former century, of a good family; though he himself, being the son of a second brother, inherited but a small estate from his father. In the course of his education he had been sent to the university; but his genius was found little fitted for the calm and elegant occupations of learning, and he made small proficiency in his studies. He even threw himself into a disorderly and disorderly course of life; and he consumed in gaming, drinking, debauchery, and country riots, the more early years of his youth, and dissipated part of his patrimony. All of a sudden the spirit of reformion seized him; he married, affected a grave and composed behaviour, entered into all the zeal and vigour of the puritanical party, and offered to restore to every one whatever sums he had formerly gained by gaming. The same vehemence of temper which had transported him to the extremes of pleasure, now distinguished his religious habits. He joined in all the acts of all the zealous clergy of the party; and his hospitality, as well as his liberality to the silenced and deprived ministers, proved as chargeable as his former debauches. Though he had acquired an inestimable fortune by a maternal uncle, he found his affairs so injured by his expenses, that he was obliged to take a farm at St. Ives, and apply himself, for some years, to agriculture as a profession. But this expedient served rather to involve him in further debts and difficulties. The long prayers which he said to his family in the morning, and again in the afternoon, consumed his own time and that of his ploughmen; and he removed leisure from the temporal affairs. His active mind, superior to the low occupations to which he was condemned, preyed upon itself; and he indulged his imagination in visions, illuminations, revelations; the great nourishment of that hypochondriacal temper to which he was ever subject. Urged by his wants and his petty, he had made a party with Hambden, his near kinsman, who was pressed only by the latter motive, to transport himself into New England, now become the retreat of the more zealous among the puritanical party; and it was an order of council which obliged them to discern and remain in England. The Earl of Bedford, who possessed a large estate in the fen Country, near the Isle of Ely, having undertaken to drain those natural swamps, was obliged to apply to the king; and by the powers of the prerogative, he got commissioners appointed, who conducted that work, and divided the new acquired land among the several proprietors. He met with opposition from many, among whom Cromwell distinguished himself; and this was the first public opposition which he had met with of discovering the factious real and obstinacy of his character.

from accident and intrigue he was chosen by the town of Cambridge member of the long parliament. His domestic affairs were then in great disorder; and he seemed not to possess any talents which could qualify him to rise in that public sphere into which he was now at last entered. His person was ungraceful, his dress slovenly, his voice untunable, his elocution homely, tedious, obscure, and embarrassed. The fervour of his spirit frequently prompted him to two or three attacks in the House, was obliged to be heard with attention; his name, for above two years, is not to be found oftener than twice in any committee; and those committees into which he was admitted were chosen for affairs which were rather interest of the knights than the men of business. In comparison of the eloquent speakers and fine gentlemen of the House, he was entirely overlooked; and his friend Hambden alone was acquainted with the depth of his genius, and foresaw that, if a civil war should ensue, he would soon rise to eminence and distinction.

Cromwell himself seems to have been conscious where his strength lay; and partly from that motive, partly from the uncontrollable fury of his zeal, he always joined that party which pushed every thing to extremities against the king. He was active in promoting the famous remonstrance, which was the signal for all the ensuing commotions; and when, after a long debate, it was carried by a small majority, he was alarmed. The question had been lost, he was resolved next day to have converted into ready money the remains of his fortune, and immediately to have left the kingdom. Nor was this resolution, he said, peculiar to himself; many others of his party he knew to be equally determined.

He was no less than forty-three years of age when he first embraced the military profession; and by force of genius, without any master, he soon became an excellent officer; though perhaps he never reached the fame of a consummate commander. He raised a troop of horse; fixed his quarters in Cambridge; exerted great severity towards that university, which zealously adhered to the royal party, and who had himself a number of adherents in the lengths in favour of that cause which he had espoused. He would not allow his soldiers to perplex their heads with those subtitles of fighting by the king's authority against his person, and of obeying his majesty's commands. He first instructed that discipline and inspired that spirit, which rendered the parliamentary armies in the end victorious. "Your troops," said he to Hambden, according to his own account, are most of them old decayed serving men and country apprentices, with whom kind of fellows; the king's converts are composed of gentlemen's younger sons and persons of good quality. And do you think that the mean spirits of such base and low fellows as ours will ever be able to encounter gentlemen, that have honour, courage and resolution in them? You must get men of spirit, and take it not that I say, of a spirit that is likely to go as far as gentlemen will go, or else I am sure you will be always beaten, as you have hitherto been in every encounter." He did as he proposed. He enlisted the sons of freedomholders and farmers. He carefully invited into his regiment all the zealous fanatics throughout England. When they were collected in a body, their enthusiastic spirit still rose to a higher pitch."In the month of October, said the master, as well as from policy, was sufficiently inclined to increase the flame. He preached, he prayed, he fought, he punished, he rewarded. The wild enthusiasm, together with valour and discipline, still propagated itself; and all men cast their eyes on so pious and so successful a leader. From low commands he rose with great rapidity to be really the first, though in appearance only the second, in the army. By fraud and violence, he soon rendered himself the first in the state. In proportion to the increase of his authority, his talents always seemed to expand themselves; and he displayed every day new abilities, which had lain dormant till the very emergence by which they were called into the first action. All England seemed to see a nation so turbulent and unruly, who, for some doubtful encroachments on their privileges, had dethroned and murdered an excellent prince, descended from a long line of monarchs, now last subdued and reduced to slavery by one, who, a few weeks before, was no better than a private gentleman, whose name was not known in the nation; and who was little regarded even in that low sphere to which he had not always a man, who would set by the fleet, by the army, even by many of the chief corporations and counties of England; but especially by the several congregations of saints dispersed throughout the kingdom. The royalists, though they could not love the man who had imbued his bands in the blood of their sovereign, expected more lenity from him, than from the people of England; and to support the latter, they were governed. The presbyterians were pleased to see those men by whom they had been outlawed and expelled, now in their turn expelled and outlawed by their own servant; and, in the phrase of the last act of violence upon the parliament. These two parties composed the bulk of the nation, and kept the people in some tolerable temper. All men likewise, harassed with wars and factions, were glad to witness any panacea; and it was impossible for them to submit to a person of such admirable talents and capacity, than to a few ignoble enthusiastic hypocrites, who, under the name of a republic, had reduced them to a cruel subjection.

The republics, being denounced by Cromwell, were the party whose resentment he had the greatest reason to apprehend. That party, besides the independents, contained two sets of men, who are seemingly of the most opposite principles, but who were then united by a similitude of genius and of character. The first and most numerous were the millenarians, or fifth monarchy men, who insisted, that dominion being founded in grace, all dispensations of justice, must be correction, which arose from piety and holiness; who expected suddenly the second coming of Christ upon earth; and who pretended, that the saints in the mean while, that is, themselves, were alone entitled to govern. The second were those, who chose to call themselves libertarians, who denied entirely the truth of revelation, and insinuated, that all the various sects, so heated against each other, were alike founded in folly and in error. Men of such differing opinions were not contented with the ancient and legal forms of civil government; but challenged a degree of freedom beyond what they expected ever to enjoy under any monarchy. Martin, Chaloner, Harrington, Suckling, Wilmot, Neill, were esteemed the heads of this small division.

The diets were perfectly hated by Cromwell, because he had no hold of enthusiasm, by which he could govern or overreach them; he therefore treated them with great rigour and disdain, and usually denounced them as leathens. As the millenarians had a great interest in the army, it was much more important for him to gain their confidence; and their size of understanding afforded him greater advantage. Cromwell, in the kingdom; and the Monarchical law was intended to establish the civil magistrate alone, without the interposition of the clergy. They found themselves exposed to the detraction of the public. Among the fanatics of the House, there was an active member, much noted for his long prayers, sermons, and histrangies. He was a leather-seller in London; his name, Praise-God Barbon. This ridiculous name, which seems to have been chosen by some poet or allegorist to suit so ridiculous a personage, struck the fancy of the people; and they commonly affixed to this assembly the appellation of Barbon's parliament.

The Dutch ambassadors endeavoured to enter into negoti with the whole authority of the state. This legislature, in which the number of persons who might succeed them in that high and important office.

There were great numbers at that time, who made it a principle always to adhere to any power which was uppermost, and to support the established government. When Providence, therefore, was so kind as to bestow on these men, now assembled together, the supreme authority, they must have been very ungrateful, if, in their turn, they had not been willing to comply with the demand, which they deemed it a matter of course, for the party, and having their own consent, as well as that of Oliver Cromwell, for their legislative authority, they now proceeded very gravely to the exercise of it.

In this notable assembly were some persons of the rank of gentlemen; but the far greater part were mechanics:

fifth monarchy men, anabaptists, antinomians, independents; the very dregs of the fanatics. They began with seeking God by prayer; this office was performed by eight or ten gifted men of the assembly; and with so much success, that, according to the confession of all, they had never before, in any of their devotional exercises, enjoyed so agreeable a success, as was then communicated to them. Their hearts were, no doubt, dilated when they considered the high dignity to which they supposed themselves exalted. They had been told by Cromwell, in his first discourse, that he never looked to see such a day; therefore, their duty to proceed to a thorough reformation, and to pave the way for the reign of the Redeemer, and for that great work which it was expected, the Lord was to bring them to. All fanatics, being convinced by their own fond imaginations, naturally bear an antipathy to the ecclesiastics, who claim a peculiar sanctity, derived merely from their office and priestly character. This parliament was thrown into confusion by the elenchical function, as savouring of popery; and the taking away of tithes, which they called a relic of Judaism. Learning, also, and the universities, were deemed heathenish and unnecessary: the common law was denounced a badge of the conquest and of Norman slavery; and they threatened the lawyers with a total abrogation of their profession. Some steps were even taken towards an abolition of the chancery; the highest court of jurisdiction in the kingdom; and the Monarchical law was intended to establish as the sole system of English jurisprudence.

Of all the extraordinary schemes adopted by these legislators, they had not leisure to finish any, except that which attempted to establish the civil magistrate alone, without the interposition of the clergy. They found themselves exposed to the detraction of the public. Among the fanatics of the House, there was an active member, much noted for his long prayers, sermons, and histrangies. He was a leather-seller in London: his name, Praise-God Barbon. This ridiculous name, which seems to have been chosen by some poet or allegorist to suit so ridiculous a personage, struck the fancy of the people; and they commonly affixed to this assembly the appellation of Barbon's parliament.

The right of peace, war, and alliance, rested in him; but in these particulars he was to act by the advice and with the consent of his council. The power of the sword was vested in him alone, and he could not entrust it even to the king of the Redeemer. The ambassadors finding themselves proscribed, not as enemies of England, but of Christ, remained in astonishment, and knew not which was most to be admired, the implacable spirit or egregious folly of these pretended saints.

Cromwell began to be ashamed of his legislature. If he ever had any design in summoning so preposterous an assembly, beyond amusing the populace and the army, he had intended to alarm the clergy and lawyers; and he had so far succeeded as to make them desire any other government, which might secure their professions, now brought into danger by these desperate fanatics. Cromwell himself was dissatisfied, that the parliament, though they had derived all their authority from him, began to pretend power from the Lord, and to insist already on their privileges. He had been careful to summon in his writs several persons especially, to concert, by concert, these met early; and it was mentioned by some among them, that the sitting of this parliament any longer would be of no service to the nation. They hastened to dissension, and Cromwell, therefore, to Tenth Dec. house, their speaker; and, by a formal deed or assignment, restored into his hands that supreme authority which they had so lately received from him.

General Harrison and about twenty more remained in the House; and that they might preserve the reign of the saints from coming to an unholy end, they placed one Xoyer in the chair, and began to draw up protests. They were subscribed to by Colonel White, with a party of soldiers. He asked them what they did there? "We are seeking the Lord," said they. "Then you may go elsewhere," replied he: "for to my certain knowledge, we have not been here these many years."

The military being now in appearance, as well as in reality, the sole power which prevailed in the nation, Cromwell thought fit to indulge in a new fancy; for he seems not to have had any deliberate plan in all these alterations. Lambert, his creature, who, under the appearance of obscurantism to himself, indulged an unfounded ambition, proposed in a council of officers to adopt another scheme of government, and to temper the liberty of the people by the authority of a semi-royal person, who should be known by the appellation of protector. Without delay, he prepared what was called the instrument of government, containing that thing new legislature; and as it was supposed to be agreeable to the general, it was immediately voted by the council of officers. Cromwell was declared protector; and with great solemnity installed in that high office.

So little were these men endowed with the spirit of legislation, that they confessed, or rather boasted, that they had employed only four days in drawing this instrument, by which the whole government of three kingdoms was intended to be regulated and administered to all succeeding generations. There appears no difficulty in believing them; when it is considered how crude and undigested a system of civil policy they endeavoured to establish. The articles of this instrument are these: A council was appointed, which was not to exceed twenty-one, nor be less than thirteen, persons. These were to enjoy their office during life or good behaviour; and in case of a vacancy, the remaining members named three, of whom the protector chose one; the other two appointed supreme magistrate of the commonwealth; in his name was all justice to be administered; from him were all magistracy and honours derived; he had the power of all criminal and murder acts; to him the benefit of all forfeitures devolved.

England, gave them hopes of peace. But as they could obtain no cessation of hostilities, the States, unwilling to suffer any longer the loss and dishonour of being blockaded by the enemy, made the utmost efforts to recover their situation. The occasion did the power and vigour of that republic appear in a more conspicuous light. In a few weeks they had repaired and manned their fleet; and they equipped some ships of a larger construction. The publication of Portuguese orders, the vigorous chastisement of it, suiteing so well to the undaunted character of Cromwell, was universally approved of at home, and admired among foreign nations. The States had sought court curn inconvenient; and the ambassador soon after signed with the protector a treaty of peace and alliance, which was very advantageous to the English commerce.

Another act of courage, but necessary in his situation, was, at the very same time, exercised by the protector, in the capital punishment of Gerard and Vowel, two royalists, who were accused of conspiring against his life. He had erected a high court of justice for their trial; an infringement of the ancient laws, which at this time was become familiar, but one to which no custom or precedent could reconcile the nation. Juries were found altogether unmanageable. The restless Lilburn, for new offences, had been brought to a new trial; and had been acquitted with new triumph and exultation. If no other method of conviction had been devised during this illegal and unpopular government, all its enemies were assured of entire impunity.

The protector had occasion to observe the prejudices entertained against his government by the disposition of the parliament, which he summoned on the third of September, that day of the year on which he gained his two victories of Dunbar and Worcester, and which he always regarded as fortunate for him. It must be confessed, that, if we are left to gather Cromwell's intentions from his instrument of government, it is such a medley piece, that we cannot easily conjecture, whether he seriously meant to establish a tyranny or a republic. On one hand, a first magistrate, in so extensive a government, seemed necessary both for the dignity and tranquility of the state, and the authority, which he assumed as protector, was, in some respects, inferior to the prerogatives, which the laws invested and still intrust to the king. On the other hand, the legislative power, which he resolved to commit to himself and council, together with so great an army, independent of the parliament, was bad prognostics of his intention to submit to a civil and legal constitution. But if this were not his intention, the method in which he distributed and conducted the elections, being so favourable to liberty, forms an evidence which is not easily accounted for. He deprived of their right of election all the small boroughs, places the most exposed to influence and corruption. Of 400 members, which represented the citizens of the 273 towns and counties. The rest were elected by London, and the more considerable corporations. The lower populace too, so easily guided or deceived, were excluded from the elections: an estate of 200 pounds value was necessary to entitle any one to a vote. The elections of this parliament were conducted with perfect freedom; and, excepting that such of the royalists as had borne arms against the parliament and all their sons were excluded, a more fair representation of the people could not be desired or expected. Thirty members were returned from Scotland; as many from Ireland.

The protector seems to have been disappointed, when he found that all the pretensions which perhaps nothing but covers to his ambition, had not proceeded him the confidence of the public. Though Cromwell's administration was less odious to every party than that of any other party, yet was it entirely acceptable. The royalists had been instructed by the king to remain quiet, and to cover themselves under the appearance of republicans; and they found in this latter faction such irrevocable hatred against the protector, that they could not wish for more zealous adversaries to his authority. It was maintained by them, that the presence of liberty and popular election was but a new artifice of this great deceiver, in order to lay asleep the deluded nation, and give himself leisure to rivet their chains more securely upon them; that in the instrument of government he openly declared his intention of still retaining the same mercenary array, by whose assistance he had subdued the ancient established government, and who would with less scruple obey him, in overturning, whenever he should please to order them, that new system, which he himself had been pleased to model: that being sensible of the danger and uncertainty of all military government, he endeavoured to give a face to the new, to obviate it, and to appear, as civil administration, and to balance the army by a seeming consent of the people. That the absurd trial, which he had made, of a parliament elected by himself, appointed perpetually to elect their successors, which proved, that he was at nothing but temporary expedients, was totally averse to a free republican government, and possessed not that mature and deliberate reflection, which could qualify him to act the part of a legislator; that he was a depraved character, which had betrayed itself in so many incidents, could never seriously submit to legal limitations; nor would the very image of popular government be longer upheld than while conformable to his arbitrary will and pleasure: and that the best policy was to oblige him to take off the mask at once; and either submit entirely to that parliament, which he had summoned, or, by totally rejecting its authority, leave himself no resource but in his seditious and emissary arm. In prosecution of these views, the parliament, having heard the protector's speech, three hours long, and having chosen Lenthall for their speaker, immediately entered into a discussion of the pretended institution of government, and of that authority which Cromwell, by the title of protector, had assumed over the nation. The greatest liberty was used in arranging this new dignity; and even the pretended successors of government, as the protector himself, and of that authority which Cromwell, by the title of protector, had assumed over the nation. The greatest liberty was used in arranging this new dignity; and even the pretended successors of government, as the protector and his council, were not consulted before one of the greatest members of the parliament, who had smitten the protector's authority without censure. The utmost that could be obtained by the officers and by the court party, for so they were called, was to protract the debate by arguments and long speeches, and by a representation of a question of a question of a question, which, they thought, were sensible, would be carried against them by a great majority. The protector, surprised and enraged at this refractory spirit in the parliament, which however he had so much reason to expect, went for them to the plenary chamber, and with an air of great authority inveighed against their conduct. He told them, that nothing could be more absurd than for them to dispute his title; since the former government of which they complained, had invested him with the protectorship; that some points in the new constitution were supposed to be fundamentals, and were not, on any pretence, to be altered or disputed; that among these were the government of the nation, and a parliament, their joint authority over the army and militia, the succession of new parliaments, and liberty of conscience; and that, with regard to these particulars, there was reserved to him a negative voice, to which, in the other contrary circumstances of government, he confessed himself powerless entitled. The protector now found the necessity of exacting a security which, had be foreseen the spirit of the House, he would with better grace have required at their first meeting. He obliged the members to sign a recognition of his authority, and an engagement not to propose or consent to any alteration in the government, as it was settled in a single person and a parliament, and he placed guards at the door of the House, who allowed none but subscribers to enter. Most of the members, after some hesitation, submitted to this condition; but retained the same refractory spirit which they had discovered in their first debates. The instrument of government was taken in pensive and examined, article by article, with the most scrupulous accuracy: very few topics were advanced with the general approbation of the House; and during the whole course of these proceedings, they neither bowed to the protector, nor took any notice of him. Being informed that conspiracies were entered into between the members and some malcontent officers, he hastened to the dissolution. And as he was above all things disposed to dissolve the instrument of government, to which he had sworn, no parliament could be dissolved till it had sat five months; but Cromwell pretended, that a month contained only twenty-eight days, according to the method of computation practised in the paying the fleet and army. The full time therefore having elapsed, the parliament was ordered to attend the protector, who made them a tedious, confused, angry harangue, and dismissed them. Were we to judge of Cromwell's capacity by this, and indeed by all his other compositions, he was not to be accounted a man of very great capacity for it. But in the great variety of human geniuses, there are some which, though they see their object clearly and distinctly in general, yet, when they come to unfold its parts by discourses or writings, lose that firmness by which they had before attained. All accounts agree in ascribing to Cromwell, a tiresome, dark, unintelligible elocution, even when he had no intention to disguise his meaning; yet no man's actions were ever, in such a variety of difficult incidents, more decisive and judicious. The electing of a discontented parliament is a proof of a discontented nation: the angry and abrupt dissolution of that parliament is always sure to increase the general discontent. The members of this assembly, returning to their counties, propagated that spirit of mutiny which they had exerted in the House. Sir Harry Vane and the old republicans, who maintained the ancient authority of one long and great line, encouraged the murmurs, and thought the present usurpation; though they acted so cautiously as to give the protector no handle against them. Wildman and some others of that party carried still further their conspiracies against the protector and the new constitution. They did not consider that the old parliamentary party, though many of them were displeased with Cromwell, who had disposed of their power, were still more apprehensive of the danger of any discord or writing, lose that firmness by which they had before attained. his enemies, were those whom he could oppress under the most plausible pretences, and who met with least countenance and protection from his adherents. He issued an edict, with the consent of his council, for exacting the tenth penny from that whole party; in order, as he pretended, X. to raise the money by which the free disposition continually exposed the public. Without regard to compositions, articles of capitulation, or acts of indemnity, all the nobles, however harassed with former oppressors, were now threatened with the same, for which purpose sums of money; and many of them were reduced by these multiplied disasters to extreme poverty. Whoever was known to be disaffected, or even lay under any suspicion, showed himself to be proved against him, was exposed to the new exaction.

In order to raise this imposition, which commonly passed by the name of decimation, the protector instituted twelve major-generals; and divided the whole kingdom of England into so many military jurisdictions. These men, assigned by commissioners, had power to subject whom they pleased to decimation, to levy all the taxes imposed by the protector and his council, and to imprison any person whose property should be exposed to their jealousy or suspicion; nor was there any appeal from them but to the protector himself and his council. Under colour of these powers, which were sufficiently exorbitant, the major-generals exercised an arbitrary power, and imposed taxes on the whole property and the persons of every subject. All reasonable men now concluded, that the very mask of liberty was thrown aside, and that the nation was for ever subdued to the absolute power of the protector, who was in the legal manner of European nations, but according to the maxims of eastern tyranny. Not only the supreme magistrate owed his authority to illegal force and usurpation: he had parcellled but the people into so many subdivisions of slavery, and had delegated to his inferior ministers the same unlimited authority which he himself had so violently assumed.

A government totally military and despotic is almost sure, after some time, to fall into impotence and languature; but when it immediately succeeds a legal constitution, it may, at first, to foreign nations, appear very vigorous and active, and may exert with more unanimity that power, spirit, and riches, which had been acquired under a better form. It seems now proper, after so long an interval, to look abroad to the general state of Europe, and to consider the measures which England alone has been able to hold its head in the midst of the neighbouring princes. The moderate temper and unwarlike genius of the two last princes, the extreme difficulties under which they laboured at home, and the great security which they possessed, have made them negligent of the transactions on the continent; and England, during their reigns, had been in a manner overlooked in the general system of Europe. The bold and restless genius of the protector led him to extend his alliances and enterprises to every part of Christendom; and partly from the ascendant of his magnanimous spirit, partly from the situation of foreign kingdoms, the weight of England, even under its most legal and bravest princes, was never more sensibly felt than during this unjust and violent usurpation.

A war of thirty years, the most signal and most destructive that had appeared in modern annals, was at last finished by the Catherine of Braganza. The treaty of Westphalia, which was composed those fatal quarrels which had been excited by the palatine's precipitate acceptance of the crown of Bohemia. The young palatine was restored to part of his dignities, and was received in the negotiations with the neighbouring princes. The moderate temper and unwar-

Sweden, which had acquired by conquest large domininions in the north of Germany, was engaged in enterprises which promised her, from her success and valor, still more extensive acquisitions on the side both of Poland and of Denmark, and of Russia. But Charles XII. had assumed the throne of that kingdom after the voluntary resignations of Christina, being stimulated by the fame of Gustavus, as well as by his own martial disposition, carried his conquering army to the south of the Baltics, and gained the celebrated battle of Parnawa, which he displayed in the annals during the space of three days. The protector, at the time his alliance was bound by every power in Europe, anxiously courted the alliance of Sweden; and he was fond of forming a confederacy against the legitimacy of such renown, even though it threatened the whole north with conquest and subjection.

The transactions of the parliament and protector with France had been various and complicated. The emoluments of Richelieu had furnished fuel to the flame of rebellion, when it first broke out in Scotland; but after the confirmation had diffused itself, the French court, observing the materials to be of themselves sufficiently combustible, found it unnecessary any longer to animate the British malcontents to an opposition of their sovereign. On the contrary, they offered their mediation for composing these intestine disorders; and their ambassadors, from decency, immediately went to London, to concert with the British ministers, and to receive directions from a prince with whom their master was connected by so near an affinity. Meanwhile, Richelieu died; and soon after him the French king, Louis XIII. learnt to be, an infant four years old, and his widow, Anne of Austria, regent of the kingdom. Cardinal Mazarine succeeded Richelieu in the ministry; and the same general plan of policy, though by men of such opposite characters, was still continued in the French ac-
cs. The establishment of royal authority, the reduction of the Austrian family, were pursued with ardour and success; and every year brought an accession of force and grandeur to the French monarchy.

A Condé, a Turenne, were formed; and the troops, animated by their valour, and guided by their discipline, acquired every day a greater ascendant over the Spanish.

All of a sudden, from some intrigues of the court, and some discontent in the courts of justice, intestine commotions were raised at this time, and the king, to whom was attributed a part in these rebellions of the French, neither emboldened by the spirit of liberty, nor disgraced by the fanatical extravagances which distinguished the British civil wars, were conducted with little bloodshed, and with little bloodshed. The French monarchy was too much in the minds of the people. Though guarded by the force of Spain, and conducted by the Prince of Condé, the malcontents, in a little time, were either expelled or subdued; and the French monarchy, having lost a few of its conquests, returned with fresh vigour to the acquisition of new domimion.

The Queen of England, and her son Charles, during these commotions, passed most of their time at Paris; and notwithstanding their near connexion of blood, received but few civilities, and still less support, from the French court. Had the queen-regent been ever so much inclined to assist the English prince, the disorders of her own affsairs would, for a long time, have prevented such intentions from being impracticable. The banished queen had a moderate pension assigned her; but it was so ill paid, and her credit ran so low, that, one morning, when the Cardinal de Retz waited on her, to inform her, that her daughter, the young princess Henrietta, was obliged to lie a-bed, for want of a fire to warm her. To such a condition was reduced, in the midst of Paris, a Queen of England, and daughter of Henry IV. Of this being informed, the protector, who had been informed of all such intentions, sent a paid court to the parliament. He accepted of a pension of 10000 a year from them, and took a place in their assembly of divines.

Scrip. Hist. vol. xx. p. 433. The protector, during the civil wars, had much neglected his uncle, and French; and Blake went so far as to attack and seize the whole squadron of ships, which were carrying supplies to Dunkirk, then closely besieged by the Spaniards. That town, disappointed of these supplies, fell into the hands of the enemy. The French ministers soon found it necessary to change their measures. They treated Charles with such affected indifference, that he thought it more decent to withdraw, and prevent the indignity of being desired to leave the city. He went at last to Spa, thence he retired to Cologne; where he lived two years on a small pension, about 6000 pounds a-year, paid him by the court of France, and on some contributions sent him by his friends in the Low Countries. In the meantime, however, his family had discovered a disposition to order and economy; and his temper, cheerful, careless, and socialable, was more than a sufficient compensation for that empire of which his enemies had boasted.

Sir Edward Hyde, created lord chancellor, and the Marquis of Ormond, were his chief friends and confidants. If the French ministry had thought it prudent to bend under the English parliament, they deemed it still more necessary to pay deference to the protector, when he assumed the reins of government. Cardinal Mazarine, by whom all the councils of France were directed, was artful and vigilant, subtle and patient, false and intriguing; determined to maintain his power by dexterity and violence, and placing his honour more in the final success of his measures, than in the splendour and magnanimity of the means which he employed. Cromwell, by his impetuous character, was the advantage of concentration, seeking an ascendant over this man; and every proposal made by the protector, however unreasonable in itself, and urged with whatever insinuation, met with a ready compliance from the political and timid cardinal. Bourdeaux was sent over to England as minister; and all circumstances of respect were paid to the daring usurper, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his sovereign, a prince so nearly related to the royal family of France. With indefatigable patience, he sought to assure him that, according to his character, Cromwell seemed entirely to neglect; and though privy-counsellers, with English commissions, committed daily depredations on the French commerce, Mazarine was content, in hopes of a fortunate issue, still to submit to these indignities.

The court of Spain, less connected with the unfortunate royal family, and reduced to greater distress than the French by the search, had been still more forward in her advances to the prosperous parliament and protector. Don Alonzo de Cardenas, the Spanish envoy, was the first public minister who recognized the authority of the new republic; and in return for this avowal, Ascham was sent envoy to Madrid to treat about a treaty. Not long after this minister arrived in Madrid, than some of the banished royalists, inflamed by that invertebrate hatred which animated the English factions, broke into his chamber, and murdered him, together with his secretary. Immediately they took sanctuary in the churches; and assisted by the general favour, which every where attended the royal cause, were enabled, most of them, to make their escape. Only one of the criminals suffered death; and the parliament seemed to rest satisfied with this atonement.

Spain, at this time, assailed every where by vigorous enemies from without, and labouring under many internal disorders, retained nothing of her former greatness, except the haughty pride of her counsels, and the hatred and jealousy of her neighbours. Portugal had rebelled, and established her monarchy in the house of Braganza: Catalonia, complaining of violated privileges, had revolted to France: Naples was shaken with popular revolts: the Low Countries were invaded with superior forces, and seemed ready to change their master: the Spanish infantry, anciently so formidable, had been annihilated by Condé in their flight from the Flanders, and though in the service, banished France, sustained, by his activity and valour, the falling fortunes of Spain, he could only hope to protract, not prevent, the ruin with which that monarchy was visibly threatened.

Had Cromwell understood and regarded the interests of his country, he would have supported the declining condition of Spain against the dangerous ambition of France, and preserved that balance of power, on which the greatness and security of England so much depended. Had he studied the united influence of the Low Countries, Austria, Portugal, and the Indies, over the political and economic circumstances of France, he might have perceived that no neutrality between those great monarchies; nor would he have hazarded his ill-acquired and unsettled power, by provoking foreign enemies, whom might lend assistance to defend his country against the attacks of his enemies. His magnanimity undervalued danger: his active disposition, and avidity of extensive glory, made him incapable of repose: and as the policy of men is continually warped by their temper, so sooner was peace made with Holland, than he began to deliberate what new enemy he should invade with his victorious arms.

The extensive empire and yet extreme weakness of Spain in the West Indies; the vigorous courage and great naval power of England; were circumstances which, when compared, excited the ambition of the enterprising protector, and made him hope that he might, by some gainful conquest, render for ever illustrious that dominion, in which the Spanish monarchy should eventually end. Should be fail of these durable acquisitions, the Indian treasures, which must every year cross the ocean to reach Spain, were, he thought, a sure prey to the English. With this, a powerful navy, an active protector, and a numerous and powerful body of adherents, he might have collected new burthens on the discontented people. From France a vigorous resistance must be expected: no plunder, no conquests could be hoped for; the progress of his arms, even if attended with success, must there be slow and gradual: and if the protector had judged his success would be less striking to the multitude, whom it was his interest to allure. The royal family, so closely connected with the French monarch, might receive great assistance from that court to prosecute his designs; and an army of French, landed in England, would be able, he dreaded, to unite the most opposite factions against the present usurpation.

These motives of policy were probably seconded by his gigantic prejudices; as no human mind ever contained so strange a mixture of sagacity and absurdity, as that of this extraordinary personage. The Swedish alliance, though much contrary to the interests of England, he had contracted with his zeal for Protestantism; and Sweden being closely connected with France, he could not hope to maintain that confederacy, in which he so much prized himself, should a rupture ensue between England and this latter kingdom. The hugonots, he expected, would meet with better reception in England, who were better disposed with their sovereign. And as the Spaniards were much more papists than the French, were much more exposed to the old puritanical hatred, and had even erected the bloody tribunal of the inquisition, whose rigour they had refused to mitigate on Cromwell's solicitation? he hoped that a holy and meritorious war with such idolaters could not fail of protection from heaven. A preacher likewise, inspired, as was supposed, by a prophetic spirit, bad him go and prosper: calling him a stone cut out of the mountains without hands, that would break the pride of the Spaniards, crush antichrist, and make way for the purity of the gospel through all the world.

Actuated equally by these digested, these ambitious, and these interested motives, the protector equipped two considerable squadrons; and while he was making those preparations, the neighbouring states, ignorant of his intentions, remained in suspense, and looked with anxious expectation on what side the storm should discharge itself. One of these squadrons, consisting of thirty capital ships, was sent into the Mediterranean under Blake, whose fame was now so great and so formidable, that the citizens of Genoa, during the Crusades, had ever before sailed in those seas;
and from one extremity to the other, there was no naval force, Christian or Mahometan, able to resist them. The Roman pontiff, whose weakness and whose pride equally provoked attacks, drenched invasion from a power which professed the most inhuman manners and tenets—him, and which so little regulated its movements by the usual motives of interest and prudence. Blake, casting anchor before Leghorn, demanded and obtained from the Duke of Tuscany reparation for some losses which the English commerce had sustained by him. He found them willing to sail to Algiers, and compelled the Dey to make peace, and to restrain his piratical subjects from further violence on the English. He presented himself before Tunis, and had the satisfaction of seeing in the same day the same fate which had been meted out to the public bade him look to the castles of Porto Farino and Goleta, and do his utmost. Blake needed not to be pressed by such a bravado: he drew his ships close up to the castles, and tore them in pieces with his artillery. He sent a numerous detachment of sailors in their long-boats into the harbour, and burned every ship which lay there. This bold action, which its very temperateness, prepare, rendered safe, was executed with little loss, and filled all that part of the world with the renown of English valor.

Jamaica conquered. The other squadron was not equally successful. It was commanded by Pen, and numbered about 6000 men, under Commodore Venables. About 5000 more joined them from Barbadoes and St. Christopher's. Both these officers were inclined to the king's service; and it is pretended that Cromwell was obliged to hurry the soldiers on board, in order to prevent the execution of a conspiracy which had been formed among them, in favour of the exiled family. The ill success of this enterprise may justly be ascribed, as much to the injudicious schemes of the protector, who planned it, as to the base execution of the officers whom it was conducted. The soldiers were the refuse of the whole army: the forces, enlisted in the West Indies, were the most profligate of mankind: Pen and Venables were of incomparable inferiority. The English were not furnished with arms fit for such an expedition: their provisions were defective both in quantity and quality: all hopes of pillage, the best incentive to valor among such men, were refused the soldiers and seamen: no directions or intelligence were given to conduct the officers in their enterprise: and at the same time they were tied down to follow the advice of commissioners who disconcerted them in all their projects.

April 15. It was agreed by the admiral and general to attempt St. Domingo, the only place of strength in the island of Hispaniola. On the approach of the English, the Spaniards, in a fright, deserted their hospital, and fled towards the woods. Contrary to the opinion of Venables, the soldiers were disembarked, without guides, ten leagues distant from the town. They wandered four days through the woods without provisions, and, what was still more intolerable in that sultry climate, without water. The Spaniards recovered spirit, and attacked them. The English, discouraged with the bad conduct of their officers, and scarcity of food from hunger, thirst, and fatigue, were unable to resist. An incredible number of the enemy put the whole army to rout, killed 600 of them, and chased the rest on board their vessels.

The English commanders, in order to stone as much as possible for this unpromising attempt, bent their course to Jamaica, which was surrendered to them without a blow. Pen and Venables returned to England, and were both of them sent to the Tower by the protector, who, though a man of fortune, must have felt the stroke, which must have put the spirit of such men into a violent passion at this disappointment. He had made a coquet of greater importance than he was himself at that time aware of; yet was it much inferior to the vast one which was now before him. He gave orders, however, to support it by men and money; and that island has ever since remained in the hands of the English; the chief acquisition which they owe to the enterprise of Cromwell.

As soon as the news of this expedition, which was an unwarrantable violation of treaty, arrived in Europe, the Spaniards declared war against England, and seized all the ships and goods of English merchonst, of which they could make themselves masters. The commerce with Spain, so profitable to the English, was cut off; and near 1500 vessels, it is computed, fell in a few years into the hands of the enemy. Blake, to whom Montague was now joined in command, after receiving new orders, prepared himself for hostilities against the Spaniards.

Several sea officers, having entertained scruples of conscience with regard to the justice of the Spanish war, threw in their lots with them by quitting the service. Captain White, who had been a warm admirer of the cause, thought, of their superiors, could justify a war, which was contrary to the principles of natural equity, and which the civil magistrate had no right to order. Individuals, they maintained, in resigning to the public their natural liberty, could bestow on it only what they themselves were possessed of, a right of performing lawful actions, and could invest it with no authority of commanding what is contrary to the decrees of Heaven. Such maxims, though they seem reasonable, are perhaps too perfect for human nature; and must be regarded as one effect, though of the most innocent and even honourable kind, of that spirit, partly French, partly republican, which predominated in England.

Blake lay some time off Cadiz, in expectation of intercepting the Plate fleet, but was at last obliged, for want of water, to make sail towards Portugal. Captain White, than whom no sailor is more beloved on the coast, had a squadron of seven vessels, came in sight of the galloons, and immediately set sail to pursue them. The Spanish admiral ran his ship ashore: two others followed his example: the English took two ships valued at near two millions of pieces of eight. Two galloons were set on fire; and the Marquis of Badajoz, viceroy of Peru, with his wife, and his daughter, who accompanied him in the vessel, were destroyed in them. The marquis himself fought against; but seeing these unfortunate women, astonished with danger, fell in a swoon, and perished in the flames, he rather chose to die with them, than drag out a life ruined with the remembrance of such dismal scenes. When the treasures gained by this enterprise arrived at Portsmouth, the protector, from a spirit of ostentation, ordered them to be transported by land to London.

The next action against the Spaniards was more honourable, though less profitable to the nation. Blake, having heard that a Spanish fleet of sixteen ships, much richer than the former, had taken shelter in the Canaries, immediately set sail to intercept them. He arrived off the bay of Santa Cruz, disposed in a formidable posture. The bay was secured with a strong castle, well provided with cannon, besides seven forts in several parts of it, all united by a line of communication, manned with musqueteers. Don Diego Diques, the Spanish admiral, ordered all his smaller vessels to moor close to the shore, and posted the larger galleons further off, at anchor, with their broadsides to the sea.

Blake was rather animated than daunted with this appearance. The wind seconded his courage, and blowing full into the bay, in a moment brought him among the thickest of his enemies. After a resistance of four hours, he overthrew with a most unexpected and abandoned their ships, which were set on fire, and consumed with all their treasure. The greatest danger still remained to the English. They lay under the fire of the castles and all the forts, which must have cut them to the heart. But the wind suddenly changing, carried them out of the bay; where they left the Spaniards in astonishment at the happy temerity of their audacious victor.

This was the last and most signal action of the and death of gallant Blake. He was consumed with a Admiral Blake, dropsy and scurvy, and hastened home, that he might yield up his breath in his native country, which he had so much adorned by his valor. As he came within sight of land, he expired. Never man, so zealous for a faction, was so much respected and esteemed even by the opposite factions. He was by principle an inflexible republican; and the late usurpations, amidst all the trust and cures he which he received from the ruling powers, were thought to be very little grateful to him. It is still our duty, he said to the seamen, to fight for our country, into what hands over the government might fall. Dimized, generous, liberty, and the happiness of mankind were hateful only to his avowed enemies; he forms one of the most perfect characters of the age, and the least stained with those errors and violence which were then so predominant. The protector ordered him a pompous funeral at the public charge; but his remembrance was not to be implied in countries. Cromwells were the most handsome panegyric on his memory.

The conduct of the protector in foreign affairs, though imprudent and impolitic, was full of vigour and enterprise, and drew a consideration to his country, which, since the reign of Elizabeth, it seemed to have totally lost. The great mind of this successful usurper was intent on spreading the renown of the English nation; and while he struck mankind with astonishment at his extraordinary fortune, he seemed to ennable, instead of debasing, that people whom he had reduced to subjection. It was his boast, that he would render the name of an Englishman as much feared as it ever was that of a Roman; and his countrymen found some reality in these pretensions, their national vanity, being gratified, made them bear with more patience all the indignities and calamities under which they laboured. Defence of the admirals.

It must also be acknowledged, that the navigation of Cromwell, in his civil and domestic administration, displayed as great regard both to justice and clemency, as his usurped authority, derived from his enemies, was founded only on the sword, could possibly permit. All the chief offices in the courts of judicature were filled with men of integrity; amidst the virulence of faction, the decrees of the judges were upright and impartial. The executive authority managed itself, and to him who stood in the way except where necessity required the contrary, the law was the great rule of conduct and behaviour. Vane and Lilburn, whose credit with the republicans and levellers he defended, were indeed for some time confined to prison; Cove, who refused to pay illegal taxes, was obliged by menaces to depart from his obstinacy; high courts of justice were erected to try those who had engaged in conspiracies and insurrections against the protector's authority, and whom he could not safely commit to the verdict of juries. But these irregularities were deemed ineffectual consequences of his illegal authority. And though often urged by his officers, as is pretended, to attempt a general massacre, as a method of reformation, he always with horror rejected such sanguinary counsels.

In the army was laid the sole basis of the protector's power; and in managing it consisted the chief art and delicacy of his government. The soldiers were held in exact discipline; a policy which both accustomed them to obedience, and made them less hateful and burdensome to the people. He augmented their pay; though the public necessities sometimes obliged him to run in arrears to them. Their interests, they were sensible, were closely connected with those of their general and protector. And he entirely commanded their affectionate regard, by his abilities and success in almost every enterprise which he had hitherto undertaken. But all military government is precarious; much more where it stands in opposition to civil establishments; and still more where it encounters religious prejudices. By the wild fanatics with whom he had reproached in his soldiers, he had reduced them into measures, for which, if openly proposed to them, they would have entertained the utmost aversion. But this same spirit rendered them more difficult to be governed, and made them more ready to rely on that band of men which directed their movements. So often taught, that the office of king was an usurpation upon Christ, they were apt to suspect a protector not to be altogether compatible with that divine authority. Harrison, though raised to the highest dignity, and possessed of Cromwell's confidence, became his most inveterate enemy as soon as the authority of a single person was established, against which the usurper always made such violent protestations. Overton, Rich, Okie, officers of rank in the army, were actuated with the same principles, and Cromwell was obliged to deprive them of their commission; either at their own request, which he before thought unbounded among the troops, seemed from that moment to be totally annihilated.

The more effectually to curb the enthusiastic and seditions spirit of the troops, Cromwell established a kind of militia in all the counties. Cavalry were enlisted under proper officers, regular pay distributed among them, and a resource by that means provided both against the insurrections of the royalists, and mutiny of the army.

Religion can never be deemed a point of small consequence in civil government; but during this period, it may be regarded as the great spring of men's actions and determinations. Though transported, himself, to the most frantic whiskies, Cromwell had adopted a scheme for regulating this principle in others, which was sagacious and political. Being resolved to maintain a national church, yet detesting the old hierarchy, and the presbytery, he established a number of commissioners, under the name of trying, partly laymen, partly ecclesiastics, some presbyterians, some independents. These presented to all livings, which were formerly in the hands of the titular ministers; they examined and admitted such persons as received holy orders; and they inspected the lives, doctrine, and behaviour of the clergy. Instead of supporting that union between learning and theology, which has long been attempted in Westminster, these tryers embraced the latter principle in its full purity, and made it the sole object of their examination. The candidates were no more perplexed with questions concerning their progress in Greek and Latin, than in their knowledge of the dispensations of the Scriptures and sciences: the chief object of scrutiny regarded their advances in grace, and fixing the critical moment of their conversion.

With the pretended smarts of all denominations Cromwell was familiar and easy. Laying aside the state of protector, which, on other occasions, he well knew how to maintain, he insinuated to them, that nothing but necessity could obstruct him to invest himself with it. He talked spiritually to them; he sighed, he wept, he bemoaned his lot, he wept, and prayed. He even entered with them into an emulation of ghostly gifts; and these men, instead of grieving to be outdone in their own way, were proud that his gift was such; and his gift, though the example of others, had in itself such practices in which they themselves were daily occupied.

If Cromwell might be said to adhere to any particular form of religion, they were the independents who could chiefly boast of his favour; and it may be affirmed, that such pastors of that sect, as were not passionately addicted to civil liberty, were all of them devoted to him.

The presbyterian clergy also, saved from the ravages of the malapprist and millenarians, and enjoying their establishments and tithes, were not averse to his government; though he still entertained a great jealousy of that ambitious and restless spirit by which they were actuated. He therefore granted most liberal indulgences to the catholics and prelates; and by that means both he attached the wild sectaries to his person, and employed them in curbing the domineering spirit of the presbyterians. I am the only man, he was often heard to say, who has declared liberty for that insolent sect, which can suffer none but itself.

The protestant zeal which possessed the presbyters and independents, was highly gratified by the laudatory manner in which the protector to succeed to the succession of the persecuted protestants throughout all Europe. Even the Duke of Savoy, so remote a power, and so little exposed to the naval force of England, was obliged, by the authority of France, to comply with his mediation, and to tolerate the Protestants of the valleys, against whom that prince had commenced a furious persecution. France itself was content only with the religion, but even, in some instances, with the sedicious insurrections of the bugnots; and when the French court applied for a reciprocal toleration of the catholic religion in England,
the protector, who arrogated in every thing the superiority,
would admit no proposal to this purpose, but that of a project of instituting a college, in imitation of that at Romc, for the propagation of the faith; and his apostles, in zeal, though not in unanimity, had certainly been a full and constant terror to the clergy.
Cromwell retained the church of England in constant, thought he permitted its clergy a little more liberty than the republican parliament had formerly allowed. He was pleased that the superior lenty of his administration should in every thing be remarked. He bridled the royalists, both by the army which he retained, and by those secret spies which he found means to intermix in all their counsels. Manning being detected and punished with death, he corrupted Sir Richard Wilks, who was much trusted by Chancellor Hyde and all the royalists; and by means of this man he was let into every design and conspicacy of the party. He could discoiar any project, by counsel or spies, and if it came to issue of any kind which he valued so highly, that he must needs open the bottle himself: but in attempting it, the cork-screw dropt from his hand. Immediately his courtiers and generals flung themselves on the door to prevent.
Cromwell burst out into a laugh, and said: Should any fool, said he,
be brought to the door, he would fancy, from your posture, that you were seeking the Lord; and you are only seeking a cork-screw.
And amidst all the unguarded play and busi foonry of this singular personage, he took the opportunity of remarking the characters, designs, and weaknesses of men; and he would sometimes push them, by an indulgence in wise,
to open him the most secret recesses of their bosom.
Great regularity however, and even austerity of manners,
were always maintained in his court; and he was careful never by any liberties to give offence to the most rigid of the godly. Some state was upheld; a little dignity, and without necessity, a little splendour. The nobility, though courted by him, kept at a distance, and disdained to inter-mix with those mean persons who were the instruments of his government. Without departing from economy, he was generous to those who served him, and showed how to find out and engage in his interests every man possessed of those talents which any particular employment demanded. His generals, his admirals, his judges, his ambassadors, were persons who contributed, all of them in their several spheres, to the security of the protector, and to the honour and interest of the nation.
Under pretence of uniting Scotland and Ireland in one commonwealth with England, Cromwell had reduced those kingdoms to a total subjection; and he treated them entirely as conquered provinces. The civil administration of Scotland was placed in a council, consisting mostly of English, of which Lord Broghill, the Justiciary was admitted by the queen judges, four of whom were English. In order to curb the tyrannical nobility, be abolished all vassalage, and revived the office of justice of peace, which King James had introduced, but was not able to support. A long line of foreign pra-isons was maintained throughout the kingdom. An army of 10,000 men kept every thing in peace and obedience;
and neither the bandits of the mountains, nor the bigots
of the Low Countries, could induce their inclination to 1 About this time an accident had almost robbed the protector of his life, and perhaps of his kingdom. He was going to visit his friend Sir Hathway at Goodnestone, a short distance from the court. He had with him the lord chamberlain, as a secretary, and his private secretary, being in the coach. The horses were started and ran away; a man was unable to command the fall of a pole, which he was dragging, and he was dragged upon the rod for some time; a post, which he would have killed him, he was taken up without any damage but his short coat or horse.

turbulence and disorder. He courted the presbyterian clergy; though he nourished that intestine entity which prevailed between the revolutionaries and protesters; and he found that very little policy was requisite to foment quarrels among theologians. He permitted no church assemblies; being sensible that from thence had proceeded many of the past disorders. And, in the main, the Scots were obliged to acknowledge, that never before, while they enjoyed the irregularities of faction, liberty, had they attained so much happiness as at present when reduced to subjection under a foreign nation.

The protector's administration of Ireland was more severe and violent. The government of that island was first established by Cromwell. Alarmed, it was married Ireton's widow; then to Henry Cromwell, second son of the protector, a young man of an amiable, mild disposition, and not destitute of vigour and capacity. Above five millions of acres, forfeited either by the papist rebels or by the adherents of the king, were divided partly among the adventurers, who had advanced money to the parliament, partly among the English soldiers, who had arrears due to them. Examples of a more sudden and violent change of property are scarcely to be found in any history. An order was even issued to confine all the native Irish to the province of Connaught, where they would be shut up by rivers and mountains and eternal seas. It was hoped to be no longer dangerous to the English government; but this barbarous and absurd policy, which, from an impi- nance of attaining immediate security, must have depre- cated the respect of the world and reduced the English estates of no value, was soon abandoned as impracticable.

New parliament. Cromwell began to hope, that by his ad- ministration, attended with so much lustre and power abroad, so much order and tranquillity at home, he had now acquired such authority as would enable him to meet the representatives of the nation, and would assure him of their dutiful compliance with his government. He summoned a parliament; but, not trust- ing implicitly to the loyalty of the people, he used of every art, which his new model of representation allowed him to employ, in order to influence the elections, and fill the House with his own creatures. Ireland, being entirely in the hands of the army, those few but such officers as were most acceptable to him. Scotland showed a like compliance; and as the nobility and gentry of that kingdom regarded their attendance on English parlia- ments as an enormous badge of slavery, it was, on that account, more easy for the officers to prevail in the elections.

Notwithstanding all these precautions, the pro- tection still found that the majority would not be favour- ably inclined to his proposals. He set up the door, who permitted none to enter but such as produced a warrant from his council; and the council rejected about a hundred, who either refused a recon- ciliation of the protector's government, or were on other accounts obnoxious to him. These protected against so egregious a violence, subversive of all liberty, but every application for redress was neglected both by the council and the parliament.

The majority of the parliament, by means of these arts and violence, was now at last either friendly to the pro- tection, or resolved by their compliance to adjust, if possible, this military government to their laws and liberties. He voted a renunciation of all titles of Charles Stuarts, or any of his family; and this was the first act, dignified with the appearance of national consent, which had ever had that tendency. Colonel Jephson, in order to sound the labours of the House, resolved to move, that the future parliament should bestow the crown on Cromwell; and no surprise or reluctance was discovered on the occasion. When Cromwell afterwards asked Jephson what induced him to move in such a manner, he answered; "As I have the honour to sit in parliament, I must follow the dictates of my own conscience, whatever offence I may be so unfortunate as to give you. "Get thee gone," was the answer with a shrug of the shoulder, and "yet get thee gone, for a mad fellow as thou art."

In order to pave the way to this advancement, for which he so ardently longed, Cromwell resolved to sacrifice his major-generals, whom he knew to be extremely odious to the nation. That measure was also become necessary for his own security. All government, purely military, fluctuates perpetually, between a despotic monarchy and a despotic aristocracy, according as the authority of the chief commander prevails, had that of the officers next him in rank and dignity. The major-generals, being possessed of so much distinct jurisdiction, began to establish a separate title to power, and had rendered themselves formidable to the protector himself. It was absolutely neces- sary, though he had not foreseen it, he well knew, before it was too late, to provide a proper remedy. Clay- pole, his son-in-law, who possessed his confidence, aban- doned them to the pleasure of the House; and though the name of major-general was preserved, it was rather entirely annihilated, the power of the major-generals. At length, a motion in form was made by Alderman Pack, one of the city members, for investing the pro- tection with the dignity of king. This motion, at first, ex- cited great disorder, and divided the whole House into parties. The chief opposition came from the usual ad- herents of the protector, the major-generals, and such officers as depended on them. Lanier, a man of deep intrigue, and of great interest in the army, had long entertain- ed the ambition of succeeding Cromwell in the pro- tectionist; and he foresaw, that if the monarchy were ever established, his services would be lost, and thereupon the crown be transmitted to the posteriority of the prince first elected. He pleaded, therefore, conscience; and rising all those civil and religious jealousies against the kingly person, which he had previously excited, he encouraged among the soldiers, and which served them as a pretence for so many violences, he raised a numerous and still more formidable party against the motion.

On the other hand, the motion was supported by every one who was more particularly devoted to the protector, and who hoped, by so acceptable a measure, to pay count to the prevailing authority. Many persons also, attached to their country, despaired of ever being able to subvert the present policy, and who, in fixing it on ancient foundations, to induce the protector, from views of his own safety, to pay a regard to the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom. Even the protector himself had been so far influenced by these sentiments, that when the question regarded only persons, not forms of government, no one would any longer balance between the ancient royal family and an ignoble usurper, who, by blood, treason, and perfidy, had made himself to the throne. The bill was voted by a considerable majority; A. D. 1659.

and a committee was appointed to reason with the protector, and to overcome those scruples which had so long delayed. This project was not unacceptable to Cromwell.

The conference lasted for several days. 9th April.

The committee urged, that all the statutes and customs of England were founded on the supposition of royal authority; and could not, without extreme vio- lence, be adjusted to any other form of government. The protector, except during the minority of a king, was a name utterly unknown to the laws; and no man was ac- quainted with the extent or limits of his authority: that if it were attempted to define every part of his jurisdic- tion, many years, if not ages, would be required for the execution of so complicated a work; if the whole power of the king were at once transferred to him, the question was plain; the word "name," and the question was indis- putably due to the ancient title: that the English constitu- tion was more anxious concerning the form of government than concerning the birth-right of the first magistrate, and that he had promised, by an act of law of Henry VII., that the security of those who act in defence of the king in being, by whatever means he might have acquired possession; that it was extremely the interest of all his kinsmen's friends, that the protector should act in a manner as to make his government uniform with the whole, and that a republic, together with a protector, had been established, in order to provide further securities for the freedom of the constitution; but that by experience the remedy had been found insufficient, even dangerous and pernicious; since every undeterred power, such as that of a protector, must be arbitrary; and the more arbitrary, as it was contrary to the genius and inclination of thenation.

The difficulty consisted not in persuading Cromwell. He was sufficiently convinced of the solidity of these reasons; and his inclination, as well as judgment, was entirely on the side of the commons. But how to bring over the soldiers to the same way of thinking was the question. The office of king had been painted to them in such horrible colours, that there were no hopes of reconciling it, yet, even their general, to whom they were so much devoted. A contradiction, open and direct, to all past professions, would make them paws, in the eyes of the whole nation, for the most shameless hypocrites, estailed, by no other than mercenary motives, in the cause of the most perfidious traitor. Principles, such as they were, had been encouraged in them by every consideration, human and divine; and though it was easy, where interest concurred, to deceive them by the thinnest disguises, it might be found dangerous at once to pull off the mask, to show them, in a full light, the whole crime and deformity of their conduct. Suspended between these fears and his own repentance, Cromwell, particularly, excelled in London, and seemed still to oppose the reasonings of the committee; in hopes that by artifice he might be able to reconcile the refractory minds of the soldiers to his new design.

While the protector argued so much in contradiction, both to his judgment and inclination, it is no wonder that his eloquence, always confused, embarrassed, and unintelligible, should be involved in tenfold darkness, and discover no glimmering of common sense or reason. An exact account of this conference remains, and may be regarded as a great curiosity. The members of the committee, in their reasonings, discover judgment, knowledge, eloquence, in London, and are preserved by this memorable occasion. But what a contrast, when we pass to the protector’s reply! After so singular a manner does mature discourse bear its talents, that in a nation abounding with great personages, a man who, by superior personal merit alone, had made his way to supreme dignity, and had even obliged the parliament to make him a tender of the crown, was yet incapable of expressing himself on this occasion, but in a manner which a person of the most ordinary capacity would justly be ashamed of.

The opposition which Cromwell dreaded, was not that which came from Lambert and his adherents, whom he now regarded as capital enemies, and whom he was resolved to except from the body of the nation, nor from their authority: it was that which he met with in his own family, and from men, who, by interest as well as inclination, were the most devoted to him. Fleetwood had married his daughter. Dodington was married to one of these men, actuated by principle alone, could by no persuasion, artifice, or entreaty, be induced to consent, that their friend and patron should be invested with regal dignity. They told him that, if he accepted of the crown, they would instantly throw up their commissions, and never afterwards should have it in their power to serve him.4 Colonel Pride procured a petition against the office of king, signed by a majority of the officers who were in London and the neighbourhood. Several informations were given that he had entered into an engagement to murder the protector within a few hours after he should have accepted the offer of the parliament. Some sudden mutiny in the army was justly dreaded. And upon the whole, Cromwell, after the agony and perplexity of long doubt, was at last obliged to refuse that crown, which the representatives of the nation, in the most solemn manner, had rendered to him. But history is inclined to blame his choice; but he must be allowed the best judge of his own situation. And in such complicated subjects, the alteration of a very minute circumstance, unknown to the spectator, will often suffice to cast the balance, and render a determination, which, in itself, may be uneligious, very prudent, or even absolutely necessary to the actor.

A dream or prophecy, Lord Clarendon mentions, which he affirms, (and is approved by) Lord Herbert, versaUy talked of, almost from the beginning of the civil wars, and long before Cromwell was so considerable a person as to bestow upon it any degree of probability. In this prophecy it was foretold that Cromwell should be the greatest man in England, and would nearly, but never would fully, mount the throne. Such a prepossession probably arose from the heated imagination, either of himself or of his followers; and as it might be one cause of the great progress which he had already made, it is not an unlikely reason which may be assigned for his refusing, at this time, any further elevation.

The parliament, when the regal dignity was rejected by Cromwell, found themselves obliged to retain the name of a commonwealth and protector; and as the government was hitherto a manifest usurpation, it was thought proper to sanctify it by a seeming choice of the people and their representatives. Instead of the sovereign government, which was the will of the general officers alone, an humble petition and advice was framed, and offer-prize, as if secure of the duty and attachment of the three kingdoms. His alliance with Sweden he still supported; and he endeavoured to assist that crown in its successful enterprises, for reducing all its neighboring and ambitious kingdoms, and rendering itself absolute master of the Baltic. As soon as Spain declared war against him, he concluded a peace and an alliance with France, and united himself in all its undertakings with that great and illustrious kingdom, Spain, having long courted, in vain, the friendship of the successful usurper, was reduced at last to apply to the unfortunate prince. Charles formed a league with Philip, removed the pretensions of Francis to the crown of France, and raised four regiments of his own subjects, whom he employed in the Spanish service. The Duke of York, who had, with applause, served some campaigns in the French army, and who had merited the particular esteem of Marshal Turenne, now joined his brother, and continued to seek military experience under Don John of Austria, and the Prince of Condé.

The scheme of foreign politics, adopted by the protector, was highly imprudent, but was suitable to that magnanimity and enterprise, with which he was so sagaciously endowed. He was particularly desirous of conquest and dominion on the continent; and he sent over into Flanders six thousand Englishmen, under a Dutch general officer, of the French army commanded by Turenne. In the former campaign, Mardryke was taken, and put into the hands of the English. Early this campaign, siege was laid to Dunkirk; and when the Spanish army advanced to relieve it, the combined armies of France and England marched out of their trenches, and fought the battle of the Dunes, where the Spaniards were totally defeated. Dunkirk taken.

The value of the English was much remarked on this occasion. Dunkirk, being soon after surrendered, was by agreement delivered to Cromwell. He committed the government of that important place to Lockhart, a Scotchman of abilities, who had married his niece, and was a leading member of the court of Parliament.

This acquisition was regarded by the protector as the means only of obtaining further advantages. He was resolved to concert measures with the French court for the final conquest and partition of the Low Countries. Had he lived much longer, and maintained his authority in England, so chimerical, or rather so dangerous, a project would certainly have been carried into execution. And this first and principal step towards more extensive conquest, which France, during a whole century, has never yet been able, by an infinite expense of blood and treasure, fully to attain, had at once been accomplished by the enterprise, though unskilful, politics of Cromwell.

During this period of motley combinations of mutual friendship and regard passed between the French king and the protector. Lord Fancenberg, Cromwell's son-in-law, was deposed to London, then in the camp before Dunkirk, and in the regard, usually paid to foreign princes by the French court: a Mazarin was sent to London his nephew Mancini, along with the Duke of Crequy; and expressed his regret, that his urgent affairs should deprive him of the honour which he had long wished for, of paying, in person, his respects to the greatest man in the world.

The protector respited little satisfaction from the success of his arms abroad: the situation in which he stood at home, kept him perpetually in anxiety and care. His administration, so expensive both by military enterprises and secret intelligence, had exhausted his revenue, and involved him in considerable debts. The royalties, the heard, and the maintenance of their dependencies for general reparation; and Ormond was secretly come over with a view of concerting measures for the execution of this pro-

He applied to get possession of Thistle and the passage of the Sound. For that purpose an agent was sent to the court of Holstein, with a letter, containing the terms on which he proposed to get possession of Bremen. Thistle, vol. vi. p. 476. The agent reported, that the battle was fought on a day which was held for a fast in London, so that an Fleetwood said, the English fleet, which was not enaunt of the French, had been taken by the Lord had given a signal answer. The Lord has not only owned us in our wars before, but, in our walking upon him in a way of prayer, which is indeed our old experienced approved way in all straights and difficulties, though we have not had our desire, was our situation in the Indies, not more than able for the same spirit. Thistle, vol. vi. p. 476. You have, says he, as I verily believe and am persuaded, a plentiful stock of prayers given for you daily, sent up by the nearest and most approved ministers and Chris-
The countenance of mind was now for ever fled from the protector: he felt that the grandeur which he had attained was so much his了自己的cardinal, and that the tranquillity which it belonged to virtue alone, and moderation, fully to ascertain. Overwhelmed with the load of public affairs, dreading perpetually some fatal accident in his distempered government, seeing nothing but treachery and anarchy and possessing the confidence of no party, resting his title on no principle, civil or religious, he found his power to depend on so delicate a pose of factions and interests, as the smallest event was able, without any preparation, in a moment to overturn. Death too, which with such signal intrepidity he had braved in the field, being incessantly threatened by the pandews of fanatical or interested assassins, and every moment assumed to threaten one of his relatives, and haunted him in every scene of business or repose. Each action of his life betrayed the terrors under which he laboured. The aspect of strangers was uneasy to him: with a piercing and anxious eye he surveyed every face to which he was not daily accustomed. He never moved a step without strong guards attending him; he wore armour under his clothes, and further secured himself by offensive weapons, a sword, falchion, and pistols, which he always carried about him; but treachery was still as constant a feature in the direct road, or by the same way which he went. Every journey he performed with hurry and precipitation. Sel dom he slept above three nights together in the same inn, lest he should be anticipated in the chamber he intended to choose, or mistrusted himself in any which was not provided with back doors, at which windows were carefully placed. Society terrified him, while he reflected on his numerous, unknown, and implacable enemies: solitude astonished him, by withdrawing that protection which he found so necessary for his security.

His body also, from the contagion of the sicknote of the anxious mind, began to be affected; and his protector, health seemed sensibly to decline. He was seized with a slow fever, which changed into a tertian ague. For the space of a week, no dangerous symptoms appeared. He returned from no place without expectation of walking abroad. At length the fever increased, and he himself began to entertain some thoughts of death, and to cast his eye towards that future existence, whose idea had once been intimately present to him; though since, in the hurry of affairs, and in the shock of wars and factions, it had, no doubt, been considerably obliterated. He asked Goodwin, one of his preachers, if the doctrine were true, that the elect could never fall or suffer final reprobation; for he was entirely undecided, replied the preacher. "Then am I safe," said the protector: "for I am sure that once I was in a state of grace."

His physicians were sensible of the perilous condition to which his dissipator had reduced him: but his chaplains, by their prayers, visions, and revelations, so buoyed up his hopes, that he began to believe his life out of all danger. A favourable answer, it was pretended, had been returned by Heaven to the petitions of all the guilty; they had relied on their averagements much more than on the opinion of the most experienced physicians. "I tell you," he cried with confidence to the latter, "I tell you, I shall not die of this distemper; I am well assured of my recovery. It is prevented by the Lord. I am freed by my supplications, but to those of men who hold a stricter commerce and more intimate correspondence with him. Ye may have skill in your profession; but nature can do more than all the medical art, and the power of God is far above nature." Nay, to such a degree of madness did their enthusiastic assurances amount, that upon a fast day, which was observed on his account both at Hampton-court and at Whitehall, they did not so much pray for his health, as give thanks for the undoubted pledges which they had received of his recovery. He himself was overheard offering up his addresses to Heaven; and so far had the illusions of fanaticism prevailed over the plainest dictates of natural morality, that he assumed the character of a mediator, in interfering for his people, than that of a criminal, whose atrocious violation of social duty had, from every tribunal, human and divine, merited the severest reprobation.

Many persons, who had before seen him as one of the most contemptible and wretched of mankind, considered him then in a more fatal aspect; and the physicians were obliged to break silence, and to declare, that the protector could not survive the next fit with which he was threatened. The council was alarmed. A death, which threatened his will, was in their eyes of the highest importance to his successor. His senses were gone, and he could not now express his intentions. They asked him whether he did not mean that his eldest son, Richard, should succeed him in the protectorate. A simple affirmative was to be, extraneous to such a question. Soon after, on the 3d of September, that very day which he had always considered as the most fortunate for him, he expired. A violent tempest, which immediately succeeded his death, served as a subject of discourse to the vulgar. His partisans, as well as his enemies, were fond of remarking this event; and each of them endeavoured, by forced inferences, to interpret it as a confirmation of their particular prejudices.

The writers, attached to the memory of character...this wonderful person, make his character, with regard to abilities, bear the air of the most extravagant panegyric; his enemies form such a conception of his moral qualities as resembles the most virulent invective. Both of them, it may be confessed, are supported by such striking circumstances in his conduct and fortune, as bespeak their representation a great air of probability. What could be more extraordinary, than the circumstance of his being a person of private birth and education, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, which have sometimes, or shining talents of mind, which have often, raised men to the highest dignities, should have the courage to attempt, and the abilities to execute, so great a design as the subverting one of the most ancient and best established monarchies in the world? That he should have the power and boldness to put his prince and master to an open and infamous death? Should {shame} that numerous and strongly allied family? Cover all these tenements under a seeming obedience to a parliament, in whose service he pretended to be retained? Temple too upon that parliament in their turn, and scornfully expel them as soon as they have been the subject of all sorts of abuse and calumny? Erect in their place the dominion of the saints, and give reality to the most visionary idea, which the heated imagination of any fanatic was ever able to entertain? Suppress again that monster in its infancy, and openly set up himself above all things that ever were called sovereign in England? Overcome first all his enemies by arms, and all his friends afterwards by artifice? Serve all parties patriotically, and to the utmost degree of their ruin and destruction? Run over each corner of the three nations, and subdue, with equal facility, both the riches of the south, and the poverty of the north? Be feared and courted by all foreigners, and accepted as a host of a god? Call together parliaments with a word of his pen...and scatter them again with the breath of his mouth? Reduce to subjection a warlike and discontented nation by means of a mutinous army? Command a mutinous army to do its vengeance by means of a most abominable policy and daily petitioned, that he would be pleased, at the rate of millions a year, to be hired as master of those who had hired him before to be their servant! Have the estates and lives of three nations at such a disposal as was once the little instance of the fate of the unfortunate and liberal in the spending of them? And lastly, (for there is no end of enumerating every particular of his glory,) with one word beseech all this power and splendour to his possession? Do possessed of peace at home, and triumph abroad? Be buried among kings, and with more than regal solemnity; and leave a name behind him not to be extinguished but with the whole world; which as it was too little for his praise, so might it have been for his conquests, if the short line of his mortal life could have stretched out to the extent of his immortal designs."

My intention is not to disfigure this picture, drawn by so masterly a hand: I shall only endeavour to remove from it somewhat of the murrells; a circumstance, which on all occasions, gives much ground for doubt and suspicion. It seems to me, that the circumstance of Cromwell's life, in which his abilities are principally discovered, is his rising from a private station to the highest dignity of the empire, so much advanced before him, to a high command and authority in the army. His great courage, his signal military talents, his eminent dexterity and address, were all requisite for the exercise of the essential powers of an army; and the motion appear the effect of supernatural abilities, when we consider, that Fairfax himself, a private gentleman, who had not the advantage of a seat in parliament, had, through the same steps, attained even a superior rank, and, if endowed with common capacity and penetration, had been able to retain it. To incite such an army to rebellion against the parliament, required no uncommon art or industry; to have kept them in obedience had been the more difficult enterprise. When the breach was well and truly advanced between the military and civil powers, a supreme and absolute authority, from that moment, is devolved on the general; and if he be afterwards pleased to employ artifice or policy, it may be regarded on most occasions as great condescension, if not as superfluous caution. That Cromwell was ever able really to blind or overreach either the king or the republicans, does not appear; as they possessed no means of resisting the force which he commanded, they were glad to temporize with him, and, by seeming to be deceived, wait for opportunities of freeing themselves from his dominion. If he seduced the military fanatics, it is to be considered that their interests and his evidently concurred, the army was drawn up in his name, and that he led them to the greatest imposition, and that he himself was at bottom as fanatic an enthusiast as the worst of them, and, in order to obtain their confidence, needed but to display those vulgar and ridiculous habits, which he had early acquired, and on which he set so high a value. An army is so forcible, and at the same time so coarse a weapon, that any hand which wields it may, without much dexterity, perform any operation, and attain any ascendant in human society.

The domestic administration of Cromwell, though it discovers great abilities, was conducted without any plan either of liberty or arbitrary power: perhaps, his difficult situation and situation, instigated by the spirit of the age, and though full of intrepidity, were perilous to national interest, and seem more the result of impetuous fury or narrow prejudices, than of cool foresight and deliberation.

An eminent personage, however, he was in many respects, and even a superior genius; but unequal and irregular in his operations. And though not defective in any talent, except that of eloquence, the abilities which in him were most admired were a fine eye for the most brilliant and gaudy success, were the magnificent resolution of his enterprises, and his peculiar dexterity in discovering the characters, and practising on the weaknesses of mankind.

If we were to imagine a perfect man, creature of mind such as Inigo Jones, from that indulgence which is due to the blindness and infirmities of the original of the human species, we shall not be inclined to load his memory with such violent reproaches as those which his enemies usually throw upon it. Amidst the passions and prejudices of that period, that he should prefer the parliament to the government was, without doubt, reasonable; and since, even at present, some men of sense and knowledge are disposed to think that the question with regard to the justice of the quarrel, may be regarded as doubtful and uncertain. The murder of the king, the most atrocious of all his actions, was to him covered under a mighty cloud of republican and fanatical illusions; and it is not impossible, but he might believe it, as many others did, the most meritorious action that he could perform. His subsequent usurpation was the effect of necessity, as well as of ambition; nor is it easy to see, how the various factions could at that time have been restrained, without a mixture of military and arbitrary authority. The private deportment of Cromwell, as a son, a husband, a father, a friend, is exposed to no considerable censure, if it does not rather merit praise. And, upon the whole, his character does not appear more extraordinary and unusual by the mixture of so much absurdity with so much penetration, than by his tempering such virtues and such vices in fanaticism with so much regard to justice and humanity.

Cromwell was in the fifty-ninth year of his age when he died. He was of a robust frame of body, and of a cleanly, though not of an agreeable countenance. He left only two sons, Richard and Henry; and three daughters, one married to General Fleetwood, another to Lord Fauconberg, a third to Lord Rich. His father died when he was very young. He married till after he was a protector; and, contrary to his character, was frequently absent from his court, and on no account allowed to frequent visits from him. She was a decent woman, and, by her frugality and industry, had raised and educated a numerous family upon a small fortune. She had even been obliged to set up her house, and to manage her own household affairs. She was one of the most celebrated women of that age, and one of the most excellent mothers. She had a great reputation for the management of the brewery. Ludlow, by way of ennu, mentions the great acquisition, which he would receive to his royal revenues upon his mother's death, who possessed a jointure of sixty pounds a year upon her estate. She was of a good family, of the stock of Stuart; remotely allied, as is by some supposed, to the royal family.

CHAP. LXII.

A.D. 1658.

All the arts of Cromwell's policy had so often practised that they began to lose their effect; and his power, instead of being confirmed by time and success, seemed every day to become more tinct and precarious. His friends the most closely connected with him, and his counsellors the most trusted, were entering into councils to determine him; and, with all his penetration into the characters of men, he could not find any ministers on whom he could rely. Men of probity and honour, he knew, would not submit to be the instruments of an usurpation violent and ill-timed, and those who were free from the restraint of principle, might betray, from interest, that cause, in which, from no better motives, they had enlisted themselves. Even those on whom he conferred a favour, never deemed it his part to become equivalent for the sacrifices which they made to obtain it: whoever was refused any demand, justified his anger by the specious colours of conscience and of duty. Such difficulties surrounded the protector, that his dying at so critical a time is esteemed by many the most fortunate event that ever attended him; and it was thought, that all his courage and dexterity could not much longer have extended his usurped administration.

But when that potent hand was removed, which contributed to one end, the dissolution of the unwieldy and ill-fitted machine. Richard, a young man of no experience, educated in the country, accustomed to a retired life, acquainted with the officers, men unknown to them, recommended by no military exploits, endeared by no familiarities, could not easily have thought, maintain that authority which his father had acquired by so many valourous achievements, and such signal successes. And when it was observed, that he possessed only the life, which was bounded by so many vices; that indulgence, incapacity, irresolution, attended his facility and good nature; the various hopes of men were excited by the expectation of some great event or revolution. For some time, however, the public was disappointed in this opinion. The council of the protector as recognised the succession of Richard: fleet—known and wood, in whose favour it was supposed protector.

Cromwell had formerly made a will, renounced all claim or pretension to the protectorship; Henry, Richard's brother, who governed Ireland with popularity, insured him the obedience of that kingdom: Monk, whose authority was well established in Scotland, being much attached to the family of Cromwell, was immediately proclaimed the new protector: the army, every where, the fleet, acknowledged his title: above ninety addresses, from the counties and most considerable corporations, congratulated him on his accession, in all the terms of dutiful allegiance. Foreign ministers were forward in paying him the usual compliments: and Richard, whose moderate, unassuming character never would have led him to contend for empire, was tempted to accept of so rich an inheritance, which seemed to be tendered to him by the consent of all mankind.

It was found necessary to call a parliament, in order to furnish supplies, both for the ordinary administration, and for those engagements with foreign princes, particularly Sweden, into which the late protector had entered. In hopes of obtaining greater influence in elections, the ancient right was restored to all the small boroughs; and the counties were allowed no more than their usual members. The House of Peers, or the other House, consisted of the same persons that had been appointed by Oliver. The House of Commons, at first, signed, without hesitation, an engagement not to alter the present government. They next proceeded to examine the humble petition and advice; and after great opposition, without any vehement argument, they was carried by difficulty, carried by the court-party to confirm it. An acknowledgment too of the authority of the other House was extorted from them; though it was resolved not to treat this House of Peers with any greater respect than they should return to the Commons. A declaration was also made, that the establishment of the other House should nowise prejudice the right of such of the ancient peers as had, from the beginning of the war, adhered to the parliament. But in all these proceedings, the opposition among the Commons was so considerable, and the debates were so much prolonged, that all business was retarded, and great alarm given to the partisans of the young protector.

But there was another quarter from which greater dangers were justly apprehended. The most considerable officers of the army, and even Fleetwood, brother-in-law to the protector, were entering into cahals against him. No character in human society is more dangerous than that of the fanatic; because, if attended with weak judgment, he is exposed to the suggestion of others; if supported by more discernment, he is entirely governed by his own passions, which save in the family of Cromwell, immensely increased proportion. Fleetwood was of the former species; and as he was extremely addicted to a republic, and even to the fifth monarchy, or dominion of the saints, it was easy for those, who had insinuated themselves into his confidence, to instil disgusts against the dignity of protector. The whole republican party in the army, which was still considerable. Fitz, Mason, Massy, Farley, united themselves to that general. The officers too of the same party, whom Cromwell had disposed, as Delane, Okey, Ludlow, began to appear, and to recover that authority, which had been only for a time suspended. A party likewise, who found themselves eclipsed in Richard's favour, Sydenham, Kelso, Berry, Hedges, joined the cabal of the other. Even Devon, the protector's uncle, lent his authority to that faction. But above all, the intrigues of Lambert, who was now roused from his retirement, inflamed all those dangerous humours, and threatened the nation with some great resolution, for he had disputed with the officers established in their meetings in Fleetwood's apartments; and because Cabal of Wal. de dwelt in Wallingford-house, the party re-ceived a denomination from that place.

Richard, who possessed neither resolution nor penetration, was prevailed to give an unguarded consent for calling a general council of officers, who might make him proposals, as they pretended, for the good of the army. No sooner were they assembled than they voted a remonstrance. They there lamented, that the good old cause, as they termed it, that is, the cause for which they had engaged against the late king, was entirely neglected; and they proposed, as a remedy, that the whole military power should be vested in some person whom they might all confide. The city militia, influenced by two aldermen, Tichburn and Ireton, expressed the same resolution of adhering to the good old cause.

The council was justly alarmed at those movements among the officers. The persons in whom he chiefly confided were, all of them, excepting Broghil, men of civil characters and professions; Fiennes, Thurloe, Whitebroke, Wolesley; which would only assist him to have them removed. He possessed none of those arts which were proper to gain an enthusiastic army. Murmurs were thrown out against some promotions which he had made. Would you have me, said he, prefer none but the godly? Here is Dick Lambert, to continue in the same, or neither pray nor preach; yet will I trust him before ye all.

This imprudence gave great offence to the pretended saints. The other qualities of the protector were correspondent to these sentiments: he was of a gentle, humane, and generous disposition. Some of his party offering to put an end to those intrigues by the death of Lambert, he declared, that he would not purchase power or dominion by such sanguinary measures.

The parliament was no less alarmed at the military cabals. They voted that there should be no meeting or general council of officers, except with the protector's consent, or by his orders. This vote brought affairs immediately to crisis. The officers proceeded to Richard and demanded of him the dissolution of the parliament. Desbrowv, a man of a clownish and brutal nature, threatened him, if he should refuse compliance. The protector wanted the resolution to deny, and possessed little shilling to resist. The parliament was dissolved; and by the same act the protector was, by every one, considered as effectually dethroned. Soon after he signed his deposition in form.

Henry, the deputy of Ireland, was endowed with the same moderate disposition as Richard; but as he possessed more vigour and capacity, it was apprehended that he might make resistance. His popularity in Ireland was great, and even his personal authority. He had the best of his youth, was considerable. Had his ambition been very eager, he, had, no doubt, been able to create disturbance: but being threatened by Sir Hardress Waller, Colonel John Jones, and other officers, he was quietly resigned his command, and retired to England. He had once entertained thoughts, which he had not resolution to execute, of proclaiming the kigl in Dublin.b

Thus fell suddenly, as from a cloudless height, but by a catastrophe without any hurt or injury, the family of the Cromwells. Richard continued to possess an estate, which was moderate, and burdened too with a large debt, which he had contracted for the interment of his father. After the restoration, though he remained unmolested, he thought proper to travel for some years; and at Pecznus in Languedoc he was introduced, under a borrowed name, to the Prince of Conti. That prince talked of English affairs, and Richard, who was extremely fond of him, and dreamed of power and capacity. "But as for that poor worthless fellow, Richard," said he, "what has become of him? How could he be such a blockhead as to reap no greater benefit from all his father's time and successes?" Richard attended his peaceful and quiet life to an extreme old age, and died not till the latter end of Queen Anne's reign. His social virtues, more valuable than the greatest capacity, met with a remembrance more precious than noisy triumphs and a name, and a great contentment and tranquillity.

The council of officers, now possessed of supreme authority, deliberated what form of government they should establish. Many of them seemed inclined to exercise the power of the sword in the most open manner; but as it was apprehended that the people would with great difficulty be induced to pay taxes, levied by arbitrary will and pleasure; it was agreed to preserve the shadow of civil administration, and to revive the long parliament, which had been expelled by Cromwell. That assembly could not be dissolved, it was asserted, but by their own consent; and violence had interrupted, but was not able to destroy, their right to government. The officers also expected that their opinions, in the wilderness of their own weakness, they would be contented to act in subordination to the military commanders, and would thenceforth allow all the authority to remain where the power was so vested.

The officers applied to Lenthal, the speaker, and proposed to him, that the parliament should resume their seats. Lenthal was of a low, timid spirit; and, being uncertain what course might be the best, was desirous of evading the proposal. He replied, that he could by no means comply with the desire of the officers; being engaged in a business of far greater importance to himself, which he could not omit on any account, because it concerned the safety of the state, and the eminence of the officers in question; he added, that the officers pressed him to tell what it might be. He was preparing, he said, to participate of the Lord's supper, which he resolved to take next sabbath. They insisted, that mercy was preferable to sacrifice, and that he could not better prepare himself for that great duty, than by contributing to the public service. All their remonstrances had no effect. However, on the appointed day, the speaker being informed that a tumult of the House was likely to meet, thought proper, notwithstanding the salvation of his soul, as Ludlow observes, to join them; and the House immediately proceeded upon business. The seceded members attempted, but in vain, to resume their seats among them.

The numbers of this parliament were small; Long parlia-lleft exceed seventy members; their alt. most, or Kump-thonty in the nation, ever since they had removed from the army, was extremely diminished; and after their expulsion had been totally annihilated: but being all of them men of violent ambition; some of them men of experience and capacity; they were resolved, since they enjoyed the title of the supreme authority, and observed that some appearance of a parliament was requisite for the purposes of the army, not to act a subordinate part to those who acknowledged themselves their masters. They chose a council, in which they took care that their men were of the majority: they appointed Fleetwood lieutenant-general, but inserted in his commission, that it should only continue during the pleasure of the House: they chose seven persons who should nominate to such commissions as became vacant; and they voted that all commissions should be received from the speaker, and be assigned by him in the name of the House. These precautions, the tendency of which was considerable, gave great displeasure to the officers; and their discontent would immediately have broken out into some resolution fatal to the parliament, had it not been checked by the apprehensions of danger from the common enemy.

The bulk of the nation consisted of royalists and presbyterians; and to both these parties the domination of the pretended parliament had ever been to the last degree odious. When that assembly was expelled by Cromwell, contempt had succeeded to hatred; and no reserve had been made to express the utmost detestation against the impotent ambition of these usurpers. Seeing them reinstated in authority, all orders of men felt the highest indignation, together with apprehensions, lest such tyrannical efforts should be renewed, as soon as they should fall upon their enemies, who had so openly insulted them.

A secret reconciliation, therefore, was made between the rival parties, and it was agreed, that, burying former enmities, they should all join in the good cause. Upon this understanding they passed the Townshend, or Throw of the Rump; so they called the parliament, in allusion to that part of the animal body. The presbyterians, sensible from experience that their passion for liberty, however laudable, had carried them into unwarrantable excesses, were willing to lay aside ancient jealousies, and, at all hazards, to restore the royal family. The nobility, the gentry, bent their passionate endeavours to the same enterprise, by which alone they could be redeemed from slavery. And no man was so remote from party, so indifferent to public good, as not to feel the most ardent wishes for the dissolution of that tyranny which, whether the civil or the military part of it was considered, appeared equally oppressive and ruinous to the nation.

More than three hundred who had so narrowly escaped the royalists on his trial before the high court of justice, seemed rather amounted than daunted with past danger; and haring, by his resolute behaviour, obtained the highest confidence in all the regiments of the commonwealth, and became the centre of all their conspiracies. In many counties, a resolution was taken to raise in arms. Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir Horatio Townshend, undertook to secure Lyme; General Massey engaged at Gloucester; Lord Newport, Littleton, and other gentlemen, conspired to take possession of Shrewsbury; Sir George Booth, of Chester; Sir Thomas Middleton, of North Wales; Arundel, Pollard, Grenville, Trevisa, of Plymouth and Exeter. A day was appointed for the execution of all these enterprises. And the king, attended by the Duke of York, had secretly arrived at Calais, with a resolution of putting himself at the head of his loyal subjects. The French court had promised to supply him with a small body of forces, in order to countenance the insurrections of the English.

This combination was discovered by the infidelity of Sir John, and a party, who, observing the correspondence which he had begun with Cromwell. He had engaged to reveal all conspiracies, so far as to destroy their effect; but reserved to himself the management of convincing the conspirators. He took care never to name any of the infamous conspirators, who had zealously adhered, and were resolved still to adhere, to the royal cause in every fortune. These men he esteemed; these he even loved. He betrayed only the new converts among the presbyterians, or such lukewarm royalists, as, discouraged with their disappointment, were resolved to expose themselves to no more hazards. A lively proof how impossible it is, even for the most corrupted minds, to divest themselves of all regard to morality and social duty.

July. Many of the conspirators in the different counties were thrown into prison; others, astonished at such revolts of the gentry, left their houses, or remained quiet; the most tempestuous were prevailed during the whole time appointed for the rendezvous; insomuch that some found it impossible to join their friends, and others were dismayed with fear and superstition at an incident so unusual during the summer season. Of all the projects, the only one which took effect was that of Sir George Booth for the seizing of Chester. The Earl of Derby, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Mr. Arundel, Colonel Massey, and above all Sir William Middleton joined Booth with some troops from North Wales; and the malcontents were powerful enough to subdue all in that neighbourhood who ventured to oppose them. In their declaration they made no mention of the king: they only demanded a free and full parliament.

The parliament was justly alarmed. How combustible the materials, they well knew; and the fire was now, as it seemed, falling among them. Booth was of a family extensively presbyterian; and his conjunction with the royalists they regarded as a dangerous symptom. They had many officers whose fidelity they could more depend on than that of Lambert; but there was no one in whose judgement and capacity they reposed such confidence. They commissioned him to suppress the rebels. He made incredible haste. Booth imprudently ventured himself out of the walls of Chester, and, in the open country, was surrounded by raw troops against these hardy veterans. He was suppressed, soon routed and taken prisoner. His whole army was dispersed. And the parliament had no further occupation than to fill all the jails with their open or secret enemies. Designs were even entertained of transporting the loyal families to Barbadoes, Jamaica, and the other colonies; lest they should propagate in England children of the same malignant affections with themselves.

This success hastened the ruin of the parliament. Lambert, at the head of a body of troops, was no less dangerous to them than Booth. A thousand pounds, which they sent him to buy a jwel, were employed by him in liberal presents to his officers. At his instigation they drew up a petition, and transmitted it to Fleetwood, a weak man, and an honest, if sincerity in folly deserve that honourable name. The import of this petition was, that Fleetwood should be made commander-in-chief, Lambert, commander-in-chief of the horse, Desborow lieutenant-general of the horse, Monk major-general of the foot. To which a demand was added, that no officer should be dismissed from his command but by a court-martial.

The parliament, alarmed at the danger, immediately cashiered Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Clarke, Barrow, Kelsey, Cobbet. Sir Arthur Hazeldig proposed the imprisonment of Lambert for high treason. Fleetwood's commission was vacated, and the command of the army was vested in seven persons, of whom that general was one. The parliament voted, that they would have no more general officers. And they declared it high treason to levy any money without consent of parliament.

But these votes were feeble weapons in opposition to the swords of the soldiery. Lambert drew some troops together, in order to decide the controversy. Okey, who was leading his regiment to the assistance of the parliament, was taken by them. Morley and Moss brought their regiments into Palace-yard, resolved to oppose the violence of Lambert. But that artful general knew an easy way of disappointing them.

He placed his soldiers by the tower, and hastened to Westminster-hall. When the speaker came in his coach, he ordered the horses to be turned, and very civilly conducted him home. The other members were, in like manner, intercepted. And the two regiments in Palace-yard, observing that they were exposed to derision, peaceably retired to their quarters. A little before this bold enterprise, a solemn fast had been kept by the army; and it is remarked, that this ceremony was the usual prelude to every signal violence which they committed.

The officers found themselves again invested with supreme authority, of which they intended for ever to retain the substance, however much exceptions on others the empty shadow or appearance. They elected a committee of twenty-three persons, of whom seven were officers. These they pretended to invest with sovereign authority; and they called them a Committee of Safety. They spoke every where of summing a parliament chosen by the people; but they really took some steps towards assembling a military parliament, composed of officers elected from every regiment. In the meantime, the force of these there prevailed nothing but the melancholy fears, to the nobility and gentry, of a bloody massacre and extermination; to the rest of the people, of perpetual servitude, beneath those sanctified robbers, whose union and whose Foreign affairs. In this distracted condition, the other kingdoms of Europe were hastening towards a compounding of those disputes by which they had so long been agitated. The parliament, while it preserved authority, instead of following the imprudent politics of Cromwell, and lending assistance to the conquering Swede, embraced the maxims of the French in peace and wealth, and resolved, in conjunction with that state, to mediate by force an accommodation between the northern powers. Montague was sent with a squadron to the Baltic, and carried with him as ambassadors Algernon Sidney, the celebrated republican, Sidney found the Swedish monarch, by whom he was received in the palace of Copenhagen, the capital of his enemy; and was highly pleased, that, with a Roman arrogance, he could check the progress of royal victories, and display, in so singular a manner, the superiority of freedom above tyranny. With the highest indignation, the ambitious prince was obliged to submit to the imperious mediation of the two commonwealths.—"It is cruel," said he, "that laws should be disregarded and perverted!" But his wife's atony was enclosed in a island, and might be starved by the combined squadrons of England and Holland. He was obliged, therefore, to quit his prey, when he had so successfully managed the concerns of it; and having agreed to a pacification with Denmark, he retired into his own country, where he soon after died.

The wars between France and Spain were also concluded by the treaty of the Pyrenees. These animosities had long been carried on between the rival states, even while governed by a sister and brother, who cordially loved and esteemed each other. But politics, which had so long prevailed over these friendly affections, now at last yielded to their influence; and never was the triumph more full and complete. The Spanish Low Countries, if not every part of that monarch, lay almost entirely at the mercy of its enemy. Broken armies, disorderly finances, law and irreligious rebels, by which the dispersed provinces of Spain defended against the vigorous power of France. But the queen-regent, anxious for the fate of her brother, employed her authority with the cardinal to stop the progress of the French conquests, and put an end to a quarrel which, being commenced by ambition, and attended with victory, was at last concluded with moderation. The young monarch of France, though aspiring and warlike in his character, was in his judgment not occupied in the pursuit of love or gallantry, and had passively resigned the reins of empire into the hands of his politic minister. And he remained an unconsidered spectator; while an opportunity for counter was parted with, which he never was able, during the whole course of his active reign, fully to redeem.

The ministers of the two crowns, Mazarin and Don Louis de Haro, met at the foot of the Pyrenees, in the Isle of Peñans, a place which was supposed to belong to neither kingdom. The negociation being brought to an issue by frequent conferences between the ministers, the monarchs themselves agreed to a congress; and these two splendid courts appeared in their full lustre amidst those savage mountains. Philip brought his daughter, Mary Theresa, along with him; and giving her to marriage to his nephew, Louis, endeavoured to cement by this new tie the incompatible interests of the two monarchs. The French king made a solemn renunciation every succession which might accrue to him in right of his consort; a vain formality, too weak to restrain the ungoverned ambition of princes.

The affairs of England were in so great disorder, that it was not improbable to comprehend that kingdom in the treaty, or adjust measures with a power which was in such incessant fluctuation. The king, reduced to despair by the failure of all enterprises for his restoration, was resolved to make a fresh attempt; but it was agreed he should be sent to the Pyrenees at the time when the two ministers were in the midst of their negociations. Don Louis received him with that generous civility peculiar to his nation; and expressed great inclination, had the low condition of affairs in the state of England, to make the distressed monarch. The cautious Mazarin, pleading the alliance of France with the English commonwealth, refused even to see him; and though the king offered to marry the cardinal's niece, for the present, obtain the means of a happy life, but empty professions of respect, and protestations of services.

The condition of that monarch, to all the world, seemed totally desperate. His friends had been baffled in every enterprise; and a sort of unmitigated servitude now streamed with the blood of the more active royalties: the spirits of many were broken with tedious imprisonment: the estates of all were burdened by the fines and confiscations which had been levied upon them; no one dared openly show himself of that party; and so small did their number seem to a superficial view, that, even should the nation recover its liberty, which was deemed nowise probable, it was judged uncertain what form of government it would embrace. But amidst all these gloomy prospects, fortune, by a surprising revolution, was now paving the way for the king to mount, in peace and triumph, the throne of his ancestors. It was by the prudence and loyalty of the Prince de Condé and Monck, that this happy change was at last accomplished.

George Monck, to whom the fate was reserved of re-establishing monarchy, and finishing the war, was the second son of a family in Devonshire, ancient and honourable, but lately, from too great hospitality and expense, somewhat fallen to decay. He betook himself, in early youth, to the profession of arms; and was engaged in the unfortunate expeditions to Cadiz and the Isle of France. After England had concluded peace with all her neighbours, he sought military experience in the Low Countries, the great school of war to all the European nations; and he rose to the command of a company under Lord Goring. This company consisted of 200 men, of whom a hundred were volunteers, often men of family and fortune, sometimes noblemen who lived upon their own income in a sphere of action, and resources a military turn at this time prevailed among the English.

When the sound of war was first heard in this island, Monck returned to England, partly desirous of promotion in his native country, partly distressed with some ill usage from the States, of which he found reason to complain. Upon the Scottish pacification, he was employed by the Earl of Leicester against the Irish rebels; and having obtained a regiment, was soon taken notice of for his military skill, discipline, and constancy. Having been employed in ostentation, expense, or cares, merely by his humane and equal temper, he gained the good-will of the soldiery; who, with a mixture of familiarity and affection, usually called him Honesty Monck; an honourable appellation, which they still continued to him, even during his greatest elevation. He was remarkable for his moderation in party; and while all around him were inflamed into rage against the opposite faction, he fell under suspicion from the candour and tranquillity of his behaviour. When the Irish army was called over into England, surmises of this kind had been so far credited, that he had even been suspended from his command, and ordered to Oxford that he might be tried. The charge laid against him. His establisht character for truth and sincerity here stood him in great stead; and upon his earnest protestations and declaraions, he was soon restored to his regiment, which he commanded at the siege of Nantwich. The day after his arrival, Fairfax attacked and defeated the royalists, commanded by Byron; and took Colonel Monck prisoner. He was sent to the Tower, where he endured, above two years, all the rigours of poverty and confinement. The king, however, was so desirous of avenging his son, that he was prepared with sacrifices of the greatest value; but it was not till after the royalists were totally subdued, that he recovered his liberty. Monck, however distressed, had an able defender in Monck, to whom he pardoned his accusers; but it was by the 19th of November, 1660.
cited him to engage in the wars against the Irish, who were considered as rebels by both king and parliament; he was not unwilling to repair his broken fortunes by accepting a command which, he flattered himself, was reconcilable to the strictest principles of honour. Having once engaged with the general's enmity, he could not avoid, by the equality and justice of his administration, being also give contentment to that restless people, now reduced to subjection by a nation whom they hated. No less accept- able was his authority to the officers and soldiers; and foreseeing that the good will of the army under his command might some time be of great service to him, he had, with much care and success, cultivated their friendship.

The connections which he had formed with Cromwell, his benefactor, preserved him faithful to Richard, who had been enjoined by his father to follow in every thing the directions of General Monk. When the long parliament was restored, Monk, who was not prepared for opposition, adhered to the king and was committed to no command, from which it would not have been safe to at- tempt dislodging him. After the army had expelled the parliament, he protested against the violence, and resolved, as he pretended, to vindicate the constitution and the rights of the king, either in the king's favour or his own, were, from the beginning, suspected to be the motive of his actions.

A rivalry had long subsisted between him and Lambert; and every body saw the reason why he opposed the elevation of that ambitious general, by whose success his own authority, he knew, would soon be subverted. But little friendship had ever subsisted between him and the parliamentary leaders; and it seemed not improbable that he intended to employ his industry, and spend his blood, for the advancement of one enemy above another. How early he entertained designs for the king's restoration, we know not with certainty; it is likely, that as soon as Richard was deposited, he foresaw, that without such an expedient it would be impossible ever to bring the nation to a regular settlement. His elder and younger brothers were elevated to the royal cause; the Granvilles, his near relations, and all the rest of his kindred, were in the same interests; he himself was intoxicated with no fumes of enthusiasm, and had maintained no connections with any of the fanatical party. His early engagements had been with the Earl of Arundel; and by being chosen the body in the king's council, he was prevented suffering any disgust from the royal family. Since he had en- listed himself with the opposite party, he had been guilty of no violence or outrage, which might render him obnoxious. His return, therefore, to loyalty, was easy and open; and nothing stood to prevent his becoming, by his natural propensity to that measure, except the views of his own elevation, and the prospect of usurping the same grandeur and authority which had been assumed by Cromwell. But from such exorbitant, if not impossible projects, the natural tranquility and moderation of his temper, the calmness and solidity of his genius, not to mention his age, now upon the decline, seem to have set him at a distance. Cromwell himself, he always asserted; could not long have maintained his usurpation; and any other person, even equal to him in genius, it was obvious, would now find it more difficult to practise arts, of which every one, from experience, was sufficiently aware. It is more agreeable, therefore, to reason as well as candour, to suppose that Monk, as soon as he put himself in motion, had entertained views of effecting the king's restoration; nor ought any objections, derived from his profound silence even to Charles himself, be regarded as considerable. His temper was naturally reserved; his circumstances re- quired dissimulation; the king, he knew, was surrounded with spies and traitors; and upon the whole, it seems hard to say whether his mind was more devoted to his idea of his prudence, as a dispensation of his prosperity.

Sir John Granville, hoping that the general would engage in the king's service, sent into Scotland his younger brother, a clergyman, Dr. Monk, who carried him a letter and invitation from the king. When the doctor arrived, he found that his brother was then holding a council of officers, and was not to be seen for some hours. In the mean time, he was received and entertained by Price, the general's chief clerk and principal servant, who found him himself necessitated to fight, both against the Mar- quis of Ormond in Ireland, and against the king himself in Scotland. Upon the reduction of the latter kingdom, Monk was sent for and commissioned by the king to enforce the settlement, which subsisted to a degree never heard of, and was finally extended to the advantage of the king's. The doctor, having an entire confidence in the chaplain, talked very freely to him about the object of his journey, and engaged him, if there should be occasion, to second his applications. At last, the general arrives; the brothers embrace, and after some observations, the doctor opens his business. Monk interrupted him, to know whether he had ever before to any body mentioned the subject. 'To nobody,' replied his brother, 'but to Price, whom I know to be entirely in your confi- dence.' The general, altering his countenance, turned the discourse, and would enter into no further confidence with him, but sent him away with the first opportunity. He would not trust his own brother the moment he knew he had disclosed the secret; though to a man whom he himself could have trusted.

His conduct, in all other particulars, was full of the same reserve and prudence, and no less was required in effecting the difficult work which he had undertaken. All the officers in his army, of whom he entertained any sus- picion, he immediately cashiered; Cobbett, who had been sent by the committee of safety; under pretence of communi- cating their resolutions to him, he resolved upon the de- bushing his army, he committed to custody; he drew together the several scattered regiments; he sum- moned an assembly, somewhat resembling a convention of states; and having communicated to them his resolu- tion of marching into England, he received a seasonable, though no great supply of money.

Hearing that Lambert was advancing northward with his army, Monk sent commissioners and two other commissio- neers to London, with large professions of his inclination to peace, and with offers of terms for an accommodation. His chief aim was to gain time, and relax the preparations of his enemies. The committee of safety fell into the snare. A treaty was signed by Monk's commissioners; but he refused to ratify it, and complained that they had exceeded their powers. He desired, however, to enter into a new negotiation at Newcastle. The committee will- ingly accepted this fallacious offer.

Meanwhile these military sovereigns found themselves surrounded on all hands with in- extricable difficulties. The nation had fallen into total confusion; the business of the army was to bring the king's forces to London, with large professions of his inclination to peace, and with offers of terms for an accommodation. friends exhort him to more vigour, they could get no other answer, than that God had spitten in his face and would not hear him. Men now ceased to wonder, why Lambert had promoted him to the office of general, and had consented himself with the second command in the army.

26th of December.

Lenthal, the speaker, being invited by the officers, again assumed authority, and summoned together the parliament, which twice before had been expelled with so much reproach and ignominy. As soon as assembled, they repealed their act against the payment of excise and customs; they appointed commissioners for assigning quarters to the party; and, without taking any notice of Lambert, they sent orders to the forces under his command immediately to repair to those quarters which were appointed them.

A. D. 1660.

Jan. 1.

Lambert was now in a very disconsolate condition. Monk, he saw, had passed the Tweed at Coldstream, and was advancing upon him. His own soldiers deserted him in great multitudes, and joined the enemy. Lord Fairfax, too, he heard, had raised forces behind him, and had possessed himself of York, without declaring his purpose. The last orders of the parliament so entirely stripped him of his army, that there remained not with him above a hundred horse: all the rest went to their several stations and rendezvous; and he himself was, some time after, arrested and committed to the Tower. The other officers, who had formerly been cashiered by the parliament, and who had resumed their commands, they might suddenly, were again cashiered and confined to their houses. Sir Harry Vane and some members, who had concurred with the committee of safety, were ordered into a like confinement. And the parliament now seemed to be again possessed of its absolute authority than ever, and to be without any danger of opposition or control.

The republican party was at this time guided by two men: Vane, who were their opposite characters, and mortally hated each other. Hazelrig, who possessed greater authority in the parliament, was haughty, impu- risious, precipitate, vain-glorious; without civility, without prudence; qualified only by his noisy, pertinacious obstinacy, to acquire an ascendancy in public assemblies. Vane was noted, in all civil transactions, for temper, insinuation, address, and a profound judgment; in all religious speculations, for folly and extravagance. He was a Jacobin, a republican; and fancying that he was cert,ained to be favoured with inspiration, he deemed himself, to speak in the language of the times, to be a man above ordinances, and, by reason of his perfection, to be unlimited and un- restrained, which greatly discredited the inferior mortals. These whimsies, mingling with pride, had an application to his excellent understanding, that sometimes he thought himself the person deputed to reign on earth for a thou- sand years over the whole congregation of the faithful.

Monk, though informed of the restoration of the parlia- ment, from whom he received no orders, still advanced with his army, which was near 6000 men: the scattered forces in England were above five times more numerous. Fairfax, who had resolved to declare for the king, not being able to make the general open his intentions, retired to his own house in Yorkshire. In all counties through which Monk passed, the prime gentry flocked to him with addresses, exhorting him to engage himself, that he would be instrumental in restoring the nation to peace and tranquillity, and to the enjoyment of those liberties, which by law were their birth-right, but of which, during so many years, they had been fatally bereaved: and that, in order to this salutary purpose, he would prevail, either for the restoring of those members who had been sequestered before the king's death, or for the election of a new parliament, who might legislate, and by general consent, again govern the nation. Though Monk pretended not to favour these addresses, that ray of hope, which the knowledge of his character and situation afforded, mightly animated all men. The tyranny and the anarchy, which now equally oppressed the kingdom; the experience of past distrac-
The common council of London daily refused to submit to an assessment required of them; and declared that, till a free and lawful parliament imposed taxes, they never should deem it their duty to make any payment. This resolution, if yielded to, would immediately have put an end to the cord and harmony of the parliament; it required, therefore, upon this occasion, to make at once a full experiment of their own power, and of their general's obedience.

9th February. Monk received orders to march into the city; to seize twelve persons, the most obnoxious to the parliament; to remove the posts and chains from all the streets; and to take down and break the portals and candles, and to restore all the ordinances by which they had been suspended or revoked. Having fixed a close correspondence with the city, and established its militia in hands whose fidelity might be relied on, he returned with his army to Westminster, and renewed every one of those suspended regulations of the nation. While he still pretended to maintain republican principles, he was taking large steps towards the re-establishment of the ancient monarchy.

The seceded members, upon the general's invitation, went to the House, and finding the doors barred, no longer any obstruction, they entered, and immediately appeared to be the majority: most of the independents left the place. The restored members first declared, that the minister, who knew them to be however different in affections, expectations, and designs, united in the detestation of the long parliament.

A council of state was established, consisting of men of character and moderation; most of whom, either in open civil wars, had made a great figure among the presbyterians. The militia of the kingdom was put into such hands as would promote order and settlement. These, conjured with Monk's army, which lay united at London, were esteemed a sufficient check on the more numerous, though dispersed army, of whose inclinations there was still much reason to be diffident. Monk, however, was every day removing the more dangerous of the others, and bringing the troops to a state of discipline and obedience.

Overtol, governor of Hull, had declared his resolution to keep possession of that fortress till the coming of King Jesus: but when Alured produced the authority of parliament for his command at the place to Colonel Fairfax, he thought proper to comply.

Montague, who commanded the fleet in the Baltic, had entered into the conspiracy with Sir George Booth; and, having been on several occasions at variance with both, he marched towards the coast of England, with an intention of supporting that insurrection of the royalists. On his arrival, he received the news of Booth's defeat, and the total failure of the enterprise. The great difficulties, to which the parliament was then reduced, allowed them no leisure to examine strictly the reasons which he gave for quitting his station; and they allowed him to retire peaceably to his country-house. The council of state now conferred on him, in conjunction with Monk, the command of the fleet; and secured the naval as well as military force, in hands favourable to the public settlement.

Notwithstanding all these steps which were taken towards the re-establishment of monarchy, Monk still maintained the appearance of zeal for a commonwealth, and hitherto allowed no canal of correspondence between himself and the kirk to be opened. To call a free parliament, and to restore the royal family, were visibly, in their present dispositions, the hopes of the royalists. They were又是 selected for the

b After Monk's declaration for a free parliament on the alluvium of parliament (the populace exclaimed) was celebrated by these symbols of hatred and detestation.

The parliament, though in the agonies of despair, made still one effort for the recovery of their dominion. They sent a committee with offers to gain the general. He refused to hear them, and ordered the house to be dissolved. Though several persons, desparate from guilt and fanaticism, promised to invest him with the dignity of supreme magistrate, and to support his government, he would not be guilty to take ill persons. Having fixed a close correspondence with the city, and established its militia in hands whose fidelity might be relied on, he returned with his army to Westminster, and renewed every one of those suspended regulations of the nation. Above all, the general was averse to the mention of conditions ; and resolved that the crown which he intended lo restore, should be conferreil on the king entirely free and unencumbered. Without further scruple, therefore, or jealousy, the people gave their voice in elections for such as they knew to entertain sentiments favourable to monarchy ; and all paid court to a party

Manchester, Lord Fairfax, Lord Hoborts, Hollis, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Aimesley, Lewis, were determined to atone for post transgressions, by their present zeal for the royal interests ; and from former merits, successes, and sufferings, they had acquired wilb^heir party the highest

I'he affairs of Ireland were in a condition no less favourable to the king. As soon a.s Monk declared against the engaged the officers in that kingdom to concur with him in the same measures.

Lord Hroghil, president of Munster, and Sir Charles ( ^te, president of Connaught, went so far as to enter into a correspondence with the king, and to promise their assistance for his re.storatiun.
In conjunction with Sir Thtophilus Jones, and other officers, they turn which affairs took in F.ngland.

Hut all these promising views had almost been blasted by an untoward accident. U|K>n the admission of the secluded members, the republican party, particularly the late king’s judges, were seized with incjustest despair, and endeavour^ to infuse tlie same sentiments into tne army.
By themselves or their emissaries, they represented to tl^ soldiers, that all tliose brave actions, whicli had been performed during the war, and which were so mentonous in the eves of the parliament, would no doulrt be regarded as the deepest crimes by the royalists, and would expose the army to the severest* vengeance. Dial in vain aid that King’s death, the execution of so ni.'uiy of tlie nobility and gentry, the sequestration and imprisonment of the rest, were in their eyes enmes so de^i, and offences so personal, as must lie prosecuted with tlic most implacable resentment. Dial tlie loss of all arrears, and the* caslnermg

even if the most perfect security could be obtained, it were inglorious lo be reduced, by treachery and deceit, to subjection under a foe, who,
the open field, bad so often yielded to their superior valour.
After these suggestions had been infused into the arrav, Lambert suddenly made his escape from the Tower, and threw Monk and the council of state into great consternation.

gerous for Monk himself to have assembled any considerable body of his republican army for their suppression: so that nothing could be more happy than the sudden extinction of this rising flame.

When the parliament met, they chose Sir Henry Hammond, as speaker, man whose though he had for some time concurred with the late parliament, had long been esteemed affec tionate to the king's service. The great dangers incurred during former usurpat ions justified, and in many cases, the death of every one in awe; and none dared, for some days, to make any mention of the king. The members exercised their spirit chiefly in bitter invectives against the memory of Crom cell, and in various innovations for the better carrying on the business of their late sovereign. At last, the general, having sufficiently sounded their inclinat ions, gave directions to Annesley president of the council, to inform them, that one Sir John Granville, a servant of the king's, had been sent over by his majesty, and was now at the door with a letter to the Commons. The loud est acclamations were excited by this intelli gence. Granville was called in; the letter, accompanied with a declaration, readily read: without one moment's delay, and without a contradictory vote, a committee was appointed to prepare an answer: and, in order to spread the same satisfaction throughout the king dom, it was voted that the letter and declaration should immediately be published.

The people, freed from the state of suspense in which they had so long been held, now changed their anxious looks for the first time to one of social triumph and exultation, which no private prosperity, even the greatest, is ever able fully to inspire. Traditions remain of men, particularly of Oughtred, the mathematician, who d.ed of pleasure, when informed of this happy and unexpected event; for, he could not conduct alone, he had bestowed settlement on three king doms, which had long been torn with the most violent con vulsions; and having obstinately refused the most inviting conditions offered him by the king, as well as by every other in the kingdom, he freely accepted the miss er to the vacant throne. The king entered London on the 29th of May, which was also his birthday. The fond imaginations of men interpreted as a happy omen the concurrence of two such joyful periods.

At this era, it may be proper to stop a moment, and take a general survey of the age, so far as regards manners, finances, arms, commerce, arts, and sciences. The chief feature of this period is, that it affords an admirable example of that robust and vigorous ture; and it seems the duty of an historian to point out the proper inferences and conclusions.

No people could undergo a change more sudden and extraordinary than that which the English nation during this period. From tranquillity, concord, submission, sobriety, they passed in an instant to a state of fanaticism, fanaticism, rebellion, and almost frenzy. The violence of the English parties ex ceeded anything which we can now imagine: had they continued but a little longer, there was just reason to dread all the horrors of the ancient massacres and pro scriptions. The military usurpers, whose authority was founded on palpable injustice, and was supported by no national party, would have been impelled by rage and despair into such sanguinary measures; and if these furious expedients had been employed on one side, revenge would naturally have pushed the other party, after a return of power, to retaliate upon their enemies. No social inter course was maintained between the parties; no marriages or alliances contracted. The royals, though oppressed, harassed, persecuted, disdain'd all afinity with their masters. The more they were reduced to subjection, the greater superiority did they affect above those usurpers, who by violence and injustice had acquired an ascend ant over them.

The manners of the two factions were as opposite as those of the most distant nations. "Your friends, the cavaliers," said a parliamentarian to a royalist, "are very dissolute and dissipated." "True," said the royalist, "they have the infirmities of men: but your friends, the roundheads, have the vices of devils, tyranny, rebellion, and spiritual pride. 71 Riot and disorder, it is certain, notwithstanding the good example set them by Charles I. prevailed very much among his partisans. Being commonly men of birth and fortune, to whom excesses are less peculiar than to the vulgar, they were too apt to indulge themselves in all pleasures, particularly those of the table. Opposition to the rigid preciosity of their antagonists increased their inclination to good fellowship; and the character of their dissipation was so great, that it became an as a sure pledge of attachment to the church and monarchy. Even when ruined by confiscations and sequestrations, they endeavoured to maintain the appearance of a careless and social jollity. 72 As much as hope is superstitious and a poor delusion, so much is it an illusion to make a bow, or move their hat, or give any sign of reverence. Instead of that affected adulation, introduced into modern tongues, of speaking to individuals as if they were a multitude, they returned to the simplicity of ancient language, omitting the jargon, which, on any consideration, they could be brought to employ.

Dress too, a material circumstance, distinguished the members of this sect. Every superfluity and ornament was carefully retrenched; no plaits to their cost, no buttons to their sleeves; no lace, no ruffles, no embroidery. Even a button to the hat, though sometimes useful, yet not being always so, was universally rejected by them with horror and detestation.

The violent enthusiasm which prevailed among the parliamentary party, is surely the most curious spectacle presented by any history; and the most instructive, as well as entertaining, to a philosophical mind. All the recreations were, in a manner, suspended by the rigid severity of the presbyterians and independents. Horse-races and cock-matches were prohibited as the greatest enormities. 73 Even bear-baiting was esteemed heathenish and unchristian: the sport of it, not the humanity, gave offence. Colonel Houston, from his pious zeal, matched with his religion against the bear-baiters, and destroyed the game. But there were there kept for the diversions of the citizens. This adventure seems to have given birth to the fiction of Huldrum. Though the English nation be naturally careless and inconsiderate, it was not for the first time carried beyond all example in ancient or modern times. The religious hypocrisy, it may be remarked, is of a peculiar nature; and being generally unknown to the person himself, though more dangerous, it implies less falsehood than any other species of insincerity. The Old Testament, preferably to the New, was the favourite of all the sectaries. The eastern poetical style of that composition made it more easily susceptible of a turn which was agreeable to them. We have had occasion, in the course of this work, to speak of many of the sects which prevailed in England: to enumerate them all would be impossible. The quakers, however, are so considerable, at least so singular, as to merit some attention; and as they renounced by principle the use of arms, they never made such a figure in public transactions as to enter into any part of our narrative.

The religion of the quakers, like most others, began with the lowest vulgar, and, in its progress, came at last to comprehend people of better quality and fashion. George Fox, born at Drayton in Lancashire, in 1624, was the founder of this sect. He was the son of a weaver, and employed himself as a glove-maker. For tending a stronger impulse towards spiritual contemplations than towards that mechanical profession, he left his master, and went about the country clothed in a leather doublet, a dress which he long affected, as well for its singularity as its cheapness. That he might wear himself from sublimity of objects, he broke off all connections with his friends and family, and never dwelt a moment in one place; lest habit should beget new connections, and depress the sublimity of his aerial meditations. He frequently wandered into the woods, and passed whole days in hollow trees, without company, or any other amusement than his Bible. Having reached that pitch of perfection as to need no rest or sleep, and, in its progress, became less and less concerned for temporary objects, he became so poor and low that he was not merely of the lowest vulgar, but of the poorest sort of spiritual progress, and began to pay less regard even to that divine composition itself. His own breast, he imagined, was full of the same inspiration which had guided the proficients and apostles themselves; and by this inward light must every spiritual obscurity be cleared, by this living spirit must the dead letter be animated.

When he had been sufficiently consecrated in his own imagination, he felt that the forms of self-applause so soon subsided, if he continually supplied by the admiration of others; and he began to seek proselytes. Proselytes were easily gained at a time when all men's affections were turned towards religion, and when the most extravagant modes of it were sure to be most popular. All the forms of ceremony, invented by pride and ostentation, Fox and his disciples, from a superstitious and ostentation, carelessly evoked, and made to mock themselves and the admiration of others; and he began to seek proselytes. Proselytes were easily gained at a time when all men's affections were army was estimated at 60,000 pounds a-month. 5 The establishment of the army in 1652 was, in Scotland, 15,000 foot, 2,580 horse, 560 dragoons; in England, 4,700 foot, 2,520 horse, garrisons 6,514. To all, 31,519, besides officers. 6 The army in Scotland was afterwards considerably reduced. This sum was probably in short of 20,000 men; so that, upon the whole, the commonwealth maintained to 1652 a standing army of more than 50,000 men. Its pay amounted to a yearly sum of 1,047,715 pounds. 7 Afterwards the protector reduced the establishment to 20,000 by an act of government andumble petticoat and advice. His frequent enterprises obliged him from time to time to augment them. Richard had set on foot to England an army of 15,256 men, in 1650, in Ireland about 10,000 men. 8 The foot soldiers had commonly a shilling a-day. The horse had two shillings and a-half; so that many gentlemen and younger brothers of good family enlisted in the protector's cavalry. 9 No wonder that such men were averse from the re-establishment of civil government, by which, they well knew, they must be deprived of so gainful a profession.

At the battle of the battle of Worcester, the parliament had on foot about 80,000 men, partly militia, partly regular forces. The vigour of the commonwealth, and the great capacity of those members who had assumed the government, never at any time appeared so conspicuous. 10 The whole revenue of the public, during the protectorate, was at 186,717 pounds; his annual expenses at 2,301,540 pounds. An additional revenue was demanded from parliament. 11 The commerce and industry of England increased extremely during the peaceable period of Charles's reign: the trade to the East Indies and to Guinea became considerable. The Dutch possessed almost the trade with Spain. Twenty thousand cloths were annually sent to Turkey. 12 Commerce met with interruption, no doubt, from the civil wars and convulsions which afterwards prevailed; though it soon recovered after the establishment of the commonwealth. The war with the Dutch, by distressing the commerce of so formidable a rival, served to encourage trade in England: the Spanish war was to an equal degree pernicious. All the effects of the English merchants, to an immense value, were confiscated in Spain. The prevalence of democratical principles engaged the country gentlemen to bind their sons apprentices to merchants; and commerce has ever since been more honourable in English than in any other European kingdom. The exclusive companies, which formerly confined trade, were never expressly abolished by any ordinance of parliament during the commonwealth; but as men paid no regard to the prerogative whence the charters of these companies were derived, the monopoly was generally invaded, and commerce increased by the increase of liberty. Interest in 1650 was reduced to six per cent. The customs in England, before the civil wars, are said to have amounted to 500,000 pounds a year; a sum ten times greater than during the best period in Queen Elizabeth's reign: but there is probably some exaggeration in this matter.

The post-house in 1653 was farmed at 10,000 pounds a-year, which was deemed a considerable sum for the three kingdoms. Letters paid only about half their present postage.

From 1619 to 1628, there had been coined 6,000,042 pounds. From 1628 to 1657, the coinage amounted to 7,733,521 pounds. 13 Dr. Davenant has told us from the registers of the mint, that between 1538 and 1659, there had been coined 19,832,476 pounds in gold and silver. 14 The first mention of tea, coffee, and chocolate, in about 1665. Asparagus, artichokes, cauliflower, and a variety of salaldb, were about the same time introduced into England.

The colony of New England increased by means of the puritans, who fled thither, in order to free themselves from the constraint which Lord and the church put on them; and, before the commencement of the civil wars, it is supposed to have contained 25,000 souls. For a like reason the catholicks, afterwards, who found themselves exposed to many hardships, and dreaded still worse, went over to America in great numbers, and settled the colony of Maryland.

Before the civil wars, learning and the fine arts were favoured at court, and a good taste began to prevail in the long lost pleasant art of music.sometimes having the pencil himself, and was a good judge of the art. The pieces of foreign masters were bought up at a vast price; and the value of pictures doubled in Europe by the emulation between Charles and Philip IV. of Spain, who were touched with the same elegant passion. Vandyke was cartridge and enriched at court. Inigo Jones was master of the king's buildings; though afterwards persecuted by the parliament, on account of the part which he had in rebuilding St. Paul's, and for obeying some orders of council, by which he was directed to pull down houses, in order to make room for that edifice. Laws, who had not been surpassed by any musician before him, was much sought by the king, who enriched his court with talent. Charles was a good judge of writing, and was thought by some more anxious with regard to purity of style than became a monarch. Notwithstanding his narrow views, so far from his freedom from that magnificence, that he possessed four-and-twenty palaces, all of them elegantly and completely furnished; insomuch that, when he removed from one to another, he was not obliged to transport anything along with him.

In his youth himself a barbarian, was not insensible to literary merit. Usher, notwithstanding his being a bishop, received a pension from him. Marvel and Milton were in his service. Waller, who was his relation, was supported by him. That poet protector himself was not so wholly illustrate as was commonly imagined. He gave a hundred pounds a-year to the divinity professor at Oxford; and an historian mentions this bounty as an instance of his love of literature. He intended to have erected a college at Durham for the benefit of the northern counties.

Civil wars, especially when founded on principles of liberty, are not commonly favourable to the arts of elegance and composition; yet, by presenting nobler and more interesting objects, they amply compensate the tranquillity of which they becawe the Muse. The speeches of the parliamentary orators during this period of our nation much surpass the beauty of what any former age had produced in England; and the force and compass of our tongue were then first put to trial. It must, however, be confessed, that the wretched fanaticism which so much infected the parliamentary party, was no less destructive of taste and science, than of all law and order. Gaity and wit were proscribed; human learning despised; freedom of inquiry detested; cant and hypocrisy alone encouraged. It was an article positively insisted on in the preliminaries to the treaty of Utrecht, that all play-houses should for ever be abolished. Sir John Davenant, says Whitlocke, speaking of the year 1695, published an opera, notwithstanding the nice of the times. All the king's furniture was put to sale; his pictures, disposed of at very low prices, enriched all the collections in Europe: the cartoons, when complete, were only appraised at 300 pounds, though the whole collection of the king's curiosities was sold at above 50,000/. Even the royal palaces were pulled in pieces, and the materials of them sold. The very library and medals at St. James's were intended by the generals to be brought to the victors to pay the arrears of some regiments of cavalry quartered near London: but Selden, on hearing of the loss, engaged his friend Whitlocke, then lord-keeper for the commonswealth, to apply for the office of librarian. This expedient saved that valuable collection.

It is, however, remarkable, that the greatest genius by far that shone out in England during this period, was deeply engaged with these fanatics, and even prostituted his pen in theological controversy, in factious disputes, and all that is base and servile. This was John Milton, whose poems are admirable, though liable to some objections; his prose writings disagreeable, though not altogether defective in genius. Nor are all his poems equal: his Paradise Lost, his Comus, and a few others shine out in his compositions: even in the Paradise Lost, his capital performance, there are very long passages, amounting to near a third of the work, almost wholly destitute of harmony and elegance, nay, of all value; and the great insipidity of the natural inequality in Milton's genius was much increased by the inequalities in his subject; of which some parts are of themselves the most lofty that can enter into human conception; others would have required the most laboured elegance of composition to support them. It is certain, that this author, when in a happy mood, and employed on a noble subject, is the most wonderful sublime of any poet in any language; Homer and Lucrectus and Tasso no more will stand comparison with him. More concise than Tasso, more nervous than Lucrectus; had he lived in a later age, and learned to polish some rudeness in his verses, had he enjoyed better fortune, and possessed himself of all his arguments, he would, without doubt, have attained the pinnacle of perfection, and borne away the palm of epic poetry.

It is well known, that Milton never enjoyed in his lifetime the esteem of the court, and that his Paradise Lost was long neglected: prejudices against an apostate for the regicides, and against a work not wholly purified from the cant of former times, kept the ignorant world from perceiving the prodigious merit of that performance. Lord Somers, by encouraging a good edition of it, about twenty years after the author's death, first brought it into request; and Tonson, in his dedication of a smaller edition, speaks of it as a work just beginning to be known. Even during the prevalence of Milton's party, he seems never to have been much regarded; and Whitlocke's talks of one Milton, as he calls him, a blind man, who was employed in translating a treaty with Sweden into Latin. These forms of expression are amusing to posterity, who consider how obsequie Whitlocke himself, though lord-keeper and ambassador, and indeed a man of great abilities and merit, has become in comparison of Milton.

It is not strange that Milton received no encouragement after the restoration: it is more to be admired that he escaped with his life. Many of the cavaliers blamed extremely that lenity towards him, which was so honourable in a prince, and to what any former age had produced in England; and the force and compass of our tongue were then first put to trial. It must, however, be confessed, that the wretched fanaticism which so much infected the parliamentary party, was no less destructive of taste and science, than of all law and order. Gaity and wit were proscribed; human learning despised; freedom of inquiry detested; cant and hypocrisy alone encouraged. It was an article positively insisted on in the preliminaries to the treaty of Utrecht, that all play-houses should for ever be abolished. denced to the court, and lived in the best company. He possessed talents for eloquence as well as poetry; and till his death, which happened in a good old age, he was the delight of the House of Commons. The errors of his life proceeded more from want of courage, than of honour or intention. He died in 1657, aged 79.

Cowley is an author extremely corrupted by the bad taste of his age; but had he lived even in the purest times of Greece or Rome, he must always have been a very indifferent poet. He had no ear for harmony; and his verse is only known to be such by the rhyme which terminates them. In his rugged untuneful numbers are conveyed sentiments the most strained and distorted; long-spun allegories, distant allusions, and forced conceits. Great ingenuity, however, and vigour of thought, sometimes break out amidst these unnatural conceptions; a few anecdotes surprise us by their ease and gaiety: his prose writings please, by the honesty and goodness which they express, and even by their spleen and melancholy.

This author was much more praised and admired during his life-time, and celebrated after his death, than the great Milton. He died in 1667, aged 49.

Sir John, who sat in Cooper’s Hill, (for none of his other poems merit attention,) has a looseness and vigour, which had not before him been attained by any English poet who wrote in rhyme. The mechanical difficulties of that style are well overcome, and he has given to the age, and exposed a faithful picture of nature, in a durable work, and is transmitted to the latest posterity. But a system, whether physical or metaphysical, commonly owes its success to a very want of sublimity, whose tragic scenes are sometimes so wonderfully forcible and expressive, is a very indifferent poet when he attempts to rhyme. Precision and neatness are chiefly wanting in Denham. He died in 1689, aged 73.

No Englishman in that age was more celebrated both abroad and at home, than Hobbes: in our time he is much neglected: a lively instance, how precarious all reputations founded on reasoning and philosophy! A pleasant writer, who paints the manners of the age, and exposes a faithful picture of nature, in a durable work, and is transmitted to the latest posterity. But a system, whether physical or metaphysical, commonly owes its success to a very want of sublimity, whose tragic scenes are sometimes so wonderfully forcible and expressive, is a very indifferent poet when he attempts to rhyme. Precision and neatness are chiefly wanting in Denham. He died in 1689, aged 73.

Harrington’s Oceana was well adapted to that age, when the plans of imaginary republics were the daily subjects of debate and conversation; and even in our time, it is justly admired as a work of genius and invention. The idea, however, of a perfect and immortal commonwealth will always be found as chimerical as that of a perfect and immortal man. The style of this author wants ease and fluency; but the good matter which his work contains, makes compensation. He died in 1677, aged 66.

Harvey is entitled to the glory of having made, by reasoning alone, without any mixture of accident, a capital discovery in one of the most important branches of science. He had also the happiness of establishing at once his theory of blood and its circulation, and of turning physicians in Europe. He died in 1667, aged 66.

He possessed a vigorous constitution, a fine shape, a manly figure, a graceful air; and though his features were harsh, yet was his countenance in the main lively and engaging. He was in that period of life, when men are least amiable, without preventing that authority and regard which attend the years of experience and maturity. Tenderness was excited by the memory of his recent adversities. His present prosperity was the object rather of admiration than of envy. And as the sudden and surprising revolution, which restored him to his regal rights, had also restored the nation to peace, law, order, and liberty; no prince ever obtained a crown in more favourable circumstances, or was more blest with the cordial affection and attachment of his subjects.

This popularity the king, by his whole demeanour and behaviour, was well qualified to support and to increase. To a lively wit and quick comprehension, he united a just understanding and a general observation both of men and things. The easiest manners, the most unaffected politeness, the most engaging gravity, accompanied his conversation and address. He was accustomed, during his whole reign, among his courtiers rather like a companion than a monarch, he retained, even while on the throne, that open affability which was capable of reconciling the most determined republicans to his royal dignity. Totally devoid of resentment, yet so powerful in influence, as carelessness of his temper, he insured pardon to the most guilty of his enemies, and left hopes of favour to his most violent opponents. From the whole tone of his actions and discourse, he seemed devoted to the memory of past aninomities, and of uniting every party in an affection for their prince and their native country.
Upon the death of the king, his council de facto admitted the most fit and able men of the nation, without regard to former distinctions: the presbters, equally with the rest of the print, had a share in the honors. Among them was also created Lord Earl of Anglesey; Ashley Cooper, Lord Ashley; Denzi Hollis, Lord Hollis. The Earl of Manchester was appointed lord chamberlain, and Lord Say, privy-seal. Calamy and Baxter, presbyterian clergymen, were even more gladly chosen to his king.

Admiral Montague, created Earl of Sandwich, was entitled, from his recent services, to great favour; and he obtained it. Monk, created Duke of Albemarle, had performed such signal services, that according to a vulgar and malignant observation, he ought rather to have expected hatred and ingratitude: yet was he ever treated by the king with great marks of distinction. Charles's disposition, free from jealousy; and the prudent behaviour of the general, who never overrated his merits; prevented all those disgusts which naturally arise in so delicate a situation. The capacity too of Albemarle was not extensive, and his parts were more solid than shining. Though he had distinguished himself in inferior stations, he was imagined, upon familiar acquaintance, not to be wholly equal to those great achievements, which fortune, united to prudence, had enabled him to perform; and he appeared unable to do the scene of life to which he had not yet been accustomed. Morrice, his friend, was created secretary of state, and was supported more by his patron's credit than by his own abilities or experience.

Though the king himself sophisticated of his principal ministers and favorites, was the circumstance which chiefly gave contentment to the nation, and prognosticated future happiness and tranquillity. Sir Edward Hyde, created Earl of Clarendon, was chancellor of the exchequer; Monson, created Duke, of Ormond, was steward of the household; the Earl of Southampton, high treasurer; Sir Edward Nicholas, secretary of state. These men, united together in friendship, and combining in the same faction, it was expected, might support public honour, and repay each other's credit, and pursued the interests of the public.

Agreeable to the present prosperity of public affairs, was the universal joy and festivity diffused throughout the nation. The solemnity and austerity of the funerals fell into discredite, together with their principles. The royalists, who had ever affected a contrary disposition, found in their recent success new motives for mirth and gaiety; and it now belonged to them, not to follow these manners. From past experience it had sufficiently appeared, that gravity was very distant from wisdom, formality from virtue, and hypocrisy from religion. The king himself, bore a strong propensity to pleasure, société, and any painful exertions evoking exultation in the mind, or causing any serious and malignant humours, which had hitherto engendered such confusion. And though the just bounds were undoubtedly passed, when men returned from their former extreme; yet was the public happy in exchanging vices, permissions to society, for disorders, hurtful chiefly to the individuals themselves who were guilty of them.

It required some time before the several parts of the state, disturbed by war and faction, could recover their former arrangement: but the parliament immediately fell into good correspondence with the king, and they treated him with the same dutiful regard which had usually been paid to his predecessors. Being summoned without the king's consent, they received an address, and a request of the crown, to the king's immediate discharge for the public service, to which he was willing to assent. The king allowed the request, for the public service, and the crown; the other part of the address was rejected.

The king, before his restoration, being unprepared, afraid of reducing any of his enemies to despair, and at the same time unwilling that such enormous crimes as had been committed, should receive a total impunity, had expressed himself very cautiously in his declaration of Bredin, and had promised an indemnity to all criminals but such as should be excepted by parliament. He now issued a proclamation, declaring that such of the late king's judges as did not yield themselves prisoners within fourteen days should receive no pardon. Nineteen wardens were immediately surrendered, besides others escaped beyond sea.

The Commons seemed to have been more inclined to lenity than the Lords. The upper House, inflamed by the ill usage which they had received, debated for the crown the late king's judges, to except every one who had sitten in any high court of justice. Nay, the Earl of Bristol moved, that no pardon might be granted to those who had in anywise contributed to the king's death. So wide an exception, that every one had been partaker in the late king's death, or who parted in the execution of the late king, might be comprehended, gave a general alarm; and men began to apprehend, that this motion was the effect of some court artifice or intrigue. But the king soon dissipated these fears. He came to the House of Peers; and, in the most earnest terms, passed the act of general indemnity. He urged both the necessity of the thing, and the obligation of his former promise: a promise, he said, which he would ever regard as sacred; so to it he probably owed the satisfaction, which at present he enjoyed, of meeting his people in parliament. This measure of the king's was received with great applause and satisfaction.

After repeated solicitations, the act of indemnity passed both [H. and L.], Lords. The king, who had an immediate hand in the late king's death, were there excepted; even Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and others now dead, were attainted, and their estates forfeited. Those acts of indemnity, in which the regicides, were also excepted. St. John and seventeen persons more were deprived of all benefit from this act, if they ever accepted any public employment. All who had sitten in any illegal high courts of justice were punished.

The next business was the settlement of the revenue of the king's. In this work, the parliament laboured with great attention, and not only proceeded to recover the revenue for that year, but well as to the support of the crown. The treasuries of lands and revenues had long been regarded as a grievous burden by the nobility and gentry; several attempts had been made during the reign of James to purchase this prerogative, together with that of purveyance; and 200,000 pounds a year had been offered that prince in lieu of them; wardships and purveyance, however, had been utterly abolished by the republican parliament: and even in the present parliament, before the king arrived in England, a bill had been introduced, offering him a compensation for the emoluments of these prerogatives. A hundred thousand pounds a year was the sum agreed to; and half of the revenue was settled in perpetuity upon the king, the other half to be levied.

Though that impost yielded more profit, the bargain might be esteemed hard; and it was chiefly the necessity of the king's situation which induced him to consent to it. No request of the parliament, during the present joy, could be refused them.

Tonnage and poundage, and the other half of the excise were granted to the king during life. The parliament even proceeded so far as to vote that the settled revenue for the crown should be 1,200,000 pounds a year; a sum greater than any English monarch had ever before enjoyed. But as all the princes of Europe were perpetually augmenting their military force, and consequently their expense, the necessity of revenue became so pressing in both of honour and security, that a tax could not be levied. Though that impost yielded more profit, the bargain might be esteemed hard; and it was chiefly the necessity of the king's situation which induced him to consent to it. No request of the parliament, during the present joy, could be refused them.
thought necessary, might, even after the restoration, be extorted by the Commons from their necessitous prince. This parliament showed no intention of employing at present that enmity to any such purposes; but they seemed still determined that the king should not be sufferer to the revenues of the crown fixed and independent. Though they voted in general, that 1,200,000 pounds a year should be settled on the king, they scarcely assigned any funds whatever for that sum, and they left the care of fulfilling their engagements to the future consideration of parliament.

In all the temporary supplies which they voted, they distinctly avowed that they would not yield grace to any engagements, any grant made them by the king, or by his agents, or by his officers of any kind, amounting to 20,000 pounds, or any amount less, without the previous concurrence of the parliament. And the Commons showed great jealousy in granting the sums for that end. An assessment of 70,000 pounds a month was imposed; but it was at first voted to continue only three months: and all the other sums, which they levied for that purpose, by a poll-bill and new assessments, were still granted by parcel; as if they were not, as yet, well assured of the fidelity of the hand to which the money was intrusted. Having proceeded so far in the settlement of the nation, the parliament adjourned itself for some time.

Trials and executions, which chiefly interested the public, was the trial and condemnation of the recusants. The general indignation, attending the enormous crime of which they had been accused, made their sufferings the subject of joy to the people; but in the peculiar circumstances of that action, in the prejudices of the times, as well as in the behaviour of the criminals, a mixed sentiment universally prevailed, which was easy to compassion and indulgence. Can any one, without concern for human blindness and ignorance, consider the deaneen of General Harrison, who was first brought to his trial, the same cautious fragility. To disdain the army, so formidable in itself, and so much accustomed to rebellion and changes of government, was necessary for the security both of king and parliament; yet the Commons showed great jealousy in granting the sums for that end. The Princess Henrietta, daughter of Charles I., had been married to the Duke of Gloucester, a young prince of promising hopes, threw a great cloud upon them. The king, by no incident in his life, was ever so deeply affected. Gloucester was observed to possess united the good qualities of both his brothers; the clear judgment and penetration of the king; the industry and attention to the welfare of his people; and the benevolence of York. He was also believed to be affectionate to the religion and constitution of his country. He was but twenty years of age, when the small-pox put an end to his life.

The Prince of Orange, having come to England, in order to partake of the joy attending the restoration of his family, with whom he lived in great friendship, soon after Beckwith and the others communicated the matter to the king; and obtained his consent to the marriage of the Princess Henrietta with the Duke of Orleans, brother to the French king.

After a recess of near two months the parliament met, and proceeded in the great work of the national settlement. They established the post-office, wine-licences, and some articles of the revenue. They granted more assessment, and some arrears, for paying and disbursing the army. Business, being carried on with great unanimity, was soon despatched: and after they had sat two months, the king, in a speech full of the most gracious expressions, thought proper to dissolve them.

This House of Commons had been chosen during the reign of the old parliamentary party; and though many of the royalists had been incorporated among them, with divine illuminations. That these frequent illusions of the divine Spirit he could not suspect to be interested illusions; since he was conscious, that for no temporal advantage, would he offer injury to the poorest man or woman that trod upon the earth. That all the allurements of ambition, all the terrors of imprisonment, had not been able, during the usurpation of Cromwell, to shake his steady resolution, or bend him to a compliance with that deceitful tyrant. And that, when invited by him to sit on the right hand of the throne, when offered riches and splendour and dominion, he had disdainfully rejected all temptations; and, neglecting the tears of his friends and family, had still, through every danger, held fast his principles and his integrity.

Scot, who was more a republican than a fanatic, had said in the House of Commons, a little before the restoration, that he desired no other epitaph to be inscribed on his tomb-stone than this; Here lies Thomas Scot, who adjudged the king to death. He supported the same point upon his trial.

Carew, a millenarian, submitted to his trial, saying to our Lord Jesus Christ his right to the government of these kingdoms. Some scribbled to say, according to form, that they would be tried by God and their country; because God had set them to judge others. Others said, that they would be tried by the word of God.
have been made, and been hearkened to; but it is nowise probable that all the interest of the court would ever, with this House of Commons, have been able to make it effectual. They showed this prudence, no less than his integrity, in entirely rejecting it.

The chancellor, from the same principles of conduct, hastened to discharge the army. When the king reviewed these veteran troops, he was struck with their beauty, order, discipline, and martial appearance; and being sensible, that regular forces are most necessary implements of royalty, he expressed a desire of finding expedients still to retain them. His wise ministers, before him, had a dangerous spirit by which these troops were actuated, their enthusiastic genius, their habits of rebellion and mutiny; and he convicted the king, that till they were disbanded, he never could esteem himself secure established on his throne. No more troops were retained than a few guards and garrisons, about 1000 horse, and 4000 foot. This was the first appearance, under the monarchy, of a regular standing army in this island. Lord Mordaunt said, that the king, being possessed of that force, might now look upon himself as the most considerable gentleman in England.8 The fortifications of Gloucester, Taunton, and other towns, which had made resistance to the king during the civil war, were now disbanded.

Clarendon not only behaved with wisdom and justice in the office of chancellor; all the counsels, which he gave the king, tended equally to promote the interest of prince and people. Charles, accustomed in his exile to pay entire deference to the judgment of his faithful ministers, continued still to submit to his direction; and for some time no minister was ever possessed of more absolute authority. He moderated the former zeal of the royalists, and tempered their appetite for revenge. With the opposite party he endeavoured to preserve inviolate all the king's engagements: he kept an exact register of the promises which had been made for any service, and he employed all his power to fulfill them. The grand minister was now nearly allied to the royal family. His daughter, Ann Hyde, a woman of spirit and fine accomplishments, had hearkened, while abroad, to the addresses of the Duke of York, and, under promise of marriage, had secretly admitted him to her bed. Her pregnancy appeared soon after the restoration; and though many endeavoured to dissuade the king from consenting to so unequal an alliance, Charles, in pity to his friend and minister, who had been ignorant of these engagements, permitted his brother to marry her.5 Clarendon expressed great uneasiness at the honour which he had obtained; and said, that by being elevated so much above his rank, he thencheuse d a more golden downfall.6

Most circumstances of Clarendon's administration have met with applause: his maxim alone in the conduct of ecclesiastical politics have by many been deemed the effect of prejudice narrow and bigoted. Had the zealosity of royal power prevailed so far with the convention parliament, as to make them restore the king with strict limitations, there is no question but the establishment of presbyterian discipline had been one of the conditions most rigidly insisted on. Not only that form of ecclesiastical government is more favourable to liberty than to royal power: it was likewise, on its own account, agreeable to the majority of the House of Commons, and suited their religious principles. But as the impatience of the people, the danger of delay, the general disgust towards faction, and the authority of Monk, had prevailed over that jealous project of limitations, the full settlement of the hierarchy, together with the monarchy, was a necessary and infallible consequence. All the royalists were zealous for that mode of religion; the merits of the episcopal clergy towards the king, as well as their sufferings on that account, had been great; the laws which established this church, and the liturgy, are as yet unprovided for by legal authority; and any attempt of the parliament, by new acts, to give the superiority to presbyterianism, had been sufficient to involve the nation again in blood and tears. Moved by these views, the Commons had wisely postponed the examination of all religious controversy, and had left the settlement of the church to the king and to the ancient laws.7

The king had not used great moderation in the execution of the laws. Nine bishops still remained alive; and these were immediately restored to their sees: all the ejected clergy recovered their livings: the liturgy, a form of worship decent and not without beauty, was again admitted into the churches: but, at the same time, a declaration was issued, in order to give contentment to the presbyterians, and preserve an air of moderation and neutrality. By this declaration, the king promised that he would provide sufficient bishops for the larger dioceses; that the prelates should, all of them, be regular and constant preachers; that they should not confer ordination, or exercise any jurisdiction, without the advice and assistance of preslervists, chosen by the diocese; that such alterations should be made in the liturgy as would render it totally unexceptionable; that, in the mean time, the use of that mode of worship should not be imposed on such as were unwilling to receive it; and that the surplice, the cross in baptism, and bowing at the name of Jesus, should not be rigidly insisted on. This declaration was issued by the king as head of the church; and he plainly assumed, in many parts of it, a legislative authority in ecclesiastical matters. But the English governed themselves, and the church was neither extended nor diminished to the slightest degree. The measures of the ministry were not so much directed to conciliate the Presbyterians, as to put them in a situation where they might be indispensable. The whole question was wisely left to the disposal of the House of Commons, who could not fail of being made to see, after a while, that the king was resolved to gratify them at an easy rate. The House of Commons was not yet constituted a co-equal branch of the legislature. It was not yet divided into its two parts, with the intent of keeping one branch for restricting the powers of the other, which were intended at first to have been disbanded with the rest of the army.8 enterprise. But as a pretence was wanted, besides their old demerits, for justifying the intended rigours against all of them, this reason, however slight, was greedily laid hold of.

Affairs in Scotland hastened with still quicker steps than those in England towards a settlement and a compliance with the king. It was de- diletted in the English council, whether that nation should be restored to its liberty, or whether the forts erected by Cromwell should be abandoned. The turbulent spirit by which the Scots, in all ages, had been so much governed? Lauderdale, who, from the battle of Worcester to the restoration, had been detained prisoner in England, had convinced the ministers with the kingdom, and was strenuously opposed that violent measure. He represented, that it was the loyalty of the Scottish nation, which had engaged them in opposition to the English rebellion; and to take advantage of the calamities into which, on that account, they had fallen, would be regarded as the highest injustice and ingratitude: that the spirit of that people was now fully subdued by the servitude under which the usurpers had so long held them, and would be as little yielded to any reasonable compliance with their legal sovereign, if by this means they recovered their liberty and independence: that the attachment of the Scots to- wards their king, whom they regarded as their native protector, far exceeded that to the English; and would afford him a sure resource, in case of any rebellion among the latter: that republican principles had long been, and still were, very prevalent with his subjects, and all obstacles to their conduct were thus nipped with new tumults and resistance; that the time would probably come, when the king, instead of desiring to see English garrisons in Scotland, would be better pleased to have Scottish garrisons in England, who, supported by English pay, would be found to curb the seditious genius of that opulent nation: and that a people, such as the Scots, governed by a few nobility, would more easily be reduced to submission under monarchy, than one like the English, who breathed nothing but the spirit of democratic equality.

A.D. 1661. These views induced the king to disband all the forces in Scotland, and to raise all the forts which had been erected. General Middleton, created earl of that name, was sent commissioner to the parliament, which was summoned. A very compliant spirit was there discovered in all orders of men. The commissioner had even sufficient influence to obtain an act, declaring all the secessions since the year 1653, on pretext of the violence which, during that time, had been employed against the king and his father, in order to procure their absense to these statues. This was a: mere irregularity of his, without any show to the contrary with many dangerous limitations, overthrew some useful barriers which had been erected to the constitution. But the tide was now running strongly towards monarchy; and the Scottish nation plainly discovered, that their past resistance had proceeded more from the turbulence of their aristocracy, and the bigotry of their ecclesiastics, than from any fixed passion towards civil liberty. The lords of articles were restored, with some other branches of prerogative; and royal authority, fortified with more plausible claims and pretences, was, in its full extent, re-established in that kingdom.

The prelacy, likewise, by the abrogation of every statute enacted in favour of prelatures, was thereby tacitly restored; and the king deliberated what use he should make of this concession. Lauderdale, who at bottom was a passionate zealot against episcopacy, endeavoured to persua- de him, that the Scots, if gratified in this favourite point of ecclesiastical government, would, in every other demand, be entirely compliant with the king. Charles, though he had no such attachment to prelacy as had influenced his father and grandfather, had suffered such indignities from the Scots, that he was resolved, if possible, to set them in a hearty measure. He said to Lauderdale, that prebys- terianism, he thought, was not a religion for a gentile man; and he could not consent to its further continuance in Scotland. At the same time, however, he allowed him that the nation in general was so disgusted with the violence and tyranny of the ecclesiastics, that any alteration of church government would be universally grateful. And Clarendon, as well as Ormond, deeming that the presby- terian sect, if legally established in Scotland, would ac- quire authoritv, and in England too, would second the application of these measures. The resolution was there- fore taken to restore prelacy; a measure afterwards attended with many and great inconveniences: but whether in this resolution Charles chose not the lesser evil, it is very difficult to determine: he who had been com- missioned by the presbyterians in Scotland to manage their interest with the king, was persuaded to abandanc that party; and, as a reward for his compliance, was created Duke of Lauderdale. The consequence of this affair was chiefly intimated to him; and as he was esteemed a traitor and a renegade by his old friends, he became on that account, as well as from the violence of his con- duct, extremely obnoxious to them.

Charles had not promised to Scotland any such indemnity as he had insured to England by the declaration of Breda; and it was deemed more political for him to hold over men's heads, for some time, the terror of punishment, till they should have made the requisite compliance with the new government. Though neither the king's temper nor plan of administration led him to severity, some ex- ample, after such a bloody and trumpant rebellion, seemed necessary: Marquis of Argyll, and the Wardour, picked as the victims. Two acts of indemnity, one passed by the late king, in 1641, another by the present in 1651, formed, it was thought, invincible obstacles to the protection of Argyll; and there then fell a querry into that part of his conduct which might justly be regarded as the most exceptionable. Nothing remained but to try him for his compliance with the usurpation; a crime common to him with the whole nation, and such a one as the most loyal and affectionate subject might fre- quently by violence be obliged to commit. To make this compliance appear the more voluntary and hearty, there were produced in court letters which he had written to Alle- marte, while that general commanded in Scotland, and which contained expressions of the most inordinate attachment to the established government. But besides the general indignation excited by Allemarie's discovery of this private correspondence, men thought, that even the highest demonstrations of affection might, during jealous times, be exacted as a necessary mark of compliance from a person of such distinction as Argyll, and could not, by any equitable construction, imply the crime of treason. The parliament, moreover, on the 1st of January, 1661, passed, declaring the covenant unlawful, and its obligation void and null.

In England, the civil distinctions seemed to be abol- ished by the lenity and equality of the constitution. Cavalier writers, whose names were then heard of no more: all men seemed to concur in submitting to the king's lawful prerogatives, and in cherishing the just privileges of the people and of parliament. Theological controversy alone still subsisted, and kept alive some sparks of that flame which bad thrown the nation into combustion.
While catholics, independents, and other sectaries, were content with entertaining some prospect of toleration; policy and presbytery struggled for the superriority, and the hopers of both parties kept in agitation.

A conference was held in the Savoy between twelve bishops and twelve leaders among the presbyterian ministers, with an intention, at least on pretences, of bringing about an accommodation between the parties. To declare the case in baptism, the kneeling at the sacrament, the bowing at the name of Jesus, were new canvassed; and the ignorant multitude were in hopes that so many men of gravity and learning could not aim at a delusive amalgamation, to agree in all points of controversy: they were surprised to see them separate more inflamed than ever, and more confirmed in their several prejudices. To enter into particulars would be superfluous. Disputes concerning religious forms, in themselves, the most frivolous of any; and merit attention only so far as they have influence on the peace and order of civil society.

The king's declaration had promised, that some endeavours should be used to effect a comprehension of both parties; and Charles's own indifference with regard to all such questions seemed a favourable circumstance for the execution of that project. The paritans of some kind of union were said at the presbyterians, as well as the presbuts, having felt by experience the fatal effects of obedience and violence, were now well disposed towards an amicable agreement: that the bills of communion, levying, excommunications, and all their latter implements, were to be abolished; that the clergy should go generally in every form, rather than by particular invasions, express arguments in the state of j Perry, at best of dependence: and that if their pride were handled some seeming alterations, and a pretence given them for affirming that they had not abandoned their former principles, nothing further was wanting to produce a thorough union betwixt those two parties which composed the bulk of the nation.

It was alleged, on the other hand, that the difference between religious sects was founded, not on principle, but on passion; and that all the irregularities of men could be corrected, it was in vain to expect, by compliances, to obtain a perfect unanimity and comprehension: that the more insignificant the objects of dispute appeared, with the less prudence might it be inferred, that the real spirit of dissension was different from that which was universally pretended; that the love of novelty, the pride of argumentation, the pleasure of making proselytes, and the obstinacy of disputation, would for ever give rise to sects and disputes; nor was it possible that such a source of division could ever, by any concessions, be entirely exhausted: that the church, by departing from ancient practices and principles, would tacitly acknowledge herself guilty of error, and lose that reverence, so requisite for preserving the attachment of the multitude: and that if the present concessions (which was more than probable) should prove ineffectual, greater must still be made; and in the issue, dissension would be dispossessed of all its authority, and worship of all its decency, without obtaining that end which had been so fondly sought for by these dangerous indulgences.

The ministry were inclined to give the preference to the latter arguments; and were the more confirmed in that intention by the disposition which appeared in the parliament lately assembled. The royalists and zealous churchmen were at present the popular party in the nation, and, as a new parliament, the issue had prevailed in most elections. Not more than fifty-six members of the presbyterian party had obtained seats in the lower House: and these were not able either to oppose or retard the measures of the majority. Monarchy, therefore, and episcopecy, were now exalted to as great power and splendour as they had lately suffered misery and depression. Sir Edward Tymor was chosen dean of St. Patrick's, and lord high chancellor of Ireland.

An act was passed for the security of the king's person and government. To intend or devise the king's imprisonment, or bodily harm, or deposition, or levying war against him, was declared, during the lifetime of his present majesty, to be a high treason. To affirm him to be a Papist or heretic, or to endeavour by speech or writing to alienate his subjects' affections from him: these offences were made sufficient to incapacitate the person guilty from holding any public or private commission, to agrainst or in all the long parliament is not dissolved, or that either or both Houses, without the king, are possessed of legislative authority, or that the covenant is binding, was made punishable by the penalty of attainder.

The covenant itself, together with the act for erecting the high court of justice, that for subscribing the engagement, and that for declaring England a commonwealth, were ordered to be burnt by the hands of the hangman. The people assisted with great alacrity on this occasion.

The abuses of petitioning in the preceding reign had been attended with the worst consequences; and to prevent such irregular practices for the future, it was enacted, that no oration presented to the parliament should be referred to committee, unless with the sanction of three justices, or the major part of the grand jury; and that no petition should be presented to the king or either House by above ten persons. The present penalty annexed to a transgression of this law, was a fine of a hundred pounds and three months imprisonment.

The bishops, though restored to their spiritual authority, were still excluded from the parliament by the law which the late king had passed immediately before the commencement of the civil disorders. Great violence, both against the king and the House of Peers, had been employed in passing this law; and on that account alone the partisans of the church were provided with a plausible pretext for repelling it. Charles expressed much satisfaction, when he gave his assent to the act for that purpose. It is certain, that the authority of the crown, as well as that of the church, was interested in restoring the prelates to their former dignity. But those who deemed every acquisition of the prince a detriment to the people, were apt to complain of this instance of compliance in the parliament.

After some months, the parliament was again assembled, and proceeded in the same spirit as before. They discovered no design of restoring, in its fullest extent, the ancient prerogative, but only to correct some of the most material breaches, which had been made, not by the love of liberty, but by the fury of faction and civil war. The power of the sword had, in all ages, been allowed to be vested in the crown; and on that account, every prerogative, every parliament, till the last of the preceding reign, had willingly submitted to an authority more ancient, and therefore more sacred, than that of any positive statute. It was now thought proper solemnly to reinstate the ancient prerogatives of that parliament, and to acknowledge, that neither one House, nor both Houses, independent of the king, were possessed of any military authority. The preamble to this statute went so far as to rescind all the acts of every parliament, and much observation has been made with regard to a concession esteemed so singular. Were these terms taken in their full literal sense, they imply a total renunciation of all privileges in the subject, independent of the will of the sovereign. For as no rights can subsist without some remedy, still less rights exposed to so much invasion from tyrant, or even from ambition; if subjects must never resist, it follows that every statute by the court, had prior validity, and must be observed as absolute and uncontrollable: the sovereign needs only issue an edict, abolishing every authority but his own; and all liberty from that moment is in effect annihilated. But this meaning it was absurd to impose to the present parliament, who, though zealous royalists, showed in their measures that they had not cast off all regard to national privileges. They were probably sensible, that to suppose in the sovereign any such invasion of public liberties is entirely unconstitutional; and that therefore the right of resistance in the subject, must be liable to the same objection. They had seen that the long parliament, under colour of defence, had begun a violent attack upon kingly power; and after the overthrow of an army in blood, had finally lost that liberty for which they had so imprudently contended. They thought, perhaps erroneously, that it was no longer possible, after such public and such exertions, to maintain the principle to which such a necessity, no laws could beforehand point out a proper remedy.

The other measures of this parliament still discovered a more anxious care to guard against rebellion in the subject than the preservation of its power. In order to effect these objects, war and usurpation had naturally increased the spirit of submission to the monarch, and had thrown the nation into that dangerous extreme. During the violent and jealous government of the parliament and of the protectorates, all magistrates, liable to suspicion, had been expelled the corporations: and none had been admitted, who gave not proofs of affection to the ruling powers, or who refused to subscribe the covenant. To leave all authority in such hands seemed dangerous; and the parliament, therefore, empowered the king to appoint commissioners for regulating the corporations, and expelling such magistrates as either intruded themselves by violence, or professed principles dangerous to the constitution, civil and ecclesiastical. It was also enacted, that all magistrates should discharge the obligation of the covenant, and should declare, both their belief, that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to resist the king, and their abhorrence of the trinitarian position of taking arms by the king's authority against his person, or against those who were commissioned by him.

The care of the church was no less attended to, and of the churchman's right to the enjoyment of that of monarchy; and the bill of uniformity was a pledge of their sincere attachment to the episcopal hierarchy, and of their antipathy to presbyterianism. It was, therefore, concurred in promoting this bill, which contained many clauses clearly hostile to independents and other sectaries, enacted to bind all their schemes subverted by the presbyterians, who had once been their associates, exerted themselves to disappoint that party of the favour and indulgence, to which, from their recent merits in promoting the restoration, they thought themselves justly entitled. By the presbyterians, said they, the war was raised: by them was the populace first incited to tumults; by their zeal, interest, and riches, were the armies supported: by their force was the king subdued: and if, in the sequel, they protested against those extreme violations committed on his person by the military leaders, the petition came too late, having supplied those usurpers with the power and the pretences, by which they maintained their sanguinary measures. They had indeed concurred with the royalists in recalling the king: but ought they to be esteemed, on that account, more affected to the royal cause? Habeas and amnestia, from disappointed ambition, were plainly their sole motives; and if the king should now be so-imprudent as to distinguish them by any particular indulgences, he would soon experience from them the same hatred and opposition which had proved so fatal to his father.

The catholics, though they had little interest in the nation, were a considerable party at court; and from their services and sufferings during the civil war, it seemed but just to bear them some favour and regard. These royalists dreaded an entire union among the protestants. Were they the sole nonconformists in the nation, the severe execution of penal laws upon their sect seemed an infallible ground for them, and therefore they were induced to push matters to extremity against the presbyterians, who had formerly been their most severe oppressors, and whom they now expected for their companions in affliction. The Earl of Bute, who, from conviction, or interest, or levity, or complaisance for the company with whom he lived, had changed his religion during the king's exile, was regarded as the head of this party.

The church party had, during so many years, suffered such injuries and indignities from the sectaries of every denomination, that no moderation, much less deference, was on this occasion to be expected in the ecclesiastics. Even the last of that communion seemed now disposed to retaliate upon their enemies, according to the usual measures of party justice. This sect or faction (for it partook of both) encouraged the ramrouses of plots and conspiracies against the government; crimes, which, without any apparent reason, they imputed to their adversaries. And, instead of enlarging the term of communion, in order to comprehend the presbyterians, they gladly laid hold of the prejudices which prevailed among that sect, for suit, and thus justified to themselves that uniformity it was required that every clergyman should be re-ordained, if he had not before received episcopal ordination; should declare his assent to every thing contained in the Book of Common Prayer; should take the oath of canonical obedience; should subscribe all the articles of league and covenant; and should renounce the principle of taking arms, on any pretence whatsoever, against the king.

This bill reinstated the church in the same condition in which it stood before the commencement of the civil wars; and as the old persecuting laws of Elizabeth still subsisted in their full rigour, and new clauses of a like nature were now enacted, all the king's promises of toleration and of indulgence to tender consciences were thereby eluded and broken. It is true, Charles, in his declaration from Breda, had expressed his intention of regulating that indulgence by the advice and authority of parliament: but this limitation could never reasonably be extended to a total infringement and violation of his engagements. However, it is agreed, that the king did not voluntarily concur with this violent measure, and that the zeal of Clarendon and Seymour of Bristol, the author of the bill, who by the intrigues of the catholics, was the chief cause which exerted his consent.

The royalists, who now predominated, were very ready to signalize their victory, by publishing through high principles of monarchy which their antagonists had controverted; but when any real power or revenue was demanded for the crown, they were neither so forward nor so liberal in their concessions as the king would gladly have wished. Though the parliament passed laws for regulating the navy, they took no notice of the army; and declined giving their sanction to this dangerous innovation. The king's debts were become intolerable; and the Commons were at last constrained to vote him an extraordinary supply of 1,200,000 pounds, to be levied by eighteen monthly assessments. But besides that this supply was much inferior to the occasion, the king was obliged to demand earnestly to solicit the Commons, before he could count on it; and, in order to convince the House of its absolute necessity, he desired them to examine strictly into all his receipts and disbursements. Finding, likewise, upon inquiry, that the several branches of revenue fell much short of the sums expected, they at last, after much debate, voted a new imposition of two shillings on each hearth; and this tax they settled on the king during life. The whole established revenue, however, did not, for many years, exceed a million; which was not sufficient for the public expenses. A very rigid frugality at least, which the king seems to have wanted, would have been requisite to make it suffice for the dignity and security of government. After all business was despatched, the parliament was prorogued.

Before the parliament rose, the court was employed in making preparations for the reception of the new queen, Catharine of Portugal, to whom the king was betrothed, and whom he landed at Portsmouth. During the time that the protector carried on the war with Spain, he was naturally led to support the Portuguese in their revolt; and he engaged himself by treaty to supply them with 10,000 men for their defense. Engineering works, the repair of fortifications, and advances were made by Portugal for the renewal of the alliance; and in order to bind the friendship closer, an offer was made of the Portuguese princess, and a portion of 500,000 pounds, together with two fortresses, to the

was voluntarily engaged by the most sacred covenant, was this obligation not materially power should ever be able to make him relinquish.

All the defence which Vane could make was fruitless. The court, considering more the general opinion of his accusers than the beginning of prosecution, of the civil war, than the articles of treason charged against him, took advantage of the letter of the law, and brought him in guilty. His courage deserved him not upon his condemnation. Though timid by nature, the persuasion of a just cause supported him against the terrors of death; while his enthusiasm, excited by the prospect of glory, embellished the conclusion of a life, which, through the whole course of it, had been so much dissipation. He appeared, therefore, a courageous sufferer should make impression on the populace, drummers were placed under the scaffold, whose and execution, as he began to launch out in reflections on the government, drowned his voice, and admonished him to temper the ardour of his soul. He was not astonished at this unexpected incident. In all his behaviour, there appeared a firm and animated intrepidity; and he considered death but as a passage to that eternal bliss which he believed to be prepared for him.

This man, so celebrated for his parliamentary talents, and for his capacity in business, has left some writings behind him: they treat, all of them, of religious subjects, and are written with a spirit of piety and charity, or even of common sense, appear in them. A strange paradox did we not know, that men of the greatest genius, where they relinquish by principle the use of their reason, are only enabled, by their vigour of mind, to work themselves the destruction of error and absurdity. It is remarkable, that, as Vane, by being the chief instrument of Strafford’s death, had first opened the way for that destruction which overwhelmed the nation; so by his death he has struck the key of purpose to destroy all the errors furnished on account of the civil wars. Lambert, though condemned, was reprieved at the bar; and the judges declared, that, if Vane’s behaviour had been equally dutiful and submissive, he would have experienced like leniency in the king. Lambert survived his condemnation nearly years. He was confined to the Isle of Guernsey; where he lived contentedly, forgetting all his past schemes of greatness, and entirely forgotten by the nation: he died a Roman Catholic.

Presbyterian clergy expected to the presbyterians, that party had no leisure to rejoice at their condemnation. The fatal St. Bartholomew’s day, which the clergy were obliged, by the late law, either to relinquish their livings, or to sign the articles required of them. A combination had been entered into by the more zealous of the presbyterians, with which he would rather comply. He had some hopes that the bishops would not venture at once to expel so great a number of the most popular preachers. The Catholic party at court, who desired a great rent among the protestants, encouraged them in this obstanctly, and gave them hopes that the king would protect them in their refusal. The king himself, by his irresolute conduct, contributed, either from design or accident, to increase this opinion. Above all, the terms of subscription had been made the strictest, in order to disgust all the scurrility, and revolting among the presbyterians, and deters them of their livings. About 2000 of the clergy, in one day, relinquished their curates; and to the astonishment of the court, sacrificed their interest to their religious tenets. Fortified by society in their sufferings, they were resolved to undergo any hardships, rather than openly renounce those principles, which, on other occasions, they were so apt, from interest, to warp or elude. The church enjoyed the pleasure of retaliation; and even pushed, as usual, the vengeance further than the offence. During the dominion of the parliamentary party, a fifth of each living had been left to the ejected clergyman; but this indulgence, though at first insisted on by the House of Peers, was now refused to the presbyterians. However difficult to conciliate peace among theologians, it was hoped by many, that some relaxation in the case of persecution, and some submission of the presbyterians united to the church, and have cured those ecclesiastical faction which had been so fatal, and were still so dangerous. Bishoprics were offered to Calamy, Baxter, and Reynolds, leaders among presbyterians; the last only consented to accept. Deanes and other preferments were refused by many.

The next measure of the king has not had the good fortune to be justified by any party; but is often considered, at what grounds of the same, as one of those greatest mistakes, if not blemishes, of his Dunkirk told to the French. It is the sale of Dunkirk to the French. The parsimonious maxims of the parliament, and the liberal or rather careless disposition of Charles, were ill suited to each other; and notwithstanding the supplies voted him, his treasury was still very empty and very much indebted. He had secretly received the sum of 200,000 crowns from France, for the support of his fleet, but the force of the fleet was so destroyed, that the ships maintained in order to defend it, had already cost the king that sum; and, together with that, the ships which had been paid as the queen’s portion. The time fixed for paying the shipwrecked English on the coast of Dunkirk was approaching. Tangiers, a fortress from which great benefit was expected, was become an additional burden to the crown; and Rutherford, who now commanded in Dunkirk, had increased the charge of that garrison to a hundred and twenty thousand pounds a year. These considerations had such influence, not only on the king, but even on Clarendon, that this uncorrect minister was the most forward to address the French. The money in lieu of which the English were to receive for the ships, or rather the won and that nation, was therefore the only purchaser that remained. D’Estruades was invited over, by a letter from the chancellor himself, in order to conclude the bargain. Nine hundred thousand pounds were demanded. One hundred thousand were offered. The English by degrees lowered their demand: the French raised their offer: and the bargain was concluded at 400,000 pounds. The artillery and stores were valued at a fifth of the sum. The importance of that fifth, as is said, was, so small, had it been abroad or at home. The French measured himself, so fond of acquisitions, and so good a judge of his own interests, thought that he had made a hard bargain; and this soon, in appearance so small, was the utmost which the wealthiest crown could offer.

A new incident discovered such a glimpse of the king’s character and principles, as, at first, the nation was somewhat at a loss how to interpret, but such as subsequent events, by degrees, rendered sufficiently plain and manifest. He issued a declaration on the 10th December last, under the pretence of mitigating the rigours contained in the act of uniformity. After expressing his firm resolution to observe the general indemnity, and to trust entirely to the affections of his subjects, not to any military power, for the support of his throne, he mentioned the promises of liberty of conscience, contained in his declaration of Breda. And he subjoined, that, as in the first place he had been zealous to settle the uniformity of the church of England, in discipline, ceremony, and government, and shall ever constantly maintain it: so as for what concerns the penalties upon those who, living peaceably, do not conform themselves thereto, through scruple and tenderness of misguided conscience, but modestly and without scandal perform their devotions in their own

1 D’Estruades, 17th August, 1660. There was above half of 1000,000 pounds really used as the queen’s portion. For the act of 20th of September, 1660, see pp. 682. 683.

2 It appears, however, from many of D’Estruades’s letters, particularly that of 17th September, that he was alarmed by the different discussion that the king, who on the other hand, was jealous lest the parliament should acquire any separate dominion or authority in a Protestant administration, which was intended to be a restraint on the Roman Catholic clergy. But it was the law the XVIIIth who first made a good success of it. If ever I conclude with anything apropos, it must be an appeal to some ally whose sense of the same purpose as Dunkirk would, in the hands of the English.
way, he should make it his special care, so far as in him lay, without invaded the freedom of parliament, to incline their wisdom next approaching sessions to concur with him in making such some act for that purpose, as may enable him to exercise, with a more universal satisfaction, that habeas corpus which be supposed to be inherent in him." Here a most important prerogative was exercised by the king; but under such artful reserves and limitations as might prevent the full discussion of the claim, they were to be formed between the king and parliament. The foundation of this measure lay much deeper, and was of the utmost consequence.

The king, during his exile, had imbied strong prejudices against a Catholic religion; according to the most probable accounts, he had already been secretly reconciled in form to the church of Rome. The great zeal, expressed by the parliamentary party against all papists, had always, from a spirit of oppression, inclined the court, and all the loyalists, to adopt more favourable sentiments towards that sect, which, through the whole course of the civil wars, had strenuously supported the rights of the sovereign. The rigour, too, which the king, during his stay in Scotland, had experienced from the Presbyterian faction, disposed him to run into the other extreme, and to bear a kindliness to the party most opposite in its genius to the severity of those religiousists. The solicitations and importunities of the court of Rome, which he frequented, the view of a more splendid and courtly mode of worship, the hopes of indulgence in pleasure; all these causes operated powerfully on a young prince, whose careless and dissolute temper made him incapable of adhering closely to the principles of his early education. But if the thoughtless humour of Charles rendered him an easy convert to popery, the same disposition ever prevented the theological tenets of that sect from taking any fast hold of him. During his vigorous state of health, while his blood was warm and his spirits high, a contempt and disregard to all religion held possession of his mind; and he might more properly be denominiad a Roman Catholic. But in those revolutions of temper, when the love of raillay gave place to reflection, and his penetrating, but negligent understanding was clouded with fears and apprehensions, he had starts of more sincere conviction; and a sect, which always possessed his inclination, was then master of his judgment and opinion. But though the king thus fluctuated, during his whole reign, between irreligion, which he more openly professed, and Roman Catholicism, which he retained, his brother, the Duke of York, had zealously adopted all the principles of that theological party. His eagerness and narrow understanding made him a thorough convert, without scruple of cost, to the power of faction, and of blindly following the application and inquiry. By his application to business he had acquired a great ascendancy over the king, who, though possessed of more discernment, was glad to throw the burden of affairs on the duke, of whom he entertained little jealousy. On pretence of easing the protestant dissenters, they agreed upon a plan for introducing a general tulation, and giving the catholics the free exercise of their religion; at least, the exercise of it in private houses. The two brothers saw with pleasure so numerous and popular a body of the clergy refuse conformity; and it was hoped that, under shelter of their name, the small and hated sect of the catholics might meet with favour and protection.

But while the king pleaded his early professions of toleration, and insisted on many other plausible topics, the parliament, who sat a little after the declaration was issued, could by no means be satisfied with that measure. The declared intention of easing the dissenters, and the secret purpose of favouring the catholics, were equally disagreeable to them; and in these proposals they were encouraged by the king's ministers themselves, particularly the chancellor. To the House of Commons represented to the king, that his declaration of Breda contained no promise to the presbyterians and other dissenters, but only an expression of his intentions, upon supposition of the concurrence of parliament; that even if the non-conformists had been enticed to plead a promise, they had intrusted this claim, as all their other rights and privileges, to the House of Commons, who were their representatives, and who now freed the king from this care of consideration to be inherent in him." Here a most important prerogative was exercised by the king; but under such artful reserves and limitations as might prevent the full discussion of the claim, they were to be formed between the king and parliament. The foundation of this measure lay much deeper, and was of the utmost consequence.

But while the king pleaded his early professions of toleration, and insisted on many other plausible topics, the parliament, who sat a little after the declaration was issued, could by no means be satisfied with that measure. The declared intention of easing the dissenters, and the secret purpose of favouring the catholics, were equally disagreeable to them; and in these proposals they were encouraged by the king's ministers themselves, particularly the chancellor. To the House of Commons represented to the king, that his declaration of Breda contained no promise to the presbyterians and other dissenters, but only an expression of his intentions, his courage, he could never regain the character which he lost by this hasty and precipitate measure.

But though Clarendon was able to elude Ranelagh's credit, this rash assault, his credit at court was sensibly declining; and in proportion as the king found himself established on the throne, he began to alienate himself from a minister, who, in his opinion, was so little suited to his own. Charles's favour for the catholics was always opposed by Clarendon; public liberty was secured against all attempts of the over-zealous royalists; prodigal grants of the king were either suspended, or restrained, and the dignity of his own character was so much consulted by the chancellor, that he made it an inviolable rule, as did also his friend, Southampton, never to enter into any connexion with the royal mistresses. The king's favourite was Mrs. Palmer, afterwards created Duchess of Cleveland; a woman prodigal, rapacious, dissolute, violent, revengeful. She failed not in her turn to undermine Clarendon's credit with his master; and her success was at this time made apparent to the whole world. Secretary Nicholls, the chancellor's great friend, was removed from his place; and Sir Harry Bennet, his avowed enemy, was advanced to that office. Bennet was soon after created Lord Arlington.

Though the king's conduct had hitherto, since his restoration, been, in the main, laudable, men of penetration began to observe, that those virtues by which he had at first so much dazzled and enchanted the nation, had great shortness of life; every one of his proceedings invested his character, without much of its influence by his want of application; his bounty was more the result of a facility of disposition, than any generosity of character; his social humour led him frequently to neglect his dignity; his desire of pleasure was not extented with proper sentiment and decency; and while he seemed to bear a good-will to every one that approached him, he had a heart not very capable of friendship, and he had secretly entertained a very bad opinion and charge of most of his ministers. But above all, what sufficed his character in the eyes of good judges, was his negligent ingratitude towards the unfortunate cavaliers, whose zeal and sufferings in the royal cause had known no bounds. This conduct, however, in the king, may, in the circumstances of his situation and temper, admit of some excuse; at least, of some alleviation. As he had been restored more by the efforts of his reconciled enemies than of his ancient friends, the former pretended a title to share in the favours and being, from practice, acquainted with public business, they were better qualified to execute any trust committed to them. The king's revenues were far from being large, or even equal to his necessary expenses; and his mistresses, and the charge of maintenance of his court, with solicitation, every request from his easy temper. The very poverty to which the most zealous royalists had reduced themselves, by rendering them insignificant, made them unfit to support the king's measures, and caused him to deem them a useless encumbrance. And as many false and ridiculous claims of merit were offered, his natural indulgence, averse to a strict discussion or inquiry, led him to treat them all with equal indifference. The parliament took some notice of the poor cavaliers. Thirty thousand pounds were, at one time, distributed among them: Mrs. Lane also, and the Penderells, had handsome presents and pensions from the king. But the greater part of the regicide party, and distress; aggrieved by the cruel disappointment in their sanguine hopes, and by seeing avarice and preferment bestowed upon their most inconstant foes. With regard to the act of indemnity and oblivion, they universally said, that it was an act of indemnity to the king's enemies, and of oblivion to his friends.

could he not remain altogether insensible to such obvious and such tempting prospects. His genius, happily turned towards mechanics, had inclined him to study naval affairs, which, of all branches of business, he both loved the most and was the best. The Dutch, during his exile, had expressed towards him more civility and friendship, than he had received from any other foreign power; the Louvensteun or aristocratic faction, which at this time ruled in the commonwealth, had fallen into close union with France; and could that party be subdued, he might hope that his nephew, the young Prince of Orange, would be reinstated in the authority possessed by his ancestors, and would make an alliance of States to a dependence under England. His narrow revenues made it still requisite for him to study the humours of his people, which now ran violently towards war; and it has been suspected, though the suspicion was not justified by the event, that the hopes of diverting some of the supplies to his private use were not overlooked by this necessitous monarch.

The Duke of York, more active and enterprising, pushed more eagerly the war with Holland. He desired an opportunity of distinguishing himself; he loved to cultivate commerce: he was at the head of a new African company, whose trade was extremely checked by the settlements of the Dutch: and perhaps the religious prejudices, by which this noble prince was so much governed, he began even so early to instil into him an anxiety against a protectorate in the commonwealth, the ruin of the reformation. Clarendon and Southampton, observing that the nation was not supported by any foreign alliance, were averse to hostilities; but credit was now on the increase.

By these concerning motives, the court of May 17 and parliament were both of them inclined to a Dutch war. The parliament was prorogued without voting supplies; but as they had been induced, without any open application from the crown, to pass that vote above mentioned against the Dutch encroachments, it was reasonably considered as sufficient sanction for the vigorous measures which were resolved on.

Downing, the English minister at the Hague, a man of an insolent impetuous temper, presented a memorial to the States, containing a list of those depredations, of which the English complained. It is remarkable, that all the pretended depredations preceded the year 1662, when a treaty of league and alliance had been renewed with the Dutch; and these complaints were then thought either so ill-grounded or so frivolous, that they had not been mentioned in that treaty. Two ships alone, the Bonaventure and the Prince Rupert, under the command of Mr. van den Broeck, had been seized; good-hope, had been claimed by the English; and it was agreed that the claim should be prosecuted by the ordinary course of justice. The States had consigned a sum of money to be the cause should be decided against them; but the matter was still in dependence.

Charles, informed by the English minister, instructed by the proprietors with the management of the law-suit for the Bonaventure, had resolved to accept of thirty thousand pounds, which were offered him; but was hindered by Downing, who told him that the claim was a matter of state between the two nations, not a concern of private persons. These circumstances give us no favourable idea of the justice of the English pretensions.

Charles confined not himself to memorials and remonstrances. Sir Robert Holmes was secretly despatched with a squadron of twenty-two ships to the coast of Africa. He not only expelled the Dutch from Cape Corse, to which the English had so much pretensions; he likewise seized the Dutch settlements of Cape Verde and the isle of Goree, together with several ships trading on the coast. And having sailed to America, he possessed himself of Nova Helgna, once called New York; a territory which James the First had given by patent to the Earl of Stirling, but which had never been planted but by the Hollanders.

When the States complained of these hostile measures, the king, unwilling to show what he could not well justify, resolutely refused the conditions, but was answer'd with a total ignorance of the transaction. He likewise confined that admiral to the Tower; but some time after released him.

The Dutch, finding that their applications for redress were likely to be eluded, and that a ground of quarrel was industriously sought for by the English, began to arm with diligence. They even exerted, with some precipitation, an act of vigour, which hastened on the rupture. Sir John Lawson and De Ruyter had been sent with combined squadrons, in order to clear the practical states on the coast of Barbary; and the time of their separation and return was now approaching. The States secretly despatched orders to De Ruyter, that he should take up the disposition to sail towards the coast of Guinea; that he should retaliate on the English, and put the Dutch in possession of those settlements whence Holmades had expelled them. De Ruyter, having a considerable force, and a necessity of supply, the fleet was immediately formed. All the new acquisitions of the English, except Cape Corse, were recovered from them. They were even dispossessed of some old settlements. Such of their ships as fell into his hands were seized by De Ruyter. That admiral sailed next to America. He attacked Barbados, but was repulsed. He afterwards committed bottesies on Long Island.

Meanwhile, the English preparations for war were advancing with vigour and industry. The king had received no supplies from parliament; but by his own funds and credit he was enabled to equip a fleet; the city of London lent him 100,000 pounds: the spirit of the nation seconded his design; the shipyards, from port to port, were busy; and the credit was quickly communicated to the receipts, to which a Dutch ship was put in a formidable condition. Eight hundred thousand pounds are said to have been expended on this armament. When Lawson arrived, and communicated to the States the necessity of a new enterprise, orders were issued for seizing all Dutch ships; and 132 fell into the hands of the English. These were not declared prizes, till afterwards, when war was proclaimed.

The parliament, when it met, granted a new supply, the largest by far that had ever been obtained, given to a King of England, yet scarcely sufficient for the present undertaking. Near two million a half were voted to be levied by quarterly payments in three years. The avidity of the merchants, together with the great prospect of success, had animated the whole nation against the Dutch.

A great alteration was made this session in the method of taxing the clergy. In almost all the other monarchies of Europe, the assemblies, whose consent was formerly requisite to the enacting of laws, were composed of three estates, the clergy, the nobility, and the commonalty, who formed so many members of the political body, of which the king was considered as the head. In England, too, the parliament was always represented as consisting of three estates; but their separate influence, in other kingdoms, in the conversion, however, had usually been given at the same time with the parliament; though they possessed not a negative voice in the passing of laws, and assumed no other temporal power than that of important taxes on the clergy. By reason of ecclesiastical pretexts, which he could bestow, the king's influence over the church was more considerable than over the laity; so that the subsidies, granted by the conversion, were commoner greater than those which were voted by parliament. The church, therefore, was not displeased to depart tacitly from the right of taxing herself, and allow the Commons to lay impositions on ecclesiastical revenues, as on the rest of the kingdom. A re-established church, which the conversion had formerly granted, were remitted, and the parochial clergy were allowed to vote at elections. Thus the church of England made a barter of power for profit. Their convocations, having become insignificant to the crown, have been more or less disused of late years.

The Dutch saw, with the utmost regret, a war approaching, whence they might dread the most fatal consequences; but while the Duke of York's enterprising spirits tried every art of negotiation, before they would come to extremities. Their measures were at that time directed by John de Wit, a minister equally eminent for greatness of mind, for capacity, and for integrity. Though moderate in his private department, he knew how to adopt, in his public counsels, that economy which suited the interest of a great state. It was ever his maxim, that so independent government should yield to another no evident point of reason or equity; and that all such concessions, so long as they suited the state, must be made with more than to provoke fresh claims and insults. By his management a spirit of union was preserved in all the provinces; great sums were levied; and a navy was equipped, composed of larger ships than the Dutch had ever built before, and able to cope with England. In the heat of action, when engaged in close fight with the Duke of York, Oldam's ship blew up. This accident much discouraged the Dutch, who fled towards their own coast. Tromp alone, son of the famous admiral, killed at Bremer, bravely sustained with his squadron the efforts of the English, and protected the rear of his countrymen. The vanquished had nineteen ships sunk and taken. The victors lost only one ship, and several of her crew. It is affirmed, and with an appearance of reason, that this victory might have been rendered more complete, had not orders been issued to slacken sail by Boumeester, one of the Duke's bed-chamber, who pretended authority from his master. The duke disclaimed the orders; but Boumeester never was sufficiently punished for his temerity. It is allowed, however, that the Duke behaved with great bravery during the action. He was long in the thickest of the fight, and in perils of death; and Mr. Boyle were killed by one shot at his side, and covered him all over with his brains and gore. And it is not likely, that, in a pursuit, where even persons of inferior station, and of the most cowardly dispositions, acquire courage, a commander should feel his spirits to flag; and should turn from the back of an enemy, whose force he had not been afraid to encounter.

This disaster threw the Dutch into consternation, and determined De Wit, who was the soul of their councils, to exert his military capacity, in order to support the declining courage of his countrymen. He went on board the fleet, which he took under his command; and he secured the Dutch Dutchers of the coast, and those sects of the late misfortune. The genius of this man was of the most extensive nature. He quickly became as much master of naval affairs, as if he had from his infancy been bred to the sea. He was brought up in some parts of piloting and sailing, beyond what men expert in those arts had ever been able to attain.

The misfortunes of the Dutch determined their allies to act for their assistance and support. The King of France was engaged in a defensive alliance with the States; but as its naval force was yet in its infancy, he was entirely averse, at that time, from entering into a war with so formidable a power as England, which he did not wish to make a peace between the States, and for that purpose sent an embassy to London, which returned without effecting any thing. Lord Hollis, the English ambassador at Paris, endeavoured to draw over Lewis to the side of England; and, in his master's name, made him the most tempting offers. Charles was content to abandon all the Spanish Low Countries to the French, without pretending to a foot of ground for himself; provided Lewis would allow him to pursue his advantages against the Dutch. But the French monarch, though the conquest of that valuable territory was the chief object of his ambition, rejected the offer as contrary to his interests: he thought, that if the English had once established an uncontrollable dominion over the sea, and over commerce, they would soon be able to render his acquisitions a dear purchase to him. When De Lionne, the French secretary, assured Van Beuningen, ambassador of the States, that this offer had been based on his master during six months; "I can readily believe it," replied the Dutchman; "I am sensible that it is the interest of England." Such were the established maxims at that time with regard to the interests of princes. It must however be allowed, that the politics of Charles, in making this offer, were not a little hazardous. The extreme weakness of Spain would have rendered the French conquests easy and infallible; and the vogue of the Dutch, it might be foreseen, would make the success of the English much more precarious. And even were the naval force of Holland totally annihilated, the acquisition of the Dutch commerce to England could not be relied on as a certain consequence; nor is trade a constant attendant of power, but depends on many other, and some of them very delicate, circumstances.

Though the King of France had resolved to support the Hollanders in that unequal contest in which they were engaged; yet he protracted his declaration, and employed the time in naval preparations, both in the ocean and the Mediterranean. The King of Denmark meanwhile consoled himself with the hope to remain in the contest between the maritime powers. The part which he acted was the most extraordinary: he made a secret agreement with Charles to seize all the Dutch ships in his harbours, and to share the spoils with the English, provided they would assist him in executing that measure. In order to increase his prey, he perfidiously invited the Dutch to take shelter in his ports; and accordingly the East India fleet, very rich laden, had put into Bergen, Sandwich, who now commanded the English navy, (the duke having gone ashore,) despatched Sir Thomas Tiddiman with a squadron to attack them; but whether from the King of Denmark's delay in sending orders to the governor, or, what is more probable, from his avidity in endeavouring to engross the whole booty, the English admiral, though he behaved with great bravery, failed of his purpose. The Danish governor fired upon him, and the Dutch having had leisure to fortify themselves, made a gallant resistance.

The King of Denmark, seemingly ashamed of his conduct, concluded with Sir Gilbert Talbot, the English envoy, an offer that the Dutch should cede their fleet to him at the very same time, his resident at the Hague, Ruperti with by his orders, concluded an offensive alliance against England. To this latter alliance he adhered, probably from the increase of the English power in England; and he seized and confiscated all the English ships in his harbours. This was a sensible check to the advantages which Charles had obtained over the Dutch. Not only a blow was given to the English commerce; the King of Denmark's naval force was also considerable, and threatened every moment a conjunction with the Hollanders. That prince stipulated to assist his ally with a fleet of thirty sail; and he received in return a yearly subsidy of 1,500,000 crowns, of which 300,000 were paid by France.

The king endeavoured to counterbalance these confederacies by acquiring new friends and allies. He had despatched Sir Richard Fanhaw into Spain, who met with a very cold reception. That monarch was sunk into a state of weakness, and was menaced with an invasion from France; yet could not any motive prevail with Philip to enter into cordial friendship with England. Charles's alliance with Portugal, the detention of Jamaica and Tangers, the sale of Dunkirk to the French; all these offences sunk so deep in the mind of the Spanish

5 King James, in his Memoirs, gives an account of this affair different from what was recorded in the officers' reports. But Boumeester brought orders to Sir John Harvey, captain of the ship, to effect it, and Harvey did his utmost to prevent it. After some time, finding that his falling back was like to prejudice the contest in the fleet, he resolved to make the attempt, and in the night to send a quarter-deck, and finding all things as he left them, knew nothing of what had passed during his repos.

monarch, that no motive of interest was sufficient to outweigh them.

The Bishop of Munster was the only ally that Charles could acquire. This prelate, a man of restless enterprise and mullation, had entertained a violent animosity against the States; and he was easily engaged, by the promise of subsidies from England, to mass an invasion that republic. With a tumultuary army of near 20,000 men, he invaded her territories, and met with weak resistance. The land forces of the States were as feebly and ill-equipped as they were gallant and irreducible. He with his committing great ravages in several of the provinces, a stop was put to the progress of this warlike prelate. He had not military skill sufficient to improve the advantages which fortune had put into his hands: the King of France sent a body of 6000 men to oppose him: subsidies were not regularly remitted to him from England; and many of his troops deserted for want of pay: the Elector ofHanover threatened him with an invasion in his own state; and on the whole, he was glad to conclude a peace under the mediation of France. On the first summons of his intentions, Sir William Temple was sent from London with money to fix him in his former alliance: but found that he arrived too late.

The Dutch, encouraged by all these favourable circumstances, continued resolve to exert themselves to the utmost in their own defence. De Ruyter, their great admiral, had in the meantime been expelled the Ganges: his Indian fleet was come home in safety: their harbours were crowded with merchant ships: faction at home was appeased: the young Prince of Orange had put himself at the head of the States of Holland, and of De Wit, their pensionary, who executed his trust with energy and fidelity: and the nunsigns, which the Hollanders entertained against the attack of the English, so unprovoked, as they thought, it made them thirst for revenge, and hope for better success in their next enterprise. Such vigour was exerted in the common cause, that, in order to man the fleet, all merchant ships were prohibited to sail, and even the fisheries were suspended.

The English likewise continued in the same disposition, though another more disgraceful calamity had joined itself to that war. The plague had broken out in London; and with that violence, as to cut off, in a year, near 90,000 inhabitants. The King was obliged to summon the parliament at Oxford.

A good agreement still subsisted between the French and parliament, and De Wi. on their part, unanimously voted the supply demanded, twelve hundred and fifty thousand pounds, to be levied in two years by monthly assessments. And he, to prove the truth of this calm act, which has given occasion to grievous and not unjust complaints. The church, under pretence of guarding monarchy against its invertebrate enemies, persevered in the project of weakening her own enemies against the nonconformists. It was enacted, that no dissenting teacher who took not the nonresistance oath above mentioned, should, except upon the road, come within five miles of any corporation, or of any place, where he had preached after the act of oblivion. The penalty was a fine of fifty pounds, and two months imprisonment. By ejecting the nonconforming clergy from their churches, and prohibiting all separate congregations, they had been rendered incapable of gaining any living by their spiritual profession. And now, under the colour of removing them from places where their influence might be dangerous, an expedition was fallen upon to deprive them of all means of subsistence. Had not the spirit of the age prevented this insalutary act, these violations were preludes to the most forcible persecution.

However prevalent the hierarchy, this law did not pass without opposition. Besides several peers, attached to the old parliamentary faction, Southerne, himself, though Clarendon's great friend, expressed his disapprobation of these measures. But the church party, not discouraged with this opposition, introduced into the House of Commons a bill for imposing the oath of nonresistance on the whole nation. It was rejected only by three votes: and parliament, after a short session, was prorogued.

After France had declared war, England was evidently overmatched in force. Yet she possessed an advantage by her science, that she lay between the fleets of France, and might be able, by speedy and well-concerted operations, to prevent their junction. But such was the unhappy conduct of her commanders, or such want of intelligence in her ministers, that this circumstance lost its advantage, and proved of no service to the Duke of Beaufort, his admiral, to sail from Toulon; and the French squadron, under his command, consisting of above forty sail, was now commonly supposed to be entering the channel. The Dutch fleet, to the number of seventy-six sail, was at sea, under the command of De Ruyter and Tromp, in order to join him. The Duke of Albemarle and Prince Rupert commanded the English fleet, which exceeded not seventy-four sail. Albemarle, who, from his successes under the protector, had too much learned to despise the enemy, proposed to detach Prince Rupert with twenty ships, in order to oppose the Duke of Beaufort. Sir George Ayscue, well acquainted with the bravery and conduct of De Ruyter, protested against the temerity of this resolution: but Albemarle's authority prevailed. The remainder of the English set sail to give battle to the Dutch; who seeing the enemy advance, and prepared for the combat. The battle that ensued, is one of the most memorable that we read of in story; whether we consider its long duration, or the desperate courage with which it was fought. Albemarle made here some show of four ammunition by his valour for the rashness of days. No youth, animated by glory and ambitious hopes, could exert himself more than did this man, who was now in the prime of life, and could not lose the summit of honours. We shall not enter minutely into particulars. It will be sufficient to mention the chief events of each day's engagement.

In the first day, Sir William Berkeley, vice-admiral, leading the van, fell into the thickest of the enemy, was overpowered, and his ship taken. He himself was found dead in his cabin, all covered with blood. The English had the weather-gage of the enemy; but as the wind blew so hard, that they could not use their lower tier, they derrived but small advantage from this circumstance. The Dutch shot, however, fell chiefly on their sails and rigging; and few ships were sunk or much damaged. But in the evening the English, commonly attributed to De Wit. Sir John Harman exerted himself extremely on this day. The Dutch admiral, Evertz, was killed in engaging him. Darkness parted the combatants.

The second day, the wind was somewhat fallen, and the combat become more steady and more terrible. The English now found, that the greatest value cannot compensate the superiority of numbers, against an enemy who well conducted; and who is not defective in courage. De Ruyter and Van Tromp, rivals in glory, and enemies from faction, exerted themselves in emulation of each other; and De Ruyter had the advantage of disengaging and saving his antagonist, who had been surrounded by the English, and was in the most imminent danger. Sixteen fresh ships joined the Dutch fleet during the action; and the English were so shattered, that their fighting ships were reduced to twenty-six carracks; they found themselves obliged to retreat towards their own coast. The Dutch followed them, and were on the point of renewing the combat, when a calm, which came a little before night, prevented the engagement. Next morning they found these English with orders to continue their retreat; and a proper disposition was made for that purpose. The shattered ships were ordered to stretch a-head; and sixteen of the most entire followed them in good order, and kept the enemy in view. Albemarle himself closed the rear, and presented an indomitable countenance to his victorious foes. The Earl of Ossory, son of Ormond, a gallant youth, who sought honour and experience in every action throughout Europe, was then on board the admiral Albemarle confessed to him his intention rather to blow up his ship and perish gloriously, than yield to the enemy. Osborne applauded this desperate resolution.

About two o'clock, the Dutch had come up with their enemy, and were ready to renew the fight; when a new fleet, some two hundred and forty sail, made its appearance. Albemarle did not allow the enemy to reach the scene of action. The Dutch flattened themselves that Beaufort was arrived, to cut off the retreat of the vanquished; the English hoped that Prince Rupert had come, to turn the scale of action. Albemarle, who had received intelligence of this fleet, put to sea, and steered towards it. Unhappily, Sir George Ayscue, in a ship of a hundred guns, the largest in the fleet, struck on the Galloper sands, and could receive no assistance from his friends. But Albemarle could not even reap the consolation of perishing with honour, and revenging his death on his enemies. They were preparing fireships to attack him, and he was obliged to strike. The English sailors, seeing the necessity, with the utmost indignation surrendered themselves prisoners.

Albemarle and Prince Rupert were now determined to face the enemy; and next morning the battle began afresh, when John's road near Dover was the true valour. After long cannonading, the fleets came to a close combat; which was continued with great violence, till parted by a mist. The English retired first into their harbours.

Though the English, by their obstinate courage, repelled the charge of the Duke of Beaufort principal and uttermost, who had obtained the victory. The Hollanders took a few ships, and having some appearances of advantage, expressed their satisfaction by all the signs of triumph and rejoicing. But as the English fleet was repaired in a little time, and put to sea more formidable than ever, together with many of those ships which the Dutch had boasted to have burned or destroyed; all Europe saw, that those two brave nations were not enemies in a contest, which was not likely, on either side, to prove decisive.

It was the conjunction alone of the French, that could give a decisive superiority to the Dutch. In order to facilitate this conjunction, De Ruyter, having repaired his fleet, posted himself at the mouth of the Thames. The English, under Prince Rupert and Albemarle, were not long in coming to the attack. The numbers of each fleet amounted to about eighty sail; and the valor and experience of the commanders, as well as of the seamen, rendered the engagement fierce and obstinate. Sir Thomas Allen, who commanded the white squadron of the English, attacked the Dutch, and was completely repulsed; and he killed the third admiral of the enemy.

Sir Jeremy Smith; and during the heat of action, he was separated from De Ruyter and the main body, whether by accident or design was never certainly known. De Ruyter made the least endeavours to save the men of the main body of the English; and though outnumbered by numbers, kept up his station, till at least the end engaged. Next day, finding the Dutch fleet scattered and discouraged, his high spirit submitted to a retreat, which yet he conducted with such skill, as to render it equally honourable to himself as the greatest victory. Full of indignation, however, at yielding the superiority to the enemy, he frequently exclaimed, "My God! what a wretch am I among so many thousand bullets, in that there was not one to put an end to my miserable life?" One De Witte, his son-in-law, who stood near, exhorted him, since he sought death, to turn upon the English, and render his life a dear purchase to the victors. But De Ruyter esteemed it more worthy a brave man to persevere to the utmost, and, as long as possible, to render service to his country. All that night and next day, the English pressed upon the rear of the Dutch; and it was chiefly by the redoubled efforts of De Ruyter, that the latter saved themselves in their harbours.

The loss sustained by the Hollanders in this action was not very considerable; but as violentanimosities had been excited among the English officers on one side or other, the consequences which took place was great among the provinces. Tromp’s commission was at last taken from him; but though several captains had misbehaved, they were so effectually protected by their friends in the magnificence of the towns, that most of them escaped punishment, many were still continued in their commands.

The English now rode incontestable masters of the sea, and insulted the Dutch in their harbours. A detachment under Holmes was sent into the road of Viz, and burned the city. The whole fleet, together with Brandaris, a large and rich village on the coast. The Dutch merchants, who lost by this enterprise, uniting themselves to the Orange faction, exclaimed against an admiral who did not prevent this, and brought such disgrace and ruin on their country. None but the firm and intrepid mind of De Wit could have supported itself under such a complication of calamities.

The King of France, apprehensive that the Dutch would sink under their misfortunes, at last, that De Wit, his friend, might be dispossessed of the administration, hastened the advance of the Duke of Beaufort. The Dutch fleet likewise was again equipped; and under the command of De Ruyter, cruised near the straits of Dover. Prince Rupert, with the English navy, now stronger than ever, came full sail upon them. The Dutch admiral thought proper to decline the combat, and retired into St. Helens; where he said some time, in order to repair the damages which he had sustained. Meanwhile the English sent the city of Viz up the channel, that the English fleet unperceived; but he did not find the Dutch, as he expected. De Ruyter had been seized with a fever; many of the chief officers had fallen into sickness; a contagious distemper was spread through the fleet: and the states thought it necessary to recall them into their harbours, before the enemy could be refitted.

The French King, anxious for his navy, which, so much care and industry, had laboured so much; sent new orders to De Ruyter, to make the best of his way to Fries. That admiral had again the good fortune to pass the English. One ship alone, the Ruby, fell into the hands of the enemy.

While the war continued without any decisive success on either side, a calamity happened to London, which threw the people into great consternation. Fire, breaking out in a baker's house near the bridge, spread itself on all sides with such rapidity, that no efforts could extinguish it, till it laid in ashes a considerable part of the city. The inhabitants, without being able to provide effectually for their relief, were reduced to be spectators of their own ruin; and were pursued from street to street by the flames, which unexpectedly gathered round them. Three days and nights did the fire advance; and it was only by the blowing up of houses that it was at last extinguished. The king and duke used their utmost endeavours to save the people; but the whole industry of all their industry was unsuccessful.—About four hundred streets, and thirteen thousand houses, were reduced to ashes.

The causes of this calamity were evident. The narrow streets of London, the houses built entirely of wood, the dry season, and a violent east wind which blew; these were so many concurring circumstances, which rendered it easy to assign the reason of the destruction that ensued. But the people were not satisfied with this obvious account. Prompted by blind rage, some ascribed the guilt to the republicans, others to the catholics; though it is not easy to conceive how the burning of London could serve the purposes of either party. As the papists were the chief objects of public detestation, the rumour, which threw the guilt on them, was more favourably received by the people. No proof, however, or even presumption, after the strictest inquiry by a committee of parliament, ever appeared to authorize such a calumny; yet, in order to give countenance to the popular prejudice, the inscription engraved by authority on the monument, ascribed this calamity to the actions of King James, by order of King James, when he came to the throne; but after the revolution it was replaced. So credulous, as well as obstinate, are the people, in believing every thing which flatters their prevailing passion!

The fire of London, though at that time a great calamity, has proved in the issue beneficial both to the city and the kingdom. The city was rebuilt in a very little time; and care was taken to make the streets wider and more regular than before. A discretionary power was assumed by the king to regulate the distribution of the buildings, and to fix the use of lath and timber, the materials of which the houses were formerly composed. The necessity was so urgent, and the occasion so extraordinary, that no exceptions were taken at an exercise of authority, which otherwise would have been deemed illegal. Had the king been enabled to carry his power still further, and made the houses rebuilt with perfect regularity, and entirely upon one plan; he had much contributed to the convenience of the town, as well as to the neatness of the city. Great advantages, however, have resulted from the alterations; though not carried to the full length. London became much more healthy after the fire. The plague, which used to break out with such great fury twice or thrice every century, and indeed was always lurking in some corner or other of the city, has scarcely ever appeared since that calamity. The parliament met soon after, and gave the sanction of law to those regulations made by royal authority; as well as appointed commissioners for deciding all such questions of property, as might arise from the fire. They likewise voted a supply of 1,800,000 pounds in levied, partly by a poll, partly by assessments. Though their increased taxes were no procures which could fix on which papiests the burning of London, the general aversion against that sect still prevailed; and complaints were made, probably without much foundation, of its dangerous increased power. To prevent the desire of the commonalty, issued the proclamation for the banishment of all priests and Jesuits; but the bad execution of this, as well as of former edicts, destroyed all confidence in his sincerity, whenever he pretended an amendment toward the catholic religion. Whether suspicions of this nature had diminished the king's popularity, is uncertain; but it appears, that the supply was voted much later than Charles expected, or even than the public necessities seemed to require. The intrigues of the Duke of Buckingham, a man who wanted only steadiness to render him extremely dangerous, had somewhat embarrassed the measures of the court; and this was the first time that the king found any considerable reason to complain of a failure of confidence in this House of Commons. The rising symptoms of ill humour tended, no doubt, to quicken the steps which were already making towards a peace with foreign enemies. According to Charles's hopes, it was sensible, that all the match points, ends for which the war had been undertaken, were likely to prove entirely abortive. The Dutch, even when single, had defended themselves with vigour, and in proportion as they multicated their military drill and preaptations. Though their trade had suffered extremely, their extensive credit enabled them to levy great sums; and while the seamen of England loudly complained of want of pay, the Dutch navy was regularly supplied with money and every thing requisite for its subsistence. As two powerful kings now supported them, every place, from the extremity of Norway to the coasts of Bayonne, was become hostile to the English. And Charles, neither fond of action, nor stimulated by any violent ambition, earnestly sought for means of restoring tranquillity to his people, distrusted with a war, which, being joined with the plague and fire, had proved so disastrous and so costly. The first advances towards an accommodation were made by England. When the king sent for the body of Sir William Berkeley, he intimated to the States his desire of no trouble norchange, and their answer was in the same amiable instructions. Charles, however, to maintain the appearance of superiority, still insisted that the States should treat at London; and they agreed to meet him this compliment so far as concerned themselves; but being being engagéd with two crowned heads, they could not, they said, prevail with these to depart in that respect from their dignity. On a sudden, the king went so far on the other side as to offer

2 The Dutch had spent on the war nearly 40 millions of livres a year, besides a great deal more in ammunitions. The commerce had been carried on with the most great advantage by the English parliament. L'Estrange, 4th of December, 1660. 100 of the sending of ambassadors to the Hague; but this proposal, which seemed honourable to the Dutch, was meant only to divide and distress them, by affording the English an opportunity to carry on cabals with the disaffected party. The offer was therefore rejected; and conferences were made between the English and the Dutch at Paris, where the pretensions of both parties were discussed. The Dutch made equitable proposals; either that all things should be restored to the same condition in which they lay before the war, or, if both sides should be unequal, that the provinces should continue in possession of their present acquisitions. Charles accepted of the latter proposal; and almost every thing was adjusted, except the disputes with regard to the Isle of Breda, the present government of which was formally valuable for its produce of spices. The English had been masters of it; but were dispossessed at the time when the violence were committed against them at Amboyna. Cromwell had stipulated to have it restored; and the Hoolanders, having first entirely destroyed all the spice trees, maintained, that they had executed the treaty, but that the English had been anew expelled during the course of the war. Charles renewed his pretensions to this island; and as the English thought it was not easy to multiply, and seemed to require a long discussion, it was agreed to transfer the treaty to some other place; and Charles made choice of Breda. Local and powerful country were the English ambassadors. They immediately desired, that a suspension of arms should be agreed to, till the several claims should be adjusted: but this proposal, seemingly so natural, was rejected by the English, and the answer was, that Charles, as an active minister, thoroughly acquainted with the characters of princes and the situation of affairs, had discovered an opportunity of striking a blow, which might at once restore to the English the honours of the war, and severely revenge those injuries, which he ascribed to the wanton ambition and injustice of the English. Whatever projects might have been formed by Charles for securing the money granted him by parliament, he had hitherto failed in his intention. The expenses of such vast armaments had exhausted all the supplies; and even a great debt was contracted to the seamen. The king therefore was resolved to save, as far as possible, the last supply of 1,500,000 pounds; and to employ it for payment of his debts, as well those which had been occasioned by the war, as those which he had formerly contracted. He observed that the Dutch had been with great reluctance forced to the war, and that the success of it was not such as to inspire them with great desire of its continuance. The French, he knew, had been engaged into hostilities by no other motive than that of supporting their ally; and as the king of Spain was a great enem of the war, and therefore hostile to the French, it seemed most probable, that they would confer with the English and French. The differences between the parties were so inconsiderable, that the conclusion of peace appeared inadmissible; and nothing but forms, at least some vain points of honour, seemed to remain for the ambassadors at Breda to discuss. In this situation, Charles, moved by an ill-timed frugality, remitted his preparations, and exposed England to one of the greatest affrights which it has ever received. Two small squadrons alone were equipped; and during a war with such potent and mortal enemies, every thing was left almost in the same situation as in times of the most profound tranquillity. De Witt protracted the negotiations at Breda, and hastened the preparations of the Danes. The English offered to him the Thanes under the command of Dr. Ruyter, and threw the English into the utmost consternation. A chain had been drawn across the river Medway; some fortifications had been added to Sheerness and Chatham; but these preparations were unequal to the present necessity. Sheerness was soon taken; nor could it be saved by the valor of Sir Edward Sprague, who defended it. Having the advantage of a spring tide and an entirely wind, the Dutch pressed forward on the English coast; and though fortified by some ships which had been there sunk by orders of the Duke of Chandno, Albermarle. They burned the three ships which lay to guard the chain, the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth. After damaging several vessels, and possessing themselves of the hull of the Royal Charles, which the English had burned, they advanced, with six men of war and five fire-ships, as far as Upnor castle, where they burned the Royal Oak, of his Highness, and the Great James. Captain Douglas, who commanded on board the Royal Oak, perished in the flames, though he had an easy opportunity of escaping. "Never was it known," he said, "that a Douglas had left his post without orders." The Hollanders fell down the Medway without receiving any considerable damage; and it was apprehended, that they might next tide sail up the Thames, and extend their hos- tilities even to the coast. But they were not permitted to do so, and the last ship was sunk at Woolwich, four at Blackwall: platforms were raised in many places, furnished with artillery; the train-bands were called out; and every place was in a violent agitation. The Dutch sailed next to Portsmouth, where they made a fruitless attempt: they met with no better success at Plymouth: they insulted Harwich: they sailed again up the Thames as far as Tilbury, where they were repulsed. The whole coast was in alarm; and had the French taken this opportunity to join the Dutch fleet and to invade England, consequences the most fatal might justly have been apprehended. But Lewis had no intention to push to the victory so near extremities. His interest required that a balance should be kept between the two maritime powers; not that an uncontrolled superiority should be given to either. Great indignation prevailed among the English to see an enemy so unequal, as they considered him, come within such close terms of their coast; and when they had expected totally to subdue, and over whom they had gained many honourable advantages, now of a sudden rise undisputed masters of the ocean, burn their ships in their own harbours, fill every place with confusion, and strike a terror into the nation itself. But hope was not to be de-ceived in all these disasters could be ascribed neither to bad fortune, to the misconduct of admirals, nor to ill behaviour of seamen, but solely to the avarice, at least to the improvi-dence, of that man which was regarded as the greatest symptoms of discontent appeared, and no attempt for an insurrection was made by any of those numerous sectaries, who had been so openly branded for their rebellious principles, and who uprised against their government; for it was known that those persons had been treated with such severity. In the present distress, two expedients were embraced; an army of 12,000 men was suddenly levied; and the par- liament, though it lay under prorogation, was summoned to meet. The houses were very angry, and the only one which the Commons pleased, was an address for breaking the army; which was complied with. This expression of jealousy showed the court what they might expect from that assembly; and it was thought more prudent to pro-pose a convention till winter. But the signing of the treaty at Breda ex- terminated the king from his present difficulties.

The English ambassadors received orders to recede from those demands, which, however frivolous in themselves, could not now be relinquished, without ac- knowledging a superiority in the enemy. Polemore re- mained with the Dutch; satisfaction for the ships, Bon- venture and Good-hope, the pretended grounds of the quarrel, was no longer insisted on: Acquit was yielded to the French. The acquisition of New York, a settlement so important by its situation, was the chief advantage which the English profited from; and the national character of bravery had shone out with lustre, but where the misconduct of the government, especially in the conclusion, had been no less apparent.

To appease the people by some sacrifice Charles's fall.

To appease the people by some sacrifice the royal authority, the king, in concert with both the council and the Commons, resolved to make the king sacrifice Clarendon to popular prejudices, the memory of his past services was not able any longer to delay his fall. The great seal was taken from him, and given to Sir Orlando Bridgeman, by the title of Lord Keeper. Sir Orlando, the treasurer, who, during the winter, had persevered to the utmost in his attachments to the chancellor. The last time he appeared at the council table, he exerted his friendship with a vigour, which neither age nor infirmities could abate. "This man," said be, speaking of Clarendon, "is a true protagonist and an honest Englishman; and while he enjoys power, we are secure of our laws, liberties, and religion. I dread the consequences of his removal.

But the fall of the chancellor was not sufficient to gra- tify the malice of his enemies: his total ruin was resolved on. The Duke of York in vain exerted his interest in his behalf of his father; and the chancellor, in concert with the Commons, and with the privy council, resolved to fall in promoting that violent measure; and no means were thought so proper for ingratiating the court with a par- liament, which had so long been governed by that very minister, who was to be the vicar of the victor of the Revolution. Some popular acts paved the way for the session; and the parliament, in their first address, gave the king thanks for these instances of his goodness, and among the rest, they took care to mention his dismission of Clarendon. The king, in reply, to the breach which he bore ever again employ that nobleman in any public office whatsoever. Immediately the charge against him was opened in the House of Commons by Mr. Seymour, afterwards Sir Edward, and consisted of seventeen articles. The House, without examining particulars, further than hearing general affirmations that all would be proved, immediately imposed a fine of forty thousand pounds on the articles he knew to be either false or frivolous; and such of them as we are less acquainted with, we may fairly presume to be no better grounded. His advising the sale of Dunkirk seems the hottest and the most part of the charge; where a mistake in judgment allowing it to pass, such, where there appear no symptoms of corruption or bad intentions, it would be very hard to impute as a crime to any minister. The king's necessities, which occasioned that measure, was no proof of reason, he charged on Clarendon; and chiefly proceeded from the over-frugal maxim of the parliament itself, in not granting the proper supplies to the crown.

When the impeachments was carried up to the Peers, as it contained an accusation of treason in general, without specifying any particulars, it seemed not a sufficient ground for committing Clarendon to custody. The precedents of Strafford and Laud were not, by reason of the violence of the times, deemed a proper authority; but as the Commons still insisted upon his commitment, it was necessary to appoint a free conference between the Houses. The Lords per se rejected; and the Commons resolved on an obstruction to public justice, and a precedent of evil and dangerous tendency. They also chose a committee to draw up a vindication of their own proceedings.

Clarendon, finding that the popular torrent, united to the violence of power, ran with impetuosity against him, and that a defence, offered to such prejudiced ears, would be entirely ineffectual, thought proper to withdraw. At 6 o'clock he wrote a paper addressed to the House of Lords. He there said, that his fortune, which was but moderate, had been gained entirely by the lawful, avowed profits of his office, and by the voluntary bounty of the king; that during the first years after the restoration he had always concurred in opinion with the other counsellors, men of such reputation that no one could entertain suspicions of their wisdom or integrity; that his credit soon declined, and however he might disapprove some measures, he found it vain to oppose them; that his repugnance to the Dutch war, the source of all the public grievances, was always generally known, as well as his disapprobation of many unhappy steps taken in conducting it; and that whatever pretence might be made of public offences, his real crime, that which had exasperated his powerful enemies, was his frequent opposition to extravagant grants, which the importance of states had extended from his majesty.

It is not necessary to repeat the maxim of the Commons under the application of a label; and by a vote of both Houses, it was condemned to be burned by the hands of the hangman. The parliament next proceeded to exert their legislative power against Clarendon, passed a law for the exclusion of the Cinque Ports from the revenue, and took the title of protector for the reduction of the Protestants, which received the royal assent. He retired into France, where he lived in a private manner. He survived his imprisonment six years; and he employed his leisure chiefly in reducing into order the History of the Civil Wars, for which he had before collected materials. The performance does honour to his memory; and except Whitlocke's Memorials, is the most candid account of those times, composed by any contemporary author.

Clarendon was always a friend to the liberty and constitution of his country. At the commencement of the civil wars, he had entered into the late king's service, and was greatly regarded by the crown and friends of that monarch: he was pursued with unrelenting animosity by the long parliament; he had shared all the fortunes, and directed all the counsels, of the present king during his exile; he had been advanced to the highest trust and offices after the restoration; yet all these circumstances, which might naturally operate with such force, either on resentment, gratitude, or ambition, had no influence on his disposition and principles. It is said, that when he first engaged in the study of the law, his father exhorted him with great earnestness to shun the practice too common in that profession, of straining every point in favour of prerogative and interest; and covering selfish reasonable science to the oppression of liberty; and in the midst of these rational and virtuous counsels, which he reiterated, he was suddenly seized with an apoplexy, and expired in his son's presence. This circumstance gave additional weight to the principality of his character.

The combination of king and subject to oppose so good a minister affords, to men of opposite dispositions, an equal occasion of inveighing against the ingratitude of princes, or ignorance of the people. Charles seems never to have mitigated his resentment against Clarendon; and the rational prejudices pursued him to his retreat in France. A company of English soldiers, being quartered near him, assaulted his house, broke open the doors, gave him a dangerous wound on the head, and would have proceeded to the last extremities, had not their officers, bearing of the violence, happily interposed.

The next expedient which the king embraced to defend himself and public justice, is more deserving of praise; and, had it been steadily pursued, would probably have rendered his reign happy, certainly his memory respected. It is the triple alliance of which Louis XIV; a measure which gave entire satisfaction to the public.

The glory of France, which had long been eclipsed, either by domestic factions, or by the superior force of the Spanish monarchy, began now to break out with great lustre, and to engage the attention of the neighbouring nations. The independent power and munificent spirit of the nobility were subdued: the popular pretensions of the parliament renounced: the moderate party resorted to the objection that a foreign and extensive and fertile country, enjoying every advantage both of climate and situation, was fully peopled with ingenuous and industrious inhabitants; and while the spirit of the nation discovered all the vigour and bravery requisite for great enterprises, it was turned to an entire submission under the will of the sovereign.

The sovereign who now filled the throne was well adapted, by his personal character, to both increase and to avail himself of these advantages. Lewis XIV. endowed with every quality which could enchant the people, possessed many which merit the approbation of men of letters and good-sense. His features were tolerable; he was well proportioned, well formed, and possessed alacrity of his majesty's subjects to be imprisoned against law, in remembrance of various things to which he was addicted, and particularly in preventing the king from being as able to law, as if he had been already restrained from the evil by the force of the law, that he had procured the customs to be formed at under rates for the exportation of certain things, and for the encouragement of the consumption by allowing them to enhance the price of wares, that he had in a short time caused the country to be cleared of the remains of his old company, and passed a bill of conscription, on the points of his office, that he had introduced an arbitrary system into his majesty's plantation, that he had solicited a proposal for the preservation of the . . . prince, and seemed to promise him easy and extensive conquests. The other nations of Europe, feeble or ill governed, were astonished at the greatness of his rising empire, and all of them cast their eyes toward Spain, as the great power that could save them from that subjection with which they seemed to be so nearly threatened.

The animosity which had anciently subsisted between the English and French nations, and which had been suspended for above a century by the terms of Spanish greatness, began to revive and to exert itself. The glory of preserving the balance of Europe, a glory so much founded on justice and humanity, flattered the ambition of England, and seemed to overlook the facts of Spanish greatness. With the prospect of opposing the progress of so hated a rival. The prospect of embracing such measures had contributed, among other reasons, to render the peace of Breda so universally acceptable to the nation. By the death of Philip IV. King of Spain, an inviting opportunity, and some very slender pretences, had been afforded to call forth the ambition of Lewis.

At the treaty of the Pyrenees, when Lewis espoused the Spanish princess, he had renounced every title of succession to every part of the Spanish monarchy; and this renunciation had been couched in the most accurate and most precise terms that language could afford. But on the death of his father, he repudiated the renunciation, and pretended that natural rights, depending on blood and succession, could not be annihilated by any extorted deed or contract. Philip had left a son, Charles II. of Spain, and the Queen of England, a female marrying a foreign prince, she had claimed a considerable province of the Spanish monarchy, even to the exclusion of her brother. By the customs of some parts of Brabant, a female of a first marriage was preferred to a mate of a second, in the succession to private inheritances; and Lewis hence inferred, that his queen had acquired a right to the dominion of that important duchy.

A claim of this nature was more properly supported by military force than by letters of protestation. Lewis appeared on the frontiers of the Netherlands with an army of 40,000 men, commanded by the best generals of the age, and provided with every thing necessary for action. The Spaniards, though they might have foreseen this measure, were totally unprepared. Their towns, without magazines, fortifications, or garrisons, fell into the hands of the French king, as soon as he presented himself before them. Ath, Lisle, Tourcoing, and Avesnes, fell in a few days; and the French army immediately took: and it was visible that no force in the Low Countries was able to stop or retard the progress of the French arms.

The transaction, executed with such celerity and success, gave great alarm to almost every court in Europe. It had been observed with such dignity, or even haughtiness, Lewis, from the time he began to govern, had ever employed all his right in Rome; but, of his ambassador, D'Estrades, the French ambassador, and Watteville, the Spanish, having quarrelled in London, on account of their claims for precedence, the French monarch was not satisfied till Spain sent to Paris a solemn embassy, and promised never more to revive such contests. Crequi, his ambassador at Rome, had met with an affront from the Pope's guards: the Pope, Alexander VII., had been constrained to break his guards, to send his nephew to ask pardon, and to allow a pillar to be erected in Rome in consequence of this affront. The King of England too had experienced the high spirit and unsustaining temper of Lewis. A pretension to superiority in the English flag having been a frequent means of remonstrance, with such vigour, and prepared himself to resist with such courage, that Charles found it more prudent to desert from his vam and antiquated chariot. "The King of England," said Lewis to his ambassador, D'Estrades, "may know my own minister; but I am determined to take the first step. If he demands a treaty, let me be offered the opportunity of settling all things. Every thing appears to me contemptible in comparison of glory." These measures of conduct had given strong indications of his character: but the invasion of Flanders discovered an ambition which, being supported by such overgrown power, menaced the general liberties of Europe.

As no state lay nearer to the danger, none was seized with more terror, than that of England. The Dutch were still engaged, together with France, in a war against England, and Lewis had promised them that he would take no step against Spain without previously informing them: but, contrary to this assurance, he kept a total silence, till on the very point of executing his projects. The remonstrances made at the treaty of the Pyrenees was not valid, it was presumed, that upon the death of the King of Spain, a sickly infant, the whole monarchy would be claimed by Lewis, and that the war would be engaged against his pretensions. Charles, acquainted with these well-grounded apprehensions of the Dutch, had been the more obstinate in insisting on his own conditions at Breda; and by delaying to sign the treaty, had imprudently exposed himself to the signal disgrace which he received at Chatham. De Wit, sensible that a few weeks' delay would be of no consequence in the Low Countries, took this opportunity of striking an important blow, and of finishing the war with honour to himself and to his country.

Negotiations, meanwhile, commenced for the saving of Flanders; but no resistance was made to the French arms. The Spanish ministers informed every where against the flagrant injustice of Lewis's pretensions, and represented it to be the interest of every power in Europe, even more than of Spain itself, to prevent his conquest of the Low Countries. The emperor was unable to prevent the German princes from aiding themselves in his design, and the emperor, by his Diestrian, showed the right of Charles to the republic from making him any open advances, by which she might lose the friendship of France, without requiring any new ally. And though Lewis, drawing a combination of all Europe, had offered terms of accommodation, the Dutch apprehended, lest these, either from the obstinacy of the Spaniards, or the ambition of the French, should never be carried into execution.

Charles resolved, with great prudence, to take the first step towards a confederacy. Sir William Temple, his resident at Brussels, received orders to go secretly to the Hague, and to concert with the States the means of surrounding, engaging, and compelling Charles to come to terms. But the honest and upright conduct of Charles kept that republic from making him any open advances, by which she might lose the friendship of France, without requiring any new ally. it might still be unsafe, in a business of such consequence, to put entire confidence in them: that the French monarch was young, haughty, and powerful; and if treated so imperiously as a manner, would not choose himself to the greater extremes rather than submit: that it was sufficient, if he could be constrained to adhere to the offers which he himself had already made; and if the remaining provinces of the Low Countries could be thereby secured, with which they were at present threatened: and that the other powers, in Germany and the north, whose assistance they might expect, would be satisfied with putting a stop to the French conquests, without pretending to recover the places already lost.

The English minister was content to accept of the terms proposed by the peninsular. Lewis had offered to relinquish all the queen's rights, on condition either of keeping the conquests which he had made last campaign, or of receiving, in lieu of them, Franche-comté, together with Cambray, Aire, and St. Omer. De Wit and Temple founded their treaty upon this proposal. They agreed to offer their mediation to the contending powers, and oblige France to adhere to this alternative, and Spain to accept of it. If Spain refused, they agreed, that France should not prosecute her claim by arms, but leave it entirely to England and Holland to employ force for making the terms effective. The remainder of the Low Countries were thenceforth guaranteed to Spain. A defensive alliance was likewise concluded between Holland and England.

The articles of this confederacy were soon adjusted by such able negotiators, as on the greatest difficulty still remained. By the constitution of the republic, all the towns in all the provinces must give their consent to every alliance; and besides that formality could not be dispensed with in less than two months, it was justly to be dreaded, that the influence of France would obstruct the passing of the treaty in some of the smaller cities. D'Estrées, the French ambassador, a man of abilities, hearing of the league which was on the carpet, treated it lightly; "Six weeks hence," said he, "we shall speak to it." To obviate this difficulty, De Wit had the courage, for the public good, to break through the laws in so fundamental an article; and by his authority, he prevailed with the States-general at once to sign and ratify the league: though they acknowledged that, if that measure should displeasure their constituents, they risked their heads by this irregularity. After sealing, all parties embraced with great cordiality. Temple cried out, At Breda, as friends: here, as brothers. And De Wit added, that now the matter was finished, it looked like a miracle.

Room had been left in the treaty for the accession of Sweden, which was soon after obtained; and thus was concluded in five days the triple league; an event received with equal surprise and approbation by the world. Notwithstanding the unfortunate conclusion of the last war, England now appeared in her proper station, and, by this wise conduct, had recovered all her influence and credit in Europe. Temple likewise received great applause; but to all the complaints made lamen on the occasion, he modestly replied, that to remove things from their centre, or proper element, required force and labour; but that of themselves they easily returned to it.

The French monarch was extremely displeased with this measure. Not only bounds were at present set for his ambition: such a barrier was also raised seems suited for ever improbable. Though his own offer was made to secure the foundation of the treaty, he had prescribed so short a time for the acceptance of it, that he still expected, from the delays and reluctance of Spain, to find some opportunity of eluding it. The court of Madrid showed equal displeasure. To relinquish any part of the Spanish provinces, in lieu of claims so apparently unjust, and these urged with threats of vengeance and haughtiness, inspired the highest expectations of disgust. Often did the Spaniards threaten to abandon entirely the Low Countries, rather than submit to so cruel a mitigation; and they endeavoured, by this menace, to terrify the most powerful into more vigorous measures for their support. But Temple and De Wit were better acquainted with the views and interests of Spain. They knew, that she must still retain the Low Countries, as a bond of connection with the other European powers, who alone, besides the motive of interest, could, in such a case, insures her independence against the pretensions of France. They still urged, therefore, the terms of the triple league, and threatened Spain with war in case of refusal. The pretended consequences of all the powers met at Aix-la-Chapelle, Temple was minister for England; Van Beuningen for Holland; D'Ohima for Sweden.

Spain at last, pressed on all hands, accepted of the submitted offer; but in her very compliance, she gave strong symptoms of ill humour and discontent. It had been apparent, that the Hollandoers, entirely neglecting the honour of the Spanish monarchy, had been anxious only for their own security; and, provided, they could remove Lewis to a distance from their frontier, were more indifferent what progress he made in other places. Sensible of these views, the queen-regent of Spain resolved still to keep them in an anxiety, which might for the future be the foundation of an union more intimate than they were willing at present to enter into. Franche-comté, by a vigorous and well-concerted plan of the French king, Aix-la-Chapelle had been conquered, in fifteen days, during a rigorous season, and in the midst of winter. She chose, therefore, to require in return the conquest of Flanders. Spain, during the last campaign, by this means Lewis extended his garrisons into the heart of the Low Countries; and a very feeble barrier remained to the Spanish dyke.

But notwithstanding the advantages of his situation, the French monarch could entertain small hopes of ever extending his conquests on that quarter which lay the most exposed to his ambition, and where his acquisitions were of most importance. The triple league guaranteed the remaining provinces of Spain; and the emperor and other powers of Germany, whose interest seemed to be intimately concerned, were invited to enter into the same confederacy. Spain herself, having about this time, under the mediation of Charles, made peace on equal terms with Portugal, might be expected to exert more vigour and opposition to her haughty and triumphant rival. The great satisfaction expressed in England, on account of the counsels now embraced by the court, promised the hearty concurrence of parliament in every measure which could be proposed for opposition to the grandeur of France. And thus all Europe seemed to rejoice herself with security under the wings of that powerful confederacy, which had been so happily formed for her protection. It is now time to give some account of the state of affairs in Scotland and in Ireland.

The Scottish nation, though they had never been subject to the arbitrary power of their prince, had hot very imperfect notions of law and liberty: and scarcely in any age had they ever enjoyed an administration which had confined itself within the proper boundaries. By their final union alone with England, they once hated adversary, they have happily attained the experience of a government perfectly regular, and exempt from all violence and injustices. Charles, from his aversion to business, had intrusted the affairs of that country to his ministers, particularly Middleton; and these could not forbear making very extraordinary stretch of authors.

There had been much, much more, to the-like of Lord Lorne to Lord Duffus, in which a little too plainly, but very truly, he complained, that his enemies had endeavoured by falsehood to propound the king against him. But he said, that he had now discovered them, he had appeased them, and had gained the benefit, meaning the Earl of Clarendon, upon whom the chief of them depended. This letter was produced before the parliament; and Lorne was tried upon an old, tyrannical, absurd law and Leas, the clause in which was supposed to oblige the subjects to the king, or create in him an ill opinion of them. He was condemned to die; but Charles was much displeased with the sentence, and granted him a pardon.

A Bill was carried in parliament, that twelve persons without crime, witness, trial, or accuser, should be declared incapable of all trust or office; and to render this injustice more egregious, it was agreed, that these persons should be named by ballot; a method of voting which several republics had adopted at elections, in order to prevent faction and intrigue; but which could serve only as a cover to malice and iniquity in the inflicting of punishments. Lauderdale, Crawford, and Sir Robert Murray, among others, were named; but the king, who disapproved of this injustice, refused his assent. An act was passed against all persons, who should move the king for restoring the children of those who were attainted by parliamentary or obstinate opinions.

An act was passed against all persons, who should move the king for restoring the children of those who were attainted by parliamentary or obstinate opinions, for grace and mercy. No penalty was affixed; but the act was but the more violent and tyrannical on that account. The court-lawyers had established it as a maxim, that the assigning of a punishment was a limitation of the crown; whereas a law, forbidding anything, though without a penalty, made the offenders criminal. And in that case, they determined, that the punishment was arbitrary; only that it could not extend to life. Middleton as commissioner passed this act; though he had no instructions for that purpose.

An act of indemnity passed; but at the same time it was voted, that all those who had offended during the late disorder, should be subjected to fines; and a new parliament was appointed for imposing them. These proceeded without any regard to some equitable rules, which the king had prescribed to them. The most obnoxious constructions of this act were, to take away the whole wealth of men's riches, or of the degrees of their guilt: no proofs were produced: inquiries were not so much as made: but as fast as information was given in against any man, he was marked down for a particular fine; and all was translated in a secret committee. When the list was read in parliament, exceptions were made to several: some had been under age during the civil wars; some had been abroad. But it was still replied, that a proper time would come, and every name would be heard in their own defence. The only intention it was, said, of setting the fines was, that such persons should have no benefit by the act of indemnity, unless they paid the sum demanded: every one to stand upon his own foot; in which, the benefit of the indemnity, might do it at his peril. It was well known, that no one would dare so far to set at defiance so arbitrary an administration. The king wrote to the council, ordering them to supersede the levying of these fines. But now the reason which found means, during some time, to elude these orders. And at last, the king obliged his ministers to compound for half the sums which had been imposed. In all these transactions, and in most of those which proceeded from the mediating of the king, interpolated to protect the Scots from the oppressions which their own countrymen, employed in the ministry, were desirous of exercising over them.

But the chief circumstance, whence were derived all the subsequent tyranny and disorders in Scotland, was the execution of the laws for the establishment of episcopacy; a measure of government, to which a great part of the nation had entertained an insurmountable aversion. The rights of patrons had for some years been abolished; and the power of electing ministers had been vested in the kirk-session, and lay-elders. It was now enacted, that all incumbents, who had been admitted into this title, should receive a presentation from the patron, and should be instituted anew by the bishop, under the penalty of deprivation. The more rigid presbyterians concerted measures among themselves, and refused obedience: they imagined that their number would be reduced. Three hundred and fifty parishes, above a third of the kingdom, were at once declared vacant. The western counties chiefly were obstinate, who on this occasion, and on the appeal against these intruders, who were their living under such invidious circumstances, and who took no care, by the regularity of their manners, to soften the prejudices entertained against them. Even most of those who retained their livings by compliance, fell under the imputation of hypocrisy, either by their speeches, or by their votes and acts. Wallois, as was natural, gave his assent to the new model of ecclesiastical government, which they had acknowledged; or, on the other hand, by declaring that their former abstinence in presbytery and the covenant had been the result of violence and necessity. And as Middleton and the new ministry indulged themselves in great riot and disorder, to which the nation had been little accustomed, an opinion universally prevailed, that any form of worship, offered by such hands, must be profane and impious. The people, notwithstanding their discontents, were resolved to give no handle against them, by the least symptom of mutiny or sedition; but this submissive disposition, instead of procuring a mitigating of the rigours, was made use of as an argument for continuing the same measures, which, by their vigour, it was pretended, had produced so prompt an obedience. The king, however, was disgusted with the violence of Middleton; and he made Rothines commissioner in his place. This nobleman was already president of the council; and soon after was made lord-keeper and treasurer. Lauderdale still continued secretary of state, and his brother commissioner of the great Seal.

Affairs remained in a peacable state, till the severe law was made in England against conventicles. The Scottish parliament imitated that violence, by passing a law. A council provided for the prosecution of any attempt, which was appointed by the privy-council, for executing this rigorous law, and for the regulation of ecclesiastical affairs. But even this court, illegal as it might be deemed, was much preferable to the method next adopted. Military force was let loose by the council. Wherever the people had generally broken their churches, the guards were quartered throughout the country. Sir James Turner commanded them, a man whose natural temper of severity was often inflamed by the use of strong liquors. He went about among them from one end of the kingdom to another; he spread abroad the fear of those who absented themselves from church, or were supposed to frequent conventicles. Without any proof or legal conviction, he demanded a fine from them, and quartered soldiers on the suspected delinquents, till he received payment. As an insurrection was dreaded during the Dutch war, new forces were levied, and intrusted to the command of Dalziel and Drummond; two officers who had served the king during the civil wars, and had afterwards been appointed to the council; to whom the king had increased the native cruelty of their disposition. A full career was given to their tyranny by the Scottish ministry. Representations were made to the king against these enormities, which were repeated till the king was alarmed by the moderation of the king, interposed to protect the Scots from the oppressions which their own countrymen, employed in the ministry, were desirous of exercising over them.

This licentiousness of the king's came too late to remedy the disorders. The people, inflamed with bigotry, and irritated by ill usage, rose in arms. They were instigated by Guthrie, Semple, and other preachers. They surprised Turner in Dumfries, and resolved to have him put to death; but finding that his orders, which fell into their hands, were more violent than his execution of them, they spared his life. At Lanercost, when many prayers, they renewed the covenant, and engaged in the service of Russia, when they professed all submission to the king; they desired only the re-establishment of presbytery and of their former ministers. As many gentlemen of their party had been confined on suspicion; Wallow and Lord Galloway, who had served, but in no high rank, were intrusted by the populace with the command. Their force never exceeded two thousand men; and though the country in general bore them favourably, and the common people resided at Lanercost, that the rebels could expect no further accession of numbers. Dalziel took the field to oppose their progress. Their number was now diminished to 800; and these having advanced near Edinburgh, attempted to find their way back into the west by Pentland Hills. They were astonished by the king's forces. Finding that they could not escape, they stopped their march. Their clergy endeavoured to infuse courage into them. After singing some psalms, the rebels turned on the enemy; and being assisted by the advantage of the ground, they received the first charge very resolutely. But that was all the action: immediately they fell into disorder, and fled for their lives. About forty were killed on the spot, and a hundred and thirty taken prisoners. But, as they were favoured by the light, and by the weakness, and even by the pty, of the king's troops, made their escape.

The oppressions which these people had suffered, the debacles into which they were driven from their innocent behaviour during the massacre, made them the objects of compassion. Yet were the king's ministers, particularly Sharpe, resolved to take severe vengeance. Ten were hanged on one gibbet at Edinburgh; thirty-five before their own doors in different places. These criminals might all have saved their lives, if they would have renounced the covenant. The executions were going on, when the king put a stop to them. He said, that blood enough had already been shed; and he wrote a letter to the privy council, in which he ordered that such of the prisoners as should simply promise to obey the laws for the future, should be set at liberty, and that the incorrigible should be burnt at the stake. This letter brought in Lord Bertie, Archbishop of Glasgow: but not being immediately received by the council he Sharpe the president, one Macaulay in the interval been put to the torture, under which he confessed. He beheld this, and, with a cheval Tarell, supper, and stars; farewell, world, and fear; farewell, weak and frail body; farewell, eternity;
and farewell, angels and saints; farewell, Saviour of the world, and farewell, God, the judge of all!" Such were his last words; and these animated speeches he uttered with an accent and manner, which struck all the bystanders with astonishment.

The settlement of Ireland after the remonstrance, was a work of greater difficulty than that of England, or even of Scotland. Not only the power, during the former usurpations, had there been vested in the king's enemies: the whole property, in a manor of the kingdom had also been changed; and it became necessary to redress, but with as little violence as possible, many grievous hardships and inconveniences, which were complained of.

The Irish catholics had, in 1649, concluded a treaty with Ormond, the king's lieutenant, in which they had stipulated pardon for their past rebellion, and had engaged, der certain conditions, to assist the royal cause: and though the violence of the priests and the bigotry of the people, generally, had, in a great measure, nullified this treaty; yet were there many, who, having straitly, at the hazard of their lives, adhered to it, seemed on that account well entitled to reap the fruits of their loyalty.
Unfeigned, having without distinction expelled all the native Irish from the three provinces of Munster, Leinster, and Ulster, had confined them to Connacht and the county of Clare; and among those who had thus been forfeited, were many whose innocence was altogether questionable. Several protestants, likewise, and Ormond among the rest, had all along opposed the Irish rebellion;
and yet having afterwards embraced the king's cause against the parliament, they were all of them attained by Cromwell. The king may at certain times have, from the commencement of the insurrection, served in Ireland, and who, because they would not desert the king, had been refused all their arms by the English commonwealth.

To all these unhappy sufferers some justice seemed to be due: but the difficulty was to find the means of dressing such great and extensive iniquities. Almost all the valuable parts of Ireland had been measured out and divided, either to the adventurers, who had lent money to the parliament for the suppression of the Irish rebellion, or to the soldiers who had received land in lieu of their arms. These could not be disposed of, because they were the most powerful and only armed part of Ireland;
and because it was requisite to favour them in order to support the protestant and English interest in that kingdom;
and because they had generally, with a seeming zeal and alacrity, concurred in the king's restoration. The king, therefore, issued a proclamation, in which he promised to maintain their settlement, and at the same time engaged to give redress to the innocent sufferers. There was a quantity of land as yet undivided in Ireland; and from this and some other funds, it was thought possible for the king to fulfill his engagements, and thereby receive satisfaction. A court of claims was erected, consisting altogether of English commissioners, who had no connexion with any of the parties, into which Ireland was divided. Before last these were rewarded by a most extensive restitution on account of their innocence; and the commmissioners had found leisure to examine only six hundred.
It already appeared, that, if all these were to be restored,
the funds, whence the adventurers and soldiers must get rewards, would fall short of giving them any tolerable satisfaction. A great alarm and anxiety seized all ranks of men: the hopes and fears of every party were excited:
these eagerly grasped at recovering their paternal inherances. These were requisite to maintain their new acquisitions.

The Duke of Ormond was created lord-lieutenant:
being the only person, whose prudence and equity could be placed in the situation, it was but natural to place him in a seat, which had been vacant at Dublin; and as the lower House was almost entirely chosen by the soldiers and adventurers, who still kept possession, it was extremely favourable to that interest. The king gave this restorator of the constitution great importance.

An insurrection was projected, together with the fall of the castle of Dublin, by some of the disbanded soldiers; but this design was happily defeated by the vigilance of Ormond. Some of the criminals were punished.
Blood, however, was shed, and many of them, escaped into England.

But affairs could not long remain in the confusion and uncertainty into which they had fallen. All parties seemed willing to abate somewhat of their pretensions, in order to attain something. But the king interfered with the authority for that purpose. The soldiers and adventurers agreed to relinquish a third of their possessions; and as they had purchased their lands at very low prices, they had reason to think themselves favoured by this concession.
All those, who had been attainted on account of their alliance to the king, were restored, and some of the innocent Irish. It was a hard situation, that a man was obliged himself innocent in order to recover possession of the estate which he and his ancestors had enjoyed; but the hardship was augmented, by the difficult conditions annexed to this proof. If the person had ever lived in the quarters of the rebels, he was not admitted to attain his possession. Ireland had a new title, which was supposed to have been a rebel. The heinous guilt of the Irish nation made men the more readily overlook any iniquity, which might fall on individuals; and it was concluded, that, though it be always the interest of all good governments to prevent injustice, it is not always possible to remedy it, after it has had a long course, and has been attended with great successes.

Ireland began to attain a state of some compomise
when it was disturbed by a violent act, passed by the English parliament, which prohibited the importation of Irish cattle into England. Ormond represented strongly against the law. He said, that the present trade, carried on between Ireland and England, was the advantage of the former kingdom, which received only provisions, or rude materials, in return for every species of manufacture: that if the cattle of Ireland were prohibited, the inhabitants of that island had no other commodity by which they could pay England for their importations, and must have recourse to other nations for a supply: that the industrious inhabitants of England, if deprived of Irish provisions, would, in a short time, grow cheap, would be obliged to augment the price of labour, and thereby render their manufactures too dear to be exported to foreign markets:
that the indolent inhabitants of Ireland, finding provisions fall almost to nothing, would never be induced to labour, but would perpetuate to all generations their native sloth

w Weems's History, vol. i. p. 258. 8 In 1666.
and barbarism: that by cutting off almost entirely the trade between the kingdoms, all the natural bonds of union were dissolved, and nothing remained to keep the Irish in their duty but force and violence: and that, by reducing that kingdom to their own poverty, it would be even rendered incapable of maintaining that military power, by which, during its well-grounded discontents, it must necessarily be retained in subjection.

The king was so much impressed with the justness of these reasons, that he used all his interest to oppose the bill, and he openly declared, that he could not give his assent to it with a safe conscience. But the Commons were resolved in their determination; and the mandates of England, which had fallen of late years, which had been ascribed entirely to the importation of Irish cattle: several intrigues had contributed to inflame that prejudice, particularly those of Buckingham and Ashley, who were desirous of giving Ormonde disturbance in his government: and the spirit of tyranny, of which nations are as susceptible as individuals, had extremely animated the English to exert their superiority over their dependent state. No affair could be conducted with greater violence than this was by the Commons. They even went so far in the preamble of the bill, as to declare the importation of Irish cattle to be a nuisance. By this expression they gave scope to their passion, and at the same time buried the king's prerogative, by which he might himself elected to dispense with a far so full of injustice and bad policy. The Lords expounded the word; but as the king was sensible that no supply would be given by the Commons, unless they confined himself within the limits of law, he obliged both to employ his interest with the Peers for making the bill pass, and to give the royal assent to it. He could not, however, forbear expressing his displeasure at the jealousy entertained against him, and at the intention which the Commons discovered of rethrenching his prerogative.

This law brought great distress for some time upon the Irish; but it had the advantage of applying with greater industry to manufactures, and has proved in the issue beneficial to that kingdom.

Since the restoration, England had attained a situation which had never been experienced in any former period of her government, and which seemed the only one that could fully satisfy, at once, her tranquillity and her liberty: the king was in continual want of supply from the parliament; and he seemed willing to accommodate himself to that dependent situation. Instead of reviving those claims of prerogative, so strenuously insisted on by his predecessors, Charles had strictly confined himself within the limits of law, and had courted, by every art of popularity, the affection of his subjects. Even the severities, however blameable, which he had exercised against nonconformists, are to be considered as expedients by which he strove to ingratiate himself with that party which predominated in parliament. But notwithstanding these promising appearances, there were many circumstances which kept the government from resting steadily on that bottom on which it was placed. The crown, having lost almost all its ancient dependents, relied entirely on voluntary grants of the people; and the Commons, not fully accustomed to this new situation, were not yet disposed to supply with sufficient liberality the necessities of the crown. They insisted too strongly on the example of their predecessors in a rigid frugality of public money; and neither sufficiently considered the indigent condition of their prince, nor the general state of Europe; where every nation, by its increase both of magnificence and force, had made great additions to all public expenses. Some considerable sums, indeed, were bestowed on Chatham, and the patronage of the regent was an important advantage to Charles; though the consciousness of ancient maxims, loudly upbraided the Commons with prodigality: but if we may judge by the example of a later period, when the government has become more regular, and the luxuriance of its parts has been more happily adjusted, the parliaments of this reign seem rather to have merited a contrary reproach.

The natural consequence of the poverty of the crown was, besides feeding the transactions of the courtiers, a continual uncertainty in his domestic administration. No one could answer with any tolerable assurance for the measures of the House of Commons. Few of the members were attached to the court by any other hand than that of inclination. Royallists, indeed, in their principles, but unexperienced in business, they lay exposed to every rumour or insinuation; and were driven by momentary gusts or currents, no less than the populace themselves. Even the attempts made to gain an ascendant over them by offices, and, as it is believed, by bribes and pensions, were apt to operate in a manner contrary to what was intended by the ministers. The novelty of the practice conveyed a general distrust, and, just alarm; while, at the same time, the poverty of the crown rendered this influence very limited and precarious.

The character of Charles was all fitted to remedy those defects in the constitution. He acted in the administration of public affairs as if he were a sovereign, rather than a minister; and in the carriage of his conduct, he lost that authority which could alone bestow constancy on the fluctuating resolutions of the parliament. His expenses too, which sometimes, perhaps, exceeded the proper bounds, were directed more by inclination than by policy; and while they increased his dependence on the parliament, they were not calculated so as to satisfy either the interested or disinterested part of that assembly.

The parliament met, after a long adjournment of February, and Charles promised himself every parliament, thing from the attachment of the Commons. All his late measures had been calculated to acquire the good will of his people; and, above all, the triple league, it was hoped, would be able to effect all the disagreeable impressions left by the unhappy conclusion of the Dutch war. But a new attempt made by the court, and a laudable one, to us, lost him, for a time, the effect of all these endeavours. Buckingham, who was in great favour with the king, and carried on many intrigues among the Commons, had also endeavoured to subvert the constitution, and those nonconformists; and he now formed a scheme, in concert with the lord keeper, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, and the chiefjustices, Sir Matthew Hale, two worthy patriots, to put an end to those severities under which these?religionists had so long laboured. It was proposed to reconcile the presbyterians by a comprehension, and to grant a toleration to the independents and other sectaries. Favour seems not, by this scheme, as by others embraced during the present reign, to have been intended the Catholics: yet were the zealous Commons so disgusted, that they could not be prevailed on even to give the king thanks for the triple league, however laudable that measure was then, and has ever since been. They immediately voted an address for a proclamation against conventicles. Their request was complied with; but as the king still dropped some hints of his desire to reconcile his protestant subjects, the Commons passed a very undiscriminated, that no man should bring into the House any bill of that nature. The king in vain reiterated his solicitations for supply; represented the necessity of equipping a fleet; and even offered, that the money which they should grant should be collected and issued for that purpose by commissioners appointed by the House. Instead of complying, the Commons voted an inquiry into all the miscarriages during the late war; the shackling of sail after the duke's victory from false orders given by Tilly, and the disbanding of the forces at Bergen, the division of the fleet under Prince Rupert and Albemarle, the disgrace at Chatham. Brounker was expelled the House, and ordered to be impeached. Commissioner Pet, who had neglected orders issued for the security of Chatham, met with the same fate. These impeachments were never prosecuted. The House at length, having been indulged in all their prejudices, were prevailed with to vote the king three hundred and ten thousand pounds, by an imposition on wine and other liquors; after which they were adjourned.

16th of May. But the king, besides being retarded by the disgust of the Commons against the tolerating maxims of the court, met with obstructions this session from a quarrel between the two Houses. Skinner, a rich merchant in London, having suffered some injuries from the conduct of the Indian company, and the matter by petition before the House of Lords, by whom he was relieved in costs and damages to the amount of five thousand pounds. The Commons voted, that the Lords, in taking cognizance of this affair, originally, without any appeal from inferior courts, had acted in a manner not agreeable to the laws of the land, and tending to deprive the subject of the right, ease, and benefit due to him by these laws; and that Skinner, in prosecuting the suit after this manner, had infringed the privileges of the Commons: for which offence they ordered him to be taken into custody. Some conferences ensued between the Houses: where the Lords were tenacious of their rule of judicature, and maintained that the method in which they had exercised it was quite regular. The Commons rose into a great ferment; and went so far as to vote, that "whoever should be aiding or abetting in putting in execution any order or sentence of the Lords, commissioners of the East India company, should be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and an infringer of the privileges of the House of Commons." They resolved also, that it would be his duty to vote, to find any one who would venture to incur their indignation. The proceedings indeed of the Lords seem in this case to have been unusual, and without precedent. But the motion of the king necessitated him again on 9th of October, to assemble the parliament, who showed some disposition to relieve him. The price, however, which he must pay for this indulgence, was his yielding to new laws against conventicles. His compliance in this particular contributed more to gain the Commons, than all the pompous pretences of supporting the triple alliance, that popular measure by which he expected to remove the danger of his party. The quartering of the French on the houses was revoked; and as the Commons had voted only four hundred thousand pounds, with which the king was not satisfied, he thought proper, before they had carried their vote into a law, to prorogue them. The only business which was then hinted was the receiving of the report of the committee appointed for examining the public accounts. On the first inspection of this report, there appears a great sum, no less than a million and a half, unaccounted for; and the natural inference is, that the king had much abused the trust reposed in him by parliament. But a more accurate inspection of particulars serves, in a great measure, to remove this imputation. The king, indeed, went so far as to tell the parliament from the throne, 4 That he had fully informed himself of that matter, and did affirm, that no part of those monies which they had given him had been diverted to others, but, on the contrary, besides having a very great sum had been raised out of his standing revenue and credit, and a very great debt contracted; and all for the war." Though artifical pretences have often been employed by kings in their speeches to parliament, and by the Commons, to give them a kind of confidence to suspect him of a direct lie and falsehood. He must have had some reasons, and perhaps not unpleasable ones, for this affirmation, of which all his hearers, as they had the accounts lying before them, were at that time competent judges. 5

The method which all parliaments had hitherto followed was, to vote a particular sum for the supply, without any distinction, or any appropriation to particular services. So long as the demands of the crown were small and casual, no great inconveniences arose from this practice. But as all the measures of government were now changed, it must be acknowledged, that a certain degree of accuracy in the method of public money, this inaccurate method of proceeding, by exposing him to suspicion, was prejudicial to him. If he were inclined to act otherwise, it was equally burdensome to the people. For these reasons, a contrary practice, during the late reigns, has been constantly followed by the Commons.

When the parliament met after the prorogation, they entered anew upon the business of supply, and granted the king an additional duty, during eight years, of twelve pounds on each ton of Spanish wine imported, eight on each ton of French. A law also passed, empowering him to sell the fish-farm rents; the last remnant of the prerogatives, by which the ancient kings of England had been supported. By this expedient, he obtained some supply for his present necessities, but left the crown, if possible, still more dependent than before. How much money might be raised by these sales, is uncertain; but it could not be near one million eight hundred thousand pounds; the sum assigned by some writers. 6

The act against conventicles passed, and received the royal assent. It bears the appearance of mitigating the former severity of that law, by establishing a spirit, which had broken almost every session during this parliament, it was not intended as any favour to the nonconformists. Experience probably had taught, that laws of this kind were easy, after they were once established, to be executed. By this act the hearer in a conventicle (that is, in a dissenting assembly, where more than five were present, besides the family) was fined five shillings for the first offence in his family, and the penalties against the bounds for the first offence, forty for the second. The person, in whose house the conventicle met, was amerced a like sum with the preacher. One clause is remarkable; that, if any dispute should arise with regard to the interpretation of any part of the act, the judges should always explain the doubt in the sense least favourable to conventicles, it being the intention of parliament to restrict them. Such was the zel of the Commons, that they violated the plainest and most established maxims of civil policy, which require that, in all criminal prosecutions, favour should always be given to the prisoner.

The king had so well remained a ground of quarrel between the two houses; but the king prevailed with the Peers to accept of the expedient proposed by the Commons, that a general raze should be made of all the transactions with regard to that disputed question.

Some attempts were made by the king to effect a union between England and Scotland; though they were too feeble to remove all the difficulties which obstructed that useful and important undertaking. Commissioners were appointed to meet, in order to regulate the conditions; but the design, chiefly by the intrigues of Lauderdale, soon after came to nothing.

The king, at this time, began frequently to attend the debates of the House of Peers. He said, that they amused him, and that he found them no less entertaining than a play. But deeper designs were suspected. As he seemed to interest himself extremely in the Reign of Lord Roxburghe, who had obtained a divorce from his wife on the accusation of adultery, and applied to parliament for leave to marry again; people imagined, that Charles intended to make a precedent of the case, and that some other people

4 The Abstract of the report of the House committee (on that committee was called) was first published by Mr. Ralph, vol. 1. p. 277. from Lord Rochford's prayer to the House, on this matter. Where we find the substance of the whole affadgment of the committee. For on which day, the king, in the handwriting of the day, said, in effect, that the king should not be left in ignorance of any proceedings whatever, and that he would not suffer the Commons to make any attempts to obstruct the king in the execution of his authority. 5 He was pleased to add, that the king had employed certain persons very well conversant in business, who had acquitted themselves with much satisfaction to the House. 6 Mr. Carter, in his Vindication of the Act of the First of Bynander 1670. where Launder Burnet, p. 49. says that the annual revenue of England was above one hundred thousand pounds, and his reasons appear well founded.
tence would be found for getting rid of the queen. Many proposals to this purpose, it is said, were made by Buckingham; but the king, how little scrupulous soever in some respects, was incapable of any action harsh or barbarous; and he always rejected every scheme of this nature. A defunct department of such intentions was observed, had, at this time, begotten a coldness between the two royal brothers.

We now come to a period, when the king's counsels, which had hitherto, in the main, been good, though segre-gent and fluctuating, became, during some time, remarkably bad, or even criminal; and breeding incurable jealousies in all men, were followed by such consequences as had almost destroyed the confidence of all prudent people. Happily, the same negligence still attended him; and, as it had lessened the influence of the good, it also diminished the effect of the bad, measures which he embraced.

It was remarked, that the committee of council, established for foreign affairs, was entirely changed; and that Prince Rupert, the Duke of Ormond, Secretary Trevor, and Lord-keeper Bridgeham, men in whose honour the nature of his motions, and his incapacity, was confessed, were too little reflection to any deliberations. The whole secret was intrusted to five persons, Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale. These men were known by the name of the cabal, a name which the initial letters of their names happened to compose. Never was there a more dangerous ministry in England, nor one more noted for pernicious counsels.

Their characters. Lord Ashley, soon after known by the name of Earl of Shaftesbury, was one of the most remarkable characters of the age, and the chief spring of all the succeeding movements. During his early youth, he had engaged in the late king's party; but being disgusted with some measures of Prince Maurice, he soon deserted to the parliament. He insinuated himself into the confidence of Cromwell; and, as he had great influence with the presbyterians, he was serviceable in supporting his policies, with his secret influence. He employed the same credit, in promoting the restoration, and on that account both deserved and acquired favour with the king. In all his changes, he still maintained the character of never betraying those friends whom he dessired; and whichever party he joined, his great capacity and singular talents soon gained him their confidence, and enabled him to take the lead among them. No station could satisfy his ambition, no fatigue were insuperable to his task. Notwithstanding his great and solid acquirements of fact, he surmounted all sense of shame: and relying on the subtility of his contrivances, he was not startled with enterprises the most hazardous and most criminal. His body framed for the great, shone out in an eminent degree; and amidst all his furious passions, he possessed a sound judgment of business, and still more of men. Though fitted by nature for beginning and pushing the greatest undertakings, he was never able to conduct any to a happy period; and his eminent abilities, by reason of his insatiable desires, were equally dangerous to himself, to the prince, and to the people.

The Duke of Buckingham possessed all the advantages, which a graceful person, a high rank, a splendid fortune, and a lively wit could bestow; but by his wild conduct, unrestrained either by prudence or principle, he found means to render himself in the end odious and even insignificant. The least interest could make him abandon his honour; the smallest pleasure could seduce him from his interest; the most frivolous caprice was sufficient to counterbalance his pleasure. By his want of secrecy and constancy, he destroyed his character in public life; by his contempt of order and economy, he dissipate his private fortune; by riot and debauchery, he ruined his health; and he remained at last as incapable of doing hurt, as he had ever been little desirous of doing good, to mankind.

The Earl, soon after created Duke, of Lauderdale, was not defective in nature, and still less in acquired, talents; but neither was his address graceful for his understanding just. His principles, or more properly speaking his prejudices, were obstinate, but usable to restrain his ambition; his ambition was still less dangerous than the tyranny and violence of his temper. An implacable enemy, but a lukewarm friend; insatiable to his inferiors, but affected to his superiors; though in his whole character there was an almost disdainful air of dispute about him, the king, he had the fortune, beyond any other minister, to maintain, during the greater part of his reign, an ascendant over him.

The talents of the parliamentary eloquence and intrigue had raised Sir Thomas Clifford; and his daring impetuous spirit gave him weight in the king's councils. Of the whole cabal, Arlington was the least dangerous, either by character or institutions, for his capacity was but moderate; and his intentions were good, though he wanted courage and integrity to persevive in them. Together with Temple and Bridgeham, he had been a great promoter of the triple league; but he threw himself, with equal alacrity, into opposite measures, when he found them agreeable to his master. Clifford and he were secretly catholics: Shaftesbury, though addicted to astrology, was reckoned a deist: Buckingham had been a great lord-keeper, and great zealot for the government; Lauderdale had long been a bigoted and furious presbyterian; and the opinions of that sect still kept possession of his mind, how little soever they appeared in his conduct.

The dark counsels of the cabal, though, from the first they gave anxiety to all men of reflection, were not thoroughly known but by the event. Such seem to have been the views which they, in concurrence with some catholics, to whom the earl of their sovereign, suggested to the king and the duke, and which these princes too greedily embraced. They said, that the parliament, though the spirit of party, for the present, attached them to the crown, were still of the party to those powers and privileges which their predecessors had usurped from the sovereign: that after the first flow of kindness was spent, they had discovered evident symptoms of discontent; and that he, if he wished to maintain all the authority which they yet retained, and still more; those pretensions which it was easy for them in a moment to revive: that they not only kept the king in dependence by means of his precarious revenue, but had never discovered a suitable generosity, even in those temporary supplies which they granted him: that it was high time for the prince to rouse himself from his lethargy, and to recover that authority which his predecessors, during so many years, had principally enjoyed; that the misfortune of his father was the not having formed any close connection with foreign princes, who, on the breaking out of the rebellion, might have found their interest in supporting him; that he, on his part, had the means of integrating into so many weaker potentates, who themselves stood in need of the king's protection, could never serve to maintain, much less augment, the royal authority; that the French monarch alone, so generous a prince, and by blood so nearly allied to the king, would be found both able and willing, if gratified in his ambition, to defend the common cause of kings against usurping subjects; that a war, undertaken against Holland by the united force of two such mighty potentates, would prove an easy enterprise, and would serve all the purposes which were aimed at: that, under pretence of that war, it would not be difficult to levy a military force without which, during the prevalence of republican principles among his subjects, the king would only expect to defend his prerogative: that his naval power might be maintained, partly by the supplies, which, on other pretences, would previously be obtained from parliament; partly by subsidies from France; partly by caprures, which might easily be made on that oppulent republic: that, in such a situation, attempts to recover the lost authority of the crown would be attended with success; nor would any malcontents dare to resist a prince so fortified by so powerful an alliance; or, if they did, they would only draw more certain ruin on themselves and on their cause: and that, by subduing the States, a great step would be made towards a reformacion of the government; since it was apparent, that that republic, by its fame and grandeur, fortified, in its factious subjects, their attachment to what they vainly termed their civil and religious liberties.

These suggestions happened fatally to concur with all the inclinations and prejudices of the king; his desire of more extensive authority, his propensity to the catholic religion, his jealousy for money. He seemed like to have a second reign with him, without opposition, to conquer Flanders, provided that prince would engage to furnish him with ten thousand infantry, and a suitable number of cavalry, in case of any rebellion. As no danger forebodes at this time appeared, we are left to conjecture, from this incident, what opinion Charles had conceived of the factious disposition of his people.

Even during the time when the triple alliance was the most zealously cultivated, the king never seems to have been entirely cordial in those salutary measures, but still to have cast a longing eye towards the French alliance. Clifford, who had much of his confidence, said imprudently, "I understand all this joy, we must have a second reign with Holland." The accession of the emperor to that alliance had been refused by England on frivolous pretences. And many unfriendly civilities were raised against him which were referred to Burton and the conduct of the East India company.1 But about April, 1669, the strongest symptoms appeared of those fatal measures which were afterwards more openly pursued.

The king's secretaries of state, came to Temple, and told him, that he paid him a visit as a friend, not as a minister. The occasion was, to acquaint him with a conversation which he had lately had with Puffendorf the Swedish agent, who had passed quite away from Paris to his way in London. The French ministers, Puffendorf said, had taken much pains to persuade him, that the Swedes would very soon find their account in those measures which they had lately embraced; that Spain would fail them in all her promises of subsidies; nor would Holland alone be able to support them: that England would certainly fail them, and had already adopted counsels directly opposite to those which by the triple league she had bound herself to pursue; and that the resolution was out the less fixed and certain, because the secret was as yet communicated to very few, either in the French or English court. When Puffendorf seemed incredulous, Turrene showed him a letter from de Croux, the French minister at London; in which, after mentioning the success of his negotiations, and the favourable disposition of the chief ministers there, he added, "And I have at last made them sensible of the full extent of his majesty's bounty." From these communications, that the ministering themselves to foreign princes, a practice which, notwithstanding the malignity of the vigilant, is certainly rare among men in high office, had not been scrupled by Charles's ministers, who even obtained their master's consent to this dishonourable corruption.

But while all men of penetration, both abroad and at home, were alarmed with these incidents, the visit which the king received from his sister, the Duchess of Orleans, was the foundation of still stronger suspicions. Lewis, knowing the address and insinuation of that amiable princess, and the great influence which she had gained of her brother, consulted her at her court, in order to detach Charles from the triple league, which, he knew, had fixed such insurmountable barriers to his ambition; and he now sent her to put the last hand to the plan of their conjoint operations. That he might the better cover this negotiation, he pretended to visit his frontiers, particularly the great works which he had undertaken at Dunkirk; and he carried the queen and the whole court along with him. While he returned from Dunkirk, the Duchess of Orleans went over to England; and Charles met her at Dover, where they passed ten days together in great mirth and festivity. By her artifices and careness, Lewis with his sister set himself to relax the king into a change of maxim and policy, and to finish his engagements with Lewis for the destruction of Holland; and Lewis made all the preparations and entered into all the negotiations for the execution of this dangerous scheme, in a view of after affairs finding an opportunity.

1 D'Estrées, 16th July, 1667. e Sir W. Temple's notes; see Memoirs, vol. i. p. 14. 67. That Charles was never sincere in the triple alliance; and that, having entertained a violent suspicion of the intentions of his sister and brother-in-law, he determined to detach them from the French alliance, with a view of after affairs finding an opportunity to salutize his vengeance upon them. This account, though very little honourable to the Duke of Orleans, seems probable from events, as well as from the authority of the author.

king about some business, where his negotiation had met with obstructions. De Wit made the Dutch resident inform the English court, that he should consider the recall of Temple as an express declaration of a change of measures in England; and that he could even know what interpretation he might put upon any delay of his return.

29th Oct. While these measures were secretly in A parliament. agitation, the parliament met according to 27th Nov. adjournment. The king made a short speech, and left the business to be enlarged upon by the keeper. That minister much insisted on the king's great want of supply; the mighty increase of the naval power of France, now triple to what it was before the last war with Holland; the decay of the house of commerce, the protector's, had been ruinous for ten years; a fleet of fifty sail; the obligations which the king lay under by several treaties to exact for himself the common good of Christendom. Among other treaties, he mentioned the triple alliance, and the defensive league with the States.

The artifice succeeded. The House of Commons, entirely satisfied with the king's measures, voted him considerable supplies. A land tax for a year was imposed of a shilling a pound, and a period a pound on two-thirds of the salaries of offices; fifteen shillings on every hundred pounds of bankers' money and stock; an additional excise upon beer for six years, and certain impositions upon law promulgated. The king was to be holden by those obligations before been in a more liberal humour; and never surely was it less merited by the counsels of the king and of his ministers.

A. D. 1671. The Commons passed another bill for laying a duty on tobacco, Scotch salt, glass, and some other commodities. Against this bill the merchants of London appeared by petition before the House of Lords. The Lords entered into their reasons, and began to make amendments on the bill sent up by the Commons. This attempt was hastily resented by the lower House, as an encroachment on the right, which they pretended to possess alone, of granting money to the crown. Many remonstrances passed between the two Houses, and by their alterations the king was obliged to prorogue the parliament; and he thereby lost the money which was intended him. This is the last time that the Peers have revived any pretensions of that nature. Ever since, the privilege of the Commons, in all other places except in the House of Peers, has passed for uncontroverted.

There was a private affair, which, during this session, disturbed the peace of the kingdom. Henry, prince of Orange, whose old claim to the crown of England was renewed, and who was the husband of James's daughter, and the son-in-law of the Duke of York, had been publically engaged to make a descent in England. He had been impressed by the prospect of the estates of his wife, the Duke of York, and the design of his son, Prince William, to make another descent in Ireland. He was urged in this design by the artifice of the French ambassador, and by the prospect of being furnished with an insurrection in Ireland; and on account of this crime he himself had been attainted, and some of his accomplices capitally punished. The daring villain medi-

Buckingham was at first, with some appearance of reason, suspected to be the author of this business, and was apprehended. But his drollery, his character, and his enmity against Ormond, exposed him to that imputation. Bassor soon after came to court; and seeing Buckingham stand by the king, his face of such a colour and carriage, that he forbore expressing himself to this purpose: "My lord, I know well that you are at the bottom of this late attempt upon my father: but I give you warning; if by any means he come to a violent end, I shall not be at a loss to know the author: I shall consider you as the assassin: I shall treat you as such; and when I meet you, I shall pistol you, though you stood behind the king's chair; and I tell it you in my majesty's presence, that you may be sure I shall not fail of performance." The king had caused the two ambassadors to be confided in a generous youth, when his father's life was exposed to danger. A little after, Buckingham formed a design of carrying off the crown itself from the Tower. He had approached his venture with so much success, that he was promised his pardon; but he failed of accomplishing it. The king was made to reflect the time of his design, and what it would have been to accommodate it. The usual method of those who opposed the court in the money bills was, if they failed in the main vote, as to the extent of the supply, to levy the money upon such acts as the French were not be incapable without proof. It was proposed to lay an imposition upon playhouses; the courers objected, that the players were the king's servants, and a part of his pleasure. Sir John Coventry, a gentleman of the country party, asked, "whether the king's pleasure lay among the male or the female players?"

This stroke of satire was aimed at Charles, who, besides his mistresses of higher quality, entertained at that time two actresses, Darya and Nell Gwyn. The king received not the naylery with the good humour which might have been expected. It was said, that this being the first time that respect to majesty had been publicly violated, it was rec-

been engaged, with others, in a design to kill him with a carbine above Battersea, where his majesty often went to bathe: that the cause of this resolution was the severity exercised over the consciences of the godly, in restraining their ecclesiastical liberty. The minister, when he had taken his stand among the reeds, full of these bloody resolutions, he found his heart checked with an awe of majesty; and he not only relented himself, but diverted his associates from their design. It is not certain that he had brought himself to an entire indifference about life, which he now gave for lost; yet could he not forbear warning the king of the danger which might attend his execution: that his associates had bound themselves by the strictest oaths to revenge his death; and that every precaution or power could secure one from the effects of their desperate resolutions. Whether these considerations excited fear or admiration in the king, they confirmed his resolutions of granting a pardon to Bloo; but he thought it a point of decency first to obtain the Duke of Ormond's consent. Arlington came to Ormond in the king's name, and desired that he would not prosecute Blood, for reasons which he was commanded to give him. The duke replied, that his majesty's commands were the only reasons that could be given; and being sufficient, he might therefore spare the rest. Charles excused his kindness to Blood still further: he granted him an audience, with his attended guards; he encouraged his attendance upon his person; he showed him his great countenance; and many applied to him for promoting their pretensions at court. And while old Edwards sat, and deplored his fate, and had been wounded in defending the crown and regalia, was forgotten and neglected, this man, who desired only to be stared at and detested as a monster, became a kind of favourite.

Errors of this nature in private life have often as much influence as miscarriages in which the public is more immediately concerned. Another incident happened this year, which infused a general displeasure, and still greater apprehensions, into all men. The Duchess of York died; and as her death was distressing, she made open profession of the Romish religion, and finished her life in that communion.

This put an end to that thin disguise which declared him the duke had hitherto worn; and he now openly declared his conversion to the church of Rome. Unaccountable terrors of popery, ever since the accession of the house of Stuart, had prevailed throughout the nation; but these had formerly been so groundless, and had been employed to so many and various ends, that surmises of this nature were likely to meet with the least credit among all men of sense; and nothing but the duke's imputed bigotry could have conviced the whole nation of his change of religion. Popery, which had hitherto been so little suspected, now became a new ground of terror; being openly and seriously embraced by the heir to the crown, a prince of industry and enterprise; while the king himself was not entirely free from like suspicions.

It is probable, that the new alliance with France inspired the duke with the courage to make open profession of his religion, and rendered him more careless of the affections and esteem of the English. This alliance became every day more apparent. Temple was declared to be no longer ambassador to the States; and Downing, whom the Dutch regarded as the inveterate enemy of their republic, was sent over in his stead. A ground of quarrel was sought by means of a yacht, despatched for Lady Temple. The captain sailed through the Dutch fleet which lay on their own coasts; and he had orders to make them strike, to fire on them, and to preserve till they should return his fire. The Dutch Admiral, Van Ghent, surprised at this bravo, came on board the yacht, and expressed his willingness to pay respect to the British flag, according to former practice: but that a fleet, on their own coasts, should strike to a yacht, was neither a statesman nor a shipwright; such an innovation, that he durst not, without express orders, agree to it. The captain thinking it dangerous, as well as absurd, to renew firing in the midst of the Dutch fleet, continued his course; and, for that neglect of orders, was committed to the Tower.

This incident, however, furnished Downing with a new article to increase the vaine pretences, on which it was launched against the English nation. The court delayed several months before they complained; lest, if they had demanded satisfaction more early, the Dutch might have had time to grant it. Even when Downing delved, and. carried his point, there was nothing but an assurance not to accept of any satisfaction after a certain number of days; a very imperious manner of negotiating, and impracticable in Holland, where the forms of the republic render delays absolutely unavoidable. An answer, however, this estimation to the Dutch envoy; and that that envoy was proceeding to the court of England. That court replied, that the answer of the Hollanders was ambiguous and obscure; but they would not specify the articles or expressions which were liable to that objection. The Dutch ambassador desired the English ministry to draw the answer in terms they pleased, and he was resolved to sign it. The English ministry replied, that it was not their business to draw papers for the Dutch. The ambassador brought them the draft of an article, and asked them whether it were satisfactory: the English answered that, when he had signed and delivered it, he should have been satisfied; but the Dutchman resolved to sign it at a venture; and on his demanding a new audience, an hour was appointed for that purpose; but when he attended, the English refused, and immediately told him, that the season for negotiating was now past. Long and frequent prorogations were made of the parliament; lest the Houses should declare themselves with vigour against counsels so opposite to the inclination as well as interests of the public. Could we suppose that Charles, in his alliance against Holland, really meant the good of his people, that measure must pass for an extraordinary, a very, a romantic strain of extravagance, and impracticability, in spite of all difficulties, and even in spite of themselves, to seek the welfare of the nation. But every step which he took in this affair, became a proof to all men of prudence, that the present war was intended against the religion and liberties of his own subjects, even more than against the Dutch themselves. He now acted in every thing, as if he were already an absolute monarch, and was never more to lie under the control of the other branches of the crown. The long prorogations of parliament, if they freed the king from the importunate remonstrances of that assembly, were, however, attended with this inconvenience, that no money could be procured to carry on the military preparations. The most eligible proposals to compound with the triple league, which at that very time he had firmly resolved to break, Charles had obtained a large supply from the Commons; but this money was soon exhausted by debts and expenses. France had stipulated to pay one hundred thousand pounds a-year during the war; but that supply was inconsiderable, compared to the immense charge of the English navy. It seemed as yet premature to venture on levying money, without consent of parliament; since the power of taxing themselves was the privilege of the English, of which the English were, with reason, particularly jealous. Some other resource must be fallen on. The king had declared, that the staff of treasurer was ready for any one that could find an expedient for supplying the present necessities. Shaftesbury dropped a hint to Clifford, which the latter immediately seized, and carried to the king, who granted him the promised reward, to either with a peerage. This expedition was the shutting up of the exchequer, and the retaining of all the payments which should be made into it. It had been usual for the banks to carry their money out of the country; and it was proposed that it upon security of the funds, by which they were afterwards reimbursed, when the money was levied on the public. The bankers, by this traffic, got eight, sometimes... had orders to go on this command; and be passed Sprague in the channel, who was returning with a squadron from a cruise in the Mediterranean. Sprague informed him of the near approach of the Hollanders, and had not Holmes, from a desire of engaging the honour and profit of the enterprise, kept the secret of his orders, the composition of these squadrons had rendered the success infallible. When Holmes approached the Dutch, he put on an amicable appearance, and invited the admiral, Van Ness, who commanded them, to come on board of him: one of his captains gave a like insidious invitation to the rear-admiral. But these officers were on their guard. They had received an intimation of the hostile intentions of the English, and would have opened violation of the most solemn engagements, both foreign and domestic.

Declaration of War

Another measure of the court contains something laudable, when considered in itself; but if we reflect on the motive whet it proceeded, as well as the time when it was embraced, it will furnish a strong proof of the arbitrary and dangerous counsels pursued at present by the king and his ministry. Charles resolved to make use of his supreme power in ecclesiastical matters; a power, he said, which was not only inherent in him, but which had been recognised by several acts of parliament. By virtue of this authority, he thought it would have been attended with great advantage to the public peace, if a few penal laws enacted against all nonconformists or recusants whatsoever; and granting to the Protestant dissenters the public exercise of their religion, to the catholics the exercise of theirs; and thus, by refusing the honour of the crown, opposed by the parliament, and retracted by the king, had already been made a few years after the restoration; but Charles expected, that the parliament, whenever it should meet, would now be tampered to greater submission, and would no longer dare to control his measures. Meanwhile, the dissenters, the most inveterate enemies of the court, were mollified by these indulgent maxims; and the catholics, under their shelter, enjoyed more liberty than the laws had allowed them before.

At the same time, the act of navigation was suspended by royal will and pleasure: a measure which, though a stretch of prerogative, seemed useful to commerce, while all the seamen were employed on board the royal navy. A like suspension had been granted, during the first Dutch war, and was not much remarked; because men had, at that time, entertained less jealousy of the crown. A proclamation was therefore issued, how little important soever in themselves, savoured strongly of arbitrary government, and were nowise suitable to that legal administration, which the parliament, after such violent contumacies in civil wars, had hoped to have established in the kingdom.

It may be worth remarking, that the lord-keeper refused to affix the great seal to the declaration for suspending the parliament, and was for that reason, thouing the other pretences, removed from his office. Shaftesbury was made chancellor in his place; and thus another member of the cabinet received the reward of his counsels.

Act of War

The protestation had occasion. He protested in the name of the Smyrna fleet, that he was not anxious that it should be a principle of importance for supporting his military enterprises. Holmes, with nine frigates and three yachts, into the hands of Lewis, magazines were there erected; and it was from that quarter that France purposed to invade the United Provinces. The standing force of that kingdom amounted to a hundred and eighty thousand men; and the strength of one half of this French king now approaching to the Dutch frontiers. The order, economy, and industry of Colbert, equally subservient to the ambition of the prince and happiness of the people, furnished unexhausted stores; these, acquired by the unremitting vigilance of Louvois, supplied every military preparation, and facilitated all the enterprises of the army: Condé, Turenne, seconded by Luxembourg,arges, and the most renowned generals of the age, conducted this army, and by their conduct and reputation inspired courage into every one. The monarch himself, surrounded with a brave nobility, animated his troops by the prospect of reward, or, what was most valued, by the hopes of his approbation. The fatigues of war gave no interruption to gaiety; its dangers furnished matter for glory; and in no enterprise did the genius of that gallant and polite people ever break out with more distinguished lustre.

Though De Witt's intelligence in foreign courts was not equal to the vigilance of his domestic administration, he had, long before, received many assurances of this fatal consequence to be prepared for, not for defence so much as to cope with such industry, as the danger required. A union of England with France was evidently, he saw, destructive to the interests of the former kingdom; and therefore, overpowered by the humours of Charles, he concluded it impossible that such pernicious projects could ever really be carried into execution.

Weakness in the States. Secure in this fallacious reasoning, he allowed the republic to remain too long in that defenceless situation, into which many concurrend accidents had conspired to throw her.

By a continued and successful application to commerce, the States had some unalike, as a prepared defence for their defence in that mercantile arm, which they maintained. After the treaty of Westphalia, the States, trusting to their peace with Spain, and their alliance with France, had broken a great part of this industry, and did not support with sufficient vigilance the discipline of the troops which remained. When the aristocratic party prevailed, it was thought prudent to dismiss many of the old experienced officers, who were devoted in the house of Orange; and their place was supplied by raw youths, the sons or kinmen of burgomasters, by whose interest the party was supported. These new officers, relying on the credit of their friends and family, neglected their military duty; and whatever was said to the contrary, they were employed by deputies, to whom they assigned a small part of their pay. During the war with England, all the forces of that nation had been disband ed: Lewis's invasion of Flanders, followed by the treaty of Westphalia, occasioned the dismission of the French regiments: and the place of these troops, which had ever had a chief share in the honour and fortune of all the wars in the Low Countries, had not been supplied by any new levies.

De Witt, sensible of this dangerous situation, alarmed by the reports which came from all quarters, exorted himself to supply those defects, to which it was not easy of a sudden to provide a suitable remedy. But every proposal, which he could make, met with opposition from the Orange party, now become extremely formidable. The long and uncontrolled administration of this statesman had begotten envy; the present incidents roused up his enemies and opponents, who ascribed to his misconduct alone the bad situation of the republic: and, above all, the popular affection to the young prince, which had so long been broken in valuable constraint, and had thence acquired new accession of force, began to display itself, and to threaten the commonwealth with some great convulsion. William III., Prince of Orange, was in the twenty-second year of his age, and gave strong indications of those great qualities, by which his life was afterwards so much distinguished. De Witt himself, by giving him an excellent education, and instructing him in all the principles of government and sound policy, had generously contributed to make his rival formidable. Dreading the precarious situation of his own party, he was always resolved, he said, by conveying to the prince the knowledge of affairs, to render him equal to the situation in which he might unexpectedly be placed. This solution should ever throw the administration into his hands. The conduct of William had hitherto been extremely laudable. Notwithstanding his powerful alliances with France, and his decline of the former policy of the Dutch in that solution of depending entirely on the States for his advancement; and the whole tenor of his behaviour suited extremely the genius of that people. Silent and thoughtful; given to hear and to inquire; of a sound and steady understanding; firm in what he once resolved, or once denied; strongly intent on business, little on pleasure: by these virtues he engaged the attention of all men. And the people, sensible that they owed the liberty and existence of their ancestors, and hoped, from his valour and conduct alone, to receive protection against those imminent dangers with which they were at present threatened. While these two powerful factions struggled for supremacy, he shewed himself the equal of an able general in every project returned. What was determined with difficulty, was executed without vigueur. Levies indeed were made, and the army completed to seventy thousand men; the prince was appointed general or chief secret warrior of the republic, and the whole military power was put into his hands. But new troops could not of a sudden acquire discipline and experience: and the partisans of the prince were all unhappy, as the court of his father was calmed, remained in force; by which he was excluded from the statholdership, and from all share in the civil administration.

It had been the maxim of De Witt's party to cultivate national affairs with extreme care, and to give the fleet a preference above the army, which they represented as the object of an unrespective partiality in the princes of Orange. The French, who were seldom warred with England, had exercised the valour and improved the skill of the sailors. And, above all, De Ruyter, the greatest sea-commander of the age, was closely connected with the Louvain party; and every time he was disposed, with confidence and alacrity, to obey him. The equipment of the fleet was therefore fastened by De Witt; in hopes that, by striking at first a successful blow, he might inspire courage into the distracted States, and support his despotism, which was allowed to serve in a peculiar manner, inscensed against the English; and he resolved to take revenge on them for their conduct, of which, he thought, he himself and his country had such reason to complain. By the offer of a close alliance for mutual defence, they had seduced the republic to quit the alliance of France; but no sooner had she embraced these measures, than they formed leagues for her destruction, with that very power which they had theretofore engaged her to offend. In the midst of full peace, nav during an intimate union, they attacked her commerce, her only means of subsistence; and, moved by shameful rashness, had invaded that property, which, from a reliance on their faith, they had hoped to find unprotected and defenceless. Contrary to their own manifest interest, as well as to their honour, they still retained a malignant resentment for her successful conclusion of the former war which had at first sprung from their own wanton insolence and ambition. To repress so dangerous an enemy, would, De Witt imagined, give peculiar pleasure, and contribute to the future security of his country, whose prosperity was so much the object of general envy.

Actuated by like motives and views, De Ruyter put to sea with a formidable fleet, consisting of ninety-one ships of war and forty-four frigates. Command of De Witt was on board, as deputy from the States. They sailed in quest of the English, who were under the command of the Duke of York, and who had already joined the French under Mareschal d'Étrevé. The combined fleets lay at Solebay in a very nervigent posture; and Sandwich, being an experienced officer, had given the duke warning of the danger; but received, it is said, such an answer as intimated, that there was no necessity for it to come in at all. Upon the appearance of the enemy, every one ran to his post with precipitation, and many ships were obliged to cut their cables, in order to be in readiness. Sandwich commanded the van; and though determined to conquer or be destroyed, he was sufficiently confirmed by the appearance of the enemy, that the whole fleet was suitably inoted to him for its safety. He hastened out of the bay, where it had been easy for De Ruyter with his fire-ships to have destroyed the destroyed fleet, which was crowded together; but by this wise measure gave time to the Duke of York, who commanded the main body, and to Mareschal d'Étrevé, admiral of the rear, to disengage themselves. He himself manoeuvred meanwhile into battle with the Hollanders; and by presenting himself to every danger, had drawn upon him all the bravest of the enemy. He killed Van Ghent, a Dutch admiral, and beat off his ship: be sunk another ship, which ventured to try him aboard: be sunk three fire-ships, which endeavoured to grapple with him: and though his vessel was torn in pieces with shot, and of a thousand men she contained, near six hundred were killed or wounded: but he was continued still in the action with all his artillery in the midst of the enemy. But another fire-ship, more fortunate than the preceding, having laid hold of his vessel, her destruction was now inevitable. Warned by Sir Edward Haddock, his captain, he recovered his ship, for which he had embraced death as a shelter from that ignominy, which a rash expression of the duke's, he thought, had thrown upon him.

During this fierce engagement with Sandwich, De Ruyter, with his fleet, sailed for Amersfort, Camperduin, Van Nyk, and fought him with such fury for about two hours, that of two and thirty actions, in which that admiral had been engaged, he declared this combat to be the most obstinately sustained, and that he was so shattercd, that he was oblige to leave her, and remove his flag to another.

His squadron was overpowered with numbers; till Sir
Joseph Jordan, who had succeeded to Sandwich's com-mmand, came to his assistance, and the fight, being now equally balanced, was continued till night, when the Dutch retired, and were not followed by the English. The loss sustained by the fleets of the two maritime powers was nearly equal, if it did not rather fall more heavy on the English, as they could not have been involved in as many actions as the Dutch, or so closely engaged in the action; and as this backwardness is not their national character, it was concluded that they had received secret orders to spare their ships, with the design of returning to their own ports, and save themselves by their mutual animosity. Almost all the other actions during the present war tended to confirm this suspicion.

It might be deemed honourable for the Dutch to have fought with some advantage the combined fleets of two such powerful nations; but nothing less than a complete victory could serve the purpose of De Wit, or save his country from those calamities, which from every quarter threatened to overwhelm her. He had expected that the French would make their attack on the side of Maestricht, which was well fortified, and provided with a good garriton; but Lewis, taking advantage of his alliance with Colloyn, resolved to invade the enemy on that frontier, which he knew to be more forcible his defections. The armies of that elector and those of Munster appeared on the other side of the Rhine, and divided the force and attention of the States. The Dutch troops, too weak to defend so extensive a frontier, were scattered in so many towns, that no considerable body remained in the field;
and a strong garrison was scarce to be found in any fortress. Lewis pursued the Meuse at Vierset; prevented the entrance of the French. Elector of Brandenburgh's, but garrisoned by the Dutch, he carried it in three days. He divided his army, and invested at once Burc, Wesel, Emerich, and Rhinsburg, four places fortified, and not unprotected with troops: in a few days all these places were surrendered. A general astonishment had seized the Hollanders, from the combination of such powerful princes against the republic; and no where was resistance made suitable to the ancient glory or present greatness of the state. Governors without experience commanded troops without discipline; and despair had universally exten-uded itself, and of sense of honour, by which alone, men, in such dangerous extremities, can be animated to a valourous defence.

Lewis advanced to the banks of the Rhine, which he prepared to cross. To all the calamities of the Dutch was added the extreme drought of the season, by which the greatest rivers were much diminished, and in some places rendered fordable. The French cavalry, animated by the presence of their prince, full of impetuous courage, but ranged in exact order, flung themselves into the river: the infantry passed in boats: a few regiments of Dutch appeared on the other side, who were unable to make resistance. And thus was executed, without danger, but not without glory, the passage of the Rhine; so much celebrated at that time by the blunty of the French courtiers, and transmitted to posterity by the more durable flattery of their poets.

Each success added courage to the conquerors, and struck the vanquished with dismay. The Prince of Orange, though prudent beyond his age, was but newly advanced to the command, unaccompanied with the army, unknown to the enemy, and, with all the passions which prevailed, was uncertain of the authority on which they must depend. It was expected, that the fort of Skink, famous for the sieges which it had formerly sustained, would make some resistance; but it yielded to Turenne in a few days. The same general was sent by the time the Marquis of Arnhem, Krestenenburg, and Nimgeuen, as soon as he appeared before them. Doesburg at the same time opened its gates to Lewis: soon after, Harderwic,
the seat of the governorship of Zealand, Rijn,
and the town of Calviers, surrendered. The two, and Deventer surrendered to the Mareschal Luxembourg, who commanded the troops of Munster. And every hour brought to the town of the rapid progress of the French, and of the cowardly de-defence of their own garrisons.

The Prince of Orange, with so much and discouraged army, retired into the province of Holland, where he expected, from the natural strength of the country, since all human art and courage failed, to be able to make some resistance. The town and province of Utrecht, so famous, and surrendered themselves to Lewis. Naorden, a place within three leagues of Amsterdam, was seized by the Marquis of Hochfort, and, bad be pushed on to Muy-den, he had easily captured possession of it. Fourteen stragglers of his army having appeared before the gates of that town, the magistrates and other inhabitants of the city, which was now alone in the castle, having raised the drawbridge, kept them from taking possession of that fortress.
The citizens afterwards, finding the party so weak,
made them drunk, and took the keys from them. Muy-den is so near to Amsterdam, that its cannon may infest
the ships which enter that city.

Lewis with a splendid court made a solemn entry into Utrecht, full of glory, because every where attended with success; though more owing to the cowardice and misconduct of his enemies, than to his own valour or prudence. Three provinces were already in his hands, Guelderland, Overysell, and Utrecht;
and Groningen was threatened: Friesland was exposed; the only difficulty lay in Holland and Zealand; and the monarch deliberated concerning the proper measures for reducing them. Condé and Turenne exhorted him to dismantle all the towns which he had taken, except a few; and fortifying his main army by the garrisons, put himself in a condition of pushing his conquests. Louvois, hoping that the other provinces, weak and dismayed, would prove an easy prey, advised him to pursue a more extended route, which might afterwards serve to retain the people in subjection. His counsel was followed; though it was found,
soon after, to have been the most imprudent.

Meanwhile the people throughout the Constamonat public, instead of collecting a noble indig-

tion against the haughty conqueror, discharged their rage upon their own unhappy minister, on whose prudence and integrity every one formerly bestowed the merited applause: the bad condition of the armies was laid to his charge: the ill choice of governors was ascribed to his partiality: as instances of cowardice multiplied, treachery was suspected. The former comprises with France; the latter, perhaps, was more real to himself, and the people believed, that he and his partisans had now combined to betray them to their most mortal enemy. The Prince of Orange, notwithstanding his former experience, was looked on as the only saviour of the state; and men were violently driven by their fears into his party, to which they had always been led by favour and inclination. A discontent alone was left to retain some courage; and by forming a regular plan of defence, endeavoured to inflame spirit into the other cities. The magistrates obliged the burgesses to keep a strict watch: the populace, whom want of employment might engage to mutiny, were maintained by regular pay, and armed for the defence of the public.

Some ships, which lay useless in the harbour, were refitted, and stationed to guard the city: and the sluices being opened, the neighbouring country, without regard to the damage sustained, was laid under water.

All the provinces followed the example, and scrupled not, in this extremity, to restore to the sea those fruitful fields, which with great art and expense had been won from it.

As the first army was formed, care was taken to whether the means were left to save the remains of their lately flourishing, and now distressed, commonwealth. Though they were surrounded with waters, which barred all access to the land, the field-citizens were ordered to maintain that tranquillity, which could alone suggest measures proper to extricate them from their present difficulties.

The nobles gave their vote, that, provided their religion, liberty, and national dignity, could be retained, every thing else should without scruple be sacrificed to the conqueror.

Eleven towns concurred in the same sentiments. Amsterdam singly declared against all treaty with insolent and contemptible Lewis, and, notwithstanding that opposition, ambassadors were despatched to implore the pity of the two combined monarchs. It was resolved to sacrifice to Lewis, Maestricht, and all the frontier towns which lay within the bounds of the seven provinces; and to pay him a large sum for the charges of the war.

Lewis deliberated with his ministers Louvois and Pomponne, concerning the measures which he should embrace in the present emergency; and fortunately for Europe, he still preferred the violent counsels of the former. He offered to evacuate his conquests, on condition that all duties lately imposed on the commodities of France should be taken off: that the public exercise of the Romish religion should be permitted in the United Provinces; that the churches shared with the catholics; and their priests maintained by appointments from the States: that all the frontier towns of the republic should be yielded to him, together with Nimeguen, Stenck, Kortenburem, and that part of Guelderland which lay on the other side of the Rhine; as likewise the isle of Bommel, that of Voorn, the fortress of St. Andrew, those of Louvestein and Cruys; that the States should pay him the sum of twenty millions of livres for the charges of the war: that they should every year send him a solemn embassy, and present him with a golden medal, as an acknowledgment that they owed to him the preservation of that liberty, which, by his timely and powerful counsels, he had preserved for the former.

He offered to send to London met with still worse reception: no minister was allowed to treat with them; and they were retained in a kind of confinement. But, notwithstanding this rigorous conduct of the court, the people were provoked by the sentiments of tender compassion, and even indignation, among the people in general, especially among those who could foresee the aim and result of those dangerous counsels. The states for two powerful monarchs, that said, in Europe, the one by land, the other by sea, have, contrary to the faith of solemn treaties, combined to exterminate an illus-were the violent factions with which they continued to be everywhere agitated. De Witt, too pertinacious in defence of his own system of liberty, while the very being of the commonwealth was in opposing the repeal of the perpetual edict, now became the object of horror to the Dutch populace. Their rage at last broke all bounds, and bore every thing before it. They rushed in an insurrection at Dort, and by force constrained their burgomasters to sign the repeal so much demanded. This proved a signal of a general revolt throughout all the provinces.

At Amsterdam, the Hague, Middlebourg, Rotterdam, the people flew to arms, and, trampling under foot the authority of their magistrates, obliged them to submit to the Prince of Orange. They expelled from their office such as displeased them; they required the prince to appoint others in their place: and, agreeably to the proceedings of the populace in all ages, provided they might wreak their vengeance on their superiors, they expressed great indignation for the protection of their civil liberties.

The superior talents and virtues of De Witt made him, on this occasion, the chief object of envy, and exposed him to the utmost rage of popular prejudice. Four assassins, armed with matches, entered the house of that magistrate, and, by the violence of their assault, obliged him to unrobe himself, and after having him severely wounded, left him for dead. One of them was punished: the others were never questioned for the crime. His brother, Cornelius, who had behaved with prudence and integrity, being on board the fleet, was obliged by sickness to come ashore; and he was now confined to his house at Dort. Some assassins broke in upon him; and it was with the utmost difficulty that his family and servants could repel their violence. At Amsterdam, the house of the brave De Huyter, the sole resource of the distressed commonwealth, was surrounded by the enraged populace; and his wife and children were for some time exposed to the most imminent danger.

One Tchelher, a barber, a man noted for infamy, accused Cornelius de Witt of endeavouring by bribes to engage him in the design of poisoning the Prince of Orange. The accusation, though attended with the most improbable and even absurd circumstances, was greedily received by the credulous multitude; and Cornelius was cited before a court of judicature. The judges, either blinded by the same prejudices, or not daring to oppose the popular torrent, condemned him to suffer the question. This man, who had bravely served his country in war, and who had been invested with the highest dignities, was delivered into the hands of the executioner, and torn in pieces by a remorseless populace, and the severe agonies which he endured, he still made protestations of his innocence, and frequently repeated an ode of Horace, which contained sentiments suited to his deplorable condition:

The judges, however, condemned him to lose his offices, and to be banished from the commonwealth. The pensionary, who had not been terrified from performing the part of a kind brother and faithful friend during this prosecution, resolved not to desert him on account of the unmerited infamy which was endeavoured to be thrown upon him. He came to his termination, determined to accompany him to the place of his exile. The signal was given to Massacre of the De Witts. They rose in arms: they broke open the doors of the prison; they pulled out the two brothers; and a thousand hands vie who should first be impaled in their blood. From their death did not satiate the brutal rage of the multitude. They exercised on the dead bodies of those virtuous etiasked him, whether he did not see that the commonwealth was ruined? There is one certain means, replied the prince, by which I can be sure never to see my country's ruin: I will die in the last ditch.

The prince had been much incited to espouse the prince's party, by the hopes that the King of England, pleased with his nephew's elevation, would abandon those dangerous engagements into which he had entered, and would afford his protection to the distressed republic. But all these hopes were soon found to be fallacious. Charles still persisted in his alliance with France; and the combined fleets approached the coast of Holland, with an English army on board, commanded by Count Schoone-berg. It is pretended that an unusual tide carried them off the coast; and that Providence thus interposed, in an extraordinary manner, to save the republic from the imminent danger to which it was exposed. Very tempestuous weather, it is certain, prevailed all the rest of the season; and the combined fleets either were blown to a distance, or durst not approach a coast which might prove fatal to them. The eyes of all men were henceforth turned against the misunderstanding, and that no further success was likely for the present to attend his arms, he was obliged to retire to Versailles.

The states of Europe regarded the subjection of Holland as the forerunner of their own slavery, and retained no hopes of defending themselves, should such a mighty acquisition be made to the already exorbitant power of France. But though he hesitated at a distance, and was naturally slow in his undertakings, began to put himself in motion; Brandenburgh showed a disposition to support the States; Spain had sent some forces to their assistance, by the present exigencies of the Prince of Orange, and the prospect of relief from their allies, a different face of affairs began already to appear. Groningen was the first place that stopped the progress of the enemy; the Bishop of Munster was repulsed from before that town, and obliged to raise the siege with loss and dishonour. Naarden was attempted by the Prince of Orange; but Mareschal Luxembourg, breaking in upon his entrenchments, with a sudden irruption, obliged him to abandon the enterprise.

A.D. 1673.The next step taken by the Commons had the appearance of some more complaints; but in reality proceeded from the same spirit of liberty and independence. They entered a resolution, that in order to supply his majesty's extraordinary occasions, for that was the expression of their desire, an assessment, at the rate of 70,000 pounds a month, amounting in the whole to 1,260,000 pounds. Though unwilling to come to a violent breach with the king, they would not expect a compliance with the demands of the Commons, and thus give him the prospect of this supply, only that they might have permission to proceed peaceably in the redress of the other grievances, of which they had such reason to complain.

No grievance was more alarming, both on account of the secret views from which it proceeded, and the consequences which might attend it, than the declaration of independence. A resolution was immediately found against that exercise of prerogative. The king defended his measure. The Commons persisted in their opposition to it; and they represented that such a practice, if attempted, might tend to interrupt the free course of the laws, and alter the legislative power, which had always been acknowledged to reside in the king and the two Houses. All men were in expectation with regard to the issue of this extraordinary power. The Commons seemed to consider their authority as so frail, and it was resolved to stick to his declaration; and would be much offended at any contradiction: and that though a rumour had been spread, as if the naval armed army had been intended to control law and property, he would be more disposed to believe it than affirm it; that he was resolved to augment his forces next spring, and did not doubt but they would consider the necessity of their supplies. The rest of the business he left to the chancellor.

The chancellor enlarged on the same topics, and added many extraordinary positions of his own. He told them, that the Hollanders were the common enemies of all monarchical States, and that by the influence of England, the protector for commercial and naval power, and the sole obstacle to their views of attaining an universal empire, as extensive as that of ancient Rome; that, even during their present distress and danger, they were so intoxicated with these ambitious projects, as to slight all treaty, or to refuse all proposition of hostilities: that the Dutch had been much incited to espouse the Prince's party, by the hopes that the King of England, pleased with his nephew's elevation, would abandon those dangerous engagements into which he had entered, and would afford his protection to the distressed republic. But all these hopes were soon found to be fallacious. Naarden was attempted by the Prince of Orange; but Mareschal Luxembourg, breaking in upon his entrenchments, with a sudden irruption, obliged him to abandon the enterprise.

A.D. 1673. A parliament met at this period, to consider of the measures for new elections; but the business was then arrested by the execution of the revolution. The eyes of all men were consequently turned against the monarchy, and their relations with their foreign allies were so strained as to render any dissolution of the States impracticable. The feeble and vacillating character of the combined forces of the republic was the subject of frequent reflections. The Dutch court, indeed, with some success, raised a fleet to the number of seven thousand men, under the command of Admiral de Winter, who, before that time, had had some precedents in his favour, had ever afterwards abstained from all exercise of that authority. This indeed was one of the first steps which the court has taken to effect its designs; but it is not probable that the army will ever be able to take possession of the citizens. The army of the states was composed of between twenty thousand and thirty thousand men, but it is not probable that the army will ever be able to take possession of the citizens. The army of the states was composed of between twenty thousand and thirty thousand men, but it is not probable that the army will ever be able to take possession of the citizens. The army of the states was composed of between twenty thousand and thirty thousand men, but it is not probable that the army will ever be able to take possession of the citizens.
in such an event, ought long ago to have been entirely fixed and determined. Besides his usual guards, he had an army encamped at Blackheath, under the command of Mareschal Schomberg, a foreigner; and many of the officers were of the Protestant religion. His ally, the French king, he might expect, would second him, if force became requisite for restraining his discontented subjects, and supporting the measures which, by common consent, they had agreed to renew. The House of Commons, however, had approached so dangerous a precipice as that which lay before them. Were violence once offered, there could be no return, he saw, to mutual confidence and trust with his people; the recall attending foreign succours, especially from the mighty power of France; the risk of the success which his own arms had met with in the war, was not so great as to increase his authority, or terrify the malcontents from opposition. The desire of power, likewise, which had engaged Charles in these precipitate measures, had less proceeded, we may observe, from ambition, than from love of ease. Strict limitations of the constitution rendered the conduct of business complicated and troublesome; and it was impossible for him, without much contrivance and intrigue, to procure the money necessary for his pleasures, or even for the regular support of government. When the prospect, therefore, of such dangerous advances on the throne increased the ease inclined him to retract what it seemed so difficult to maintain; and his turn of mind, naturally plant and careless, made him find little objection to a measure which a more haughty prince would have embraced with the utmost relish. Resolution, therefore, was necessary. He asked the opinion of the House of Peers, who advised him to comply with the Commons. Accordingly the king sent for the declaration, and, as he took the precedence of the court, in which he himself had borne so deep a share. He was received with open arms by that party, who stood in need of so able a leader; and no questions were asked with regard to his past apology. The various factions into which the nation had been divided, and the many sudden revolutions to which the public had been exposed, had tended much to debauch the minds of men, and to destroy the sense of honour and decorum in their public conduct.

But the parliament, though satisfied with the king's compliance, had not lost all those apprehensions, to which the measures of the court had given so much foundation. A law passed for imposing a tax on all who should enjoy any public office. Besides taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and receiving the sacrament in the established church, they were obliged to abjure all belief in the doctrines of persecution. At first, the same love for the seconded the efforts of the Commons against the king's declaration of indulgence, and seemed resolute to accept of no toleration in any illegal manner, they had acquired great favour with the parliament; and a project was adopted to march the whole protestant forces against the common enemy, who now began to appear formidable. A bill passed the Commons for the ease and relief of the protestant nonconformists; but met with some difficulties, at least delays, in the House of Peers.

The resolution for supply was carried into a law; as a recompense to the king for his concessions. An act, likewise, of general pardon and indemnity was passed, which screened the ministers from all further inquiry. The parliament probably thought, that the best method of reclaiming the criminals was to show them that their case was not despaired of, and that the king was willing, for the cause of his kingdom, to purchase their pardon. The Commons voted, of their grievances, may be regarded as a proof, that their anger was, for the time, somewhat appeased. None of the capital points are there touched on; the breach of the triple league, the French alliance, or the interrupting of any important duty. The second act of the Commons, voted, was an arbitrary imposition on coats for providing convouts, the exercise of martial law, the quartering and pressing of soldiers; and they prayed, that, after the conclusion of the war, the whole army should be disbanded. The king gave them a gracious, though an evasive, answer.

When business was finished, the two Houses adjourned themselves.

Though the king had receded from his declaration of indulgence, and thereby had tacitly relinquished the dispensing power, he was still resolved, notwithstanding his success both at home and abroad, to persevere in his alliance with France; and in the Dutch war, consequently in all those secret views, whatever they were, which depended on those fatal measures. The money, granted by parliament, sufficed to equip a fleet, of which Prince Rupert was declared admiral: for the duke was set aside by the king. Some of the commissioners for the navy were ordered to command the under the prince. A French squadron joined them, commanded by D'Estrées. The combined fleets set sail towards the coast of the Bay of Dordrecht, in Holland, and from the masts of the ships, when everything was completed, there was a general confusion attending sea-fights, even beyond other military transactions, derived from the precarious operations of winds and tides, as well as from the enemies' secret despatches. But whether all that was there involved. No wonder, therefore, that accounts of those battles are apt to contain uncertainties and contradictions; especially when delivered by writers of the hostile nation, who are not pleased in denouncing the advantages of their own countrymen, and deplored those of the enemy. All we can say with certainty of this battle is, that both sides boasted of the victory; and we may hence infer, that the event was not decisive. The Dutch, being near home, returned into their harbours. In a week they were refitted, and presented themselves again to the combined fleets. A new action ensued, not more decisive than the foregoing. It was not fought with great advantage on either side, and to give a clear opposition to it. Never turn was more sudden, or less calculated to save appearances. Immediately, he entered into all the cabals of the country party; and discovered to them, perhaps magnified, the arbitrary designs of the court, in which he himself had borne so deep a share. He was received with open arms by that party, who stood in need of so able a leader; and no questions were asked with regard to his past apology. The various factions into which the nation had been divided, and the many sudden revolutions to which the public had been exposed, had tended much to debauch the minds of men, and to destroy the sense of honour and decorum in their public conduct.

But the parliament, though satisfied with the king's compliance, had not lost all those apprehensions, to which the measures of the court had given so much foundation. A law passed for imposing a tax on all who should enjoy any public office. Besides taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and receiving the sacrament in the established church, they were obliged to abjure all belief in the doctrines of persecution. At first, the same love for the seconded the efforts of the Commons against the king's declaration of indulgence, and seemed resolute to accept of no toleration in any illegal manner, they had acquired great favour with the parliament; and a project was adopted to march the whole protestant forces against the common enemy, who now began to appear formidable. A bill passed the Commons for the ease and relief of the jealousy of their confederates, whom, had they been permitted, they would, with much more pleasure, have destroyed, than even the enemy themselves.

If Prince Rupert was not favourable to the designs of the court, he enjoyed as little favour from the court, at least from the duke, who, though he could no longer command the fleet, still possessed the chief authority in the admiralty. The prince complained of a total want of every thing necessary, powder, shot, provender, beer, and even water; and when he went into harbour, that he might rest his ships, and supply their numerous necessities. After some weeks he was refitted, and again put to sea. The hostile fleets met off the Texel, and fought the last battle, which, during the course of so many years, these neighbouring maritime powers have disputed with each other. De Ruyter, and under him Tromp, commanded the Dutch in this action, as in the two former: for the Prince of Orange had reconciled these gallant rivals; and they retained nothing of their former animosity, except that emulation, which made them exert themselves with more distinguished bravery against the enemies of their country. Blankert was opposed to D'Etretes, De Ruyter to Prince Rupert, Tromp to Sprague. It is to be remarked, that in all actions these brave admirals last mentioned had still selected each other as the only antagonists worthy their valour; and the Dutch, no decisive advantage as had yet been gained by either of them. They fought in this battle as if there were no mean between death and victory.

But of the Dutch squadron, except Rear-Admiral Martel, kept at a distance, and Blankert, instead of attacking them, bore down to the assistance of De Ruyter, who was engaged in furious combat with Prince Rupert. On no occasion did the prince acquire more decisive conduct, as well as valour, than now with signal lustre. Having disengaged his squadron from the numerous enemies with whom he was everywhere surrounded, and having joined Sir John Chevley, his rear-adjutant, who had been separated from him, he made haste to the relief of Sprague, who was hard pressed by Tromp's squadron. The Royal Prince, in which Sprague first engaged, was so disordered, that he was obliged to leave his flag on board St. George; while Tromp was for a like reason obliged to quit his ship, the Golden Lion, and go on board the Comet. The fight was renewed with the utmost fury by these valourous rivals, and by the rear-adjutant of their seconds. Occor, rear-admiral to Sprague, was preparing to board Tromp, when he saw the St. George terribly torn, and in a manner disabled. Sprague was leaving her, in order to hoist his flag on board a third ship, and return to the charge, when a shot, which had passed through the ship, wounded both her, and killed her. The admiral was drowned, to the great regret of Tromp himself, who bestowed on his valour the deserved praise.

Prince Rupert found affair in this dangerous situation, and saw most of the ships in Sprague's squadron disabled from fight. The engagement however was renewed, and became very close and bloody. The prince threw the enemy into disorder. To increase it, he sent among them two fire-ships; and at the same time made a signal to the French to bear down; which if they had done, a decisive victory must have ensued; but the prince, when he saw that they neglected his signal, and observed that most of his ships were in no condition to keep the sea long, wisely provided for their safety by making easy sail towards the English coast. The victory in this battle was as doubtful, as in all the actions fought during the present war.

The turn which the affairs of the Hollander took by land, was more favourable. The Prince of Orange besieged and took Nuren; and from this success gave his country reason to hope for still more prosperous enterprize. The general demand for the imperialists on the Upper Rhine, deceived, by the most artful conduct, the vigilance and penetration of Turenne, and making a sudden march, set down before Bonne. The Prince of Orange made his approach, was no less master of the French generals, and leaving them behind him, joined his army to that of the imperialists. Bonne was taken in a few days: several other places in the electorate of Cologne fell into the hands of the allies: and the communication being thus cut off between France and the United Provinces, Lewis was obliged to recall his forces, and to retreat. Thus all his conquests were expunged, as he had at first made them. The taking of Mannheim was the only advantage which he gained this campaign.

A congress was opened at Cologne, under Charles of Lorraine, who was mediator of Sweden; but with small hopes of success. The contested kings were such as must have reduced the Hollanders to perpetual servitude. In proportion as the affairs of the States rose, the kings sank in their demands; but the States still held their footing, and it was found impossible for parties ever to agree on any conditions. After the French evacuated Holland, the congress broke up; and the sense of Prince William of Furstenburg by the imperialists afforded the French and English a good pretence for leaving Cologne. The Dutch ambassadors, in their memorials, expressed all the haughtiness and disdain, so natural to a free state, which had met with such unmeant ill usage.

The parliament of England, was also assembled, and the gloom of all honour that had appeared in the last session. They had seen for some time a negotiation of marriage carried on between the Duke of York and the Archbishops of Ireland, a project that had been made no opposition. But when that negotiation failed, and the duke applied to a princess of the house of Modena, then in close alliance with France; this circumstance, the jealousy of so many others, made it raise the Commons into a flame, and they remonstrated with the greatest zeal against the intended marriage. The king told them, that their remonstrance came too late; and that the marriage was already agreed on, and even celebrated by proxy. The Commons still insisted; and preceding to the examination of the other parts of government, they voted the standing army a grievance, and declared, that they would grant no more supply, unless it appeared, that a fund was raised to the Commons into a flame, and they remonstrated with the greatest zeal against the intended marriage. counsels they imputed all their present grievances. Clifford was dead: Shaftesbury had made his peace with the country party, and was become their leader; Buckingham was the envoys brought to intimate Shaftesbury; but his intentions were as yet known to very few. A motion was therefore made in the House of Commons for his impeachment; he desired to be heard at the bar; but expressed himself in so confused and ambiguous a manner, as gave little satisfaction; many persons were secretly anxious to secure queries which they proposed to him. These regarded all the articles of misconduct above mentioned; and, among the rest, the following query seems remarkable:

"By whose advice was the act brought up to overawe the debates and resolutions of the House of Commons?"

This shows to what length the suspicions of the House were at that time carried. Buckingham, in all his answers, endeavoured to exculpate himself, and to load Arlington. He succeeded not in the former intention: the Commons voted an address for his removal. But Arlington, who was on many accounts obnoxious to the House, was attacked. Articles were drawn up against him, though the intention was never prosecuted.

The king plainly saw that he could expect no supply from the Commons for carrying on a war so odious to them. He resolved therefore to make a separate peace with France, the power that had passed through the channel of the Spanish ambassador. With a cordiality, which in the present disposition on both sides, was probably but affected, but which was obliging, he asked advice of the able and praiseworthy navigators, who concurred, both in thanks for his gracious concession, and in their advice for peace. Peace was accordingly concluded. The honour of the flag was yielded to the Dutch in the most extensive terms: a regulation of trade was agreed to: all possessions were restored to the same condition as before the war: the English planters in Surinam were allowed to remove at pleasure: and the States agreed to pay to the king the sum of three hundred thousand pounds. Four days after the parliament was prorogued, the peace was proclaimed in London to the great joy of the people. Spain had declared that she could no longer remain neuter, if hostilities were continued against Holland; and a sensible decay of trade was foreseen, in case a rupture should ensue with that kingdom. The prospect of this loss contributed very much to increase the national aversion to the present war, and to elucidate the joy for its conclusion.

There was in the French service a great body of English, to the number of ten thousand men, who had acquired honourable commissions and profitable situations, in the successes of Lewis. These troops Charles said be was bound by treaty not to recall; but be obliged himself to the States by a secret article, not to allow them to be re- cruited. His partiality to France prevented a strict execution of this engagement.

CHAP. LXVI.

A.D. 1674.

If we consider the projects of the famous

Schemes of the cabal, it will appear how difficult, whether the end which those ministers pursued were not as dangerous to the public as the means by which they were to effect it more impudent and imprudent.

Though they might talk only of recovering or fixing the king's authority; their intention could be no other than that of making him absolute; since it was not possible to regain or maintain, in opposition to the people, any of those powers of the crown abolished by late law or custom, without subduing the people. The greater part of the people of England, which was so easy and inexpugnable, became in the great prosperity, as they imagined, of the tenant and church party in power: the treaty with Lewis was concluded at Vervailles on the end of 1669, or beginning of 1670, by Lord Aretin's of Warwick, whom no histor
England, and that the king and the ministry were in reality conspirators against the people. What is most probable in human affairs, is not always true; and a very minute circumstance, overlooked in our speculations, serves often to explain events, which may seem the most surprising and unaccountable. Though the king possessed penetration and a sound judgment, his capacity was chiefly fitted for smaller matters, and the ordinary occurrences of life; nor had he ever given any evidence of being capable of distant consequences, or to digest and adjust any plan of political operations. As he scarcely ever thought twice on any one subject, every appearance of advantage was apt to seduce him; and many of his projects were confounded by unlooked for difficulties; he readily turned aside into the first path, where he expected more to gratify the natural indolence of his disposition. To this versatility or phlegm of genius, he himself was inclined to trust; and he thought, that after trying an experiment for enlarging his authority, and altering the national religion, he could easily, if it failed, return into the ordinary channel of government. But the suspicions of the people, though they burst not forth at once, were by this attempt rendered altogether incurable; and the more they reflected on the circumstances attending it, the more resentment and jealousy were apt to entertain. They observed, that the king never had any far-reaching schemes; that was never предусмотрed by his masterly judgment, scarcely even by his mistresses, and that he himself was the chief spring of all public counsels. Whatever appearance, therefore, of a change might be assumed, they still supposed the same project was results in agitation; and they deemed no precaution too great to secure them against the pernicious consequences of such measures.

The king, sensible of this jealousy, was inclined thenceforth not to trust his people, of whom he had even before entertained a great dislike; and, though obliged to make a separate peace, he still kept up connexions with the French monarch. He apologized for deserting his ally, by representing to him all the real undissembled difficulties under which he laboured; 1 and, with the most complaisance and good humour, admitted the validity of his excuses. The duke likewise, conscious that his principles and conduct had rendered him still more obnoxious to the people, maintained on his own account a separate correspondence with the French court, and entered into particular connexions with Lewis, which these princes dignified with the name of friendship. The duke had only in view to secure his succession, and favour the catholics; and it must be acknowledged to his praise, that though his schemes were, in some particulars, dangerous to the people, they gave the king no just ground of jealousy. A man, who was an affectionate brother, he knew, would not, of another rule of conduct than obedience; and the same unlimited submission, which afterwards, when king, he expected of his people, he was ever willing, before he ascended the throne, to accept of his sovereign.

As the king was at peace with all the world, and almost the only prince in Europe placed in that agreeable situation, he thought proper to offer his mediation to the contending powers, in order to compose their differences. France, willing to negotiate under so favourable a mediator, readily accepted of Charles's offer; but it was apprehended, that, for a like reason, the allies would be inclined to refuse it. In order to give a sanction to his new measures, the king invited Temple from his retreat, and appointed him ambassador to the States. That wise minister, realizing the unhappy issue to his former of Sir W. 1emunderkings, and the fatal turn of councils, which the king had conceived it necessary to embark anew, to acquaint himself, as far as possible, with the real intentions of the king, in those popular measures which he seemed again to have adopted. After blaming the dangerous schemes of the cabal, which Charles was desirous to embark on, he proposed a project, which the king approved. He said, "I find it extremely difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to introduce into England the same system of government and religion which was established in France: that the universal belief of popery, and universal abhorrence of turbulent and reusable ages to change the genius and sentiments of a people: that many, who were at bottom indifferent in matters of religion, would yet oppose all alterations on that head; because they considered that nothing but force of arms could subdue the reluctance of the people against popery: after which they knew there could be no security for civil liberty: that in France, every circumstance had long been adjusted to the system of government, and tended to its establishment and support: that the commonsality, being poor and dispirited, were of no account; the nobility, engaged by the prospect or possession of numerous offices, civil and military, were entirely attached to the court; the ecclesiastics, desirous to have it returned to the Roman faith, would maintain the rights of religion to the principles of civil policy: that in England a great part of the landed properties belonged either to the yeomanry or middling gentry; the king had few offices to bestow on them; and he had no means of maintaining an army, except by the voluntary supplies of his parliament: that if he had an army on foot, yet, if composed of Englishmen, they would never be prevailed on to engage in a war to promote ends which the people so much feared and hated; that the Roman catholics in England were not the hundredth part of the nation, and in Scotland not the two-hundredth; and it seemed against all common sense to hope, by one part, to govern ninety-nine, who were of a different persuasion. He said, 1 I am not inclined to enter into that war, which would be a war of foreigners, if few, would tend only to inflame hatred and discontent; and how to raise and bring over at once, or to maintain many, it was very difficult to imagine. To these reasons Temple added the authority of Gouvrielle, a Frenchman, for whom he knew the king had entertained a great esteem. 2 "A king of England," said Gouvrielle, "who will be the man of his people, is the greatest king in the world: but if he will be any thing more, he is nothing at all." The king heard, at first, this discourse with some impatience: but being a dexterous dispenser, he seemed moved at last, and, laying his hand on Temple's, said, with a winning cordiality, 3 "And I will be the man of my people."

Temple, when he went abroad, soon found, that the scheme of mediating a peace was likely to prove abortive. The allies, besides their jealousy of Francis's mediation, expressed the greatest ardent for the continuance of the war; Holland had stipulated with Spain never to come to an accommodation, till all things in Flanders were restored to the condition in which they had been left by the Pyrenean treaty. The emperor had high pretensions in Alsace; and as the greater part of the empire joined in the alliance, it was hoped that France, so much overmatched in force, would soon be obliged to submit to the terms demanded of her. The Dutch, indeed, oppressed by heavy taxes, as part in it, a very refined and a very warm article was written upon the king. And, from a king who had a year, or commonly, a very few, tolerably paid in foreign affairs, to desire the people that he had pretended to these three measures, that he wished to have a treaty of alliance with the king of France, and to return to the former state of things, was but one more of those absurd pretensions, which we have read of, of absolute power pretended, that the French king on the throne, and for the support of France, and a war was already in progress among the catholics: it was to be observed, that in the number of the people, could mean nothing else. Our cannot sufficiently admire the absolute state, and that of Lewis, who, in gaining his own purposes, would not expose himself to himself. The French had been in the absolute state, and that of Lewis, who, in gaining his own purposes, would not expose himself to himself. The French had be well as checked in their commerce, were desirous of peace; and had few or no claims of their own to retard it: but they could not in a gratitude, or even in good policy, abandon the Parliament, that the peace had been achieved for their safety. The Prince of Orange likewise, who had great influence in their counsels, was all on fire for military fame, and was well pleased to be at the head of armies, from which he might obtain personal emolument. Under these pretences, he eluded, during the whole campaign, the meeting with Temple; and after the troops were sent into winter-quarters, he told that minister, in his first audience, that till greater impression were made on them, he could not be hoped for; and it was therefore vain to negotiate.

Campaign of The success of the campaign had not answered expectation. The Prince of Orange, with a superior army, was opposed in Flanders to the Prince of Condé, and had hoped to penetrate into France by that quarter, where the frontier was then very feebly. After long endeavours, though in vain, to bring Condé to a battle, he rashly exposed, at Nanteuil, a wing of his army; and that active prince failed not at once to see and seize the advantage. But this imprudence of the Prince of Orange was amply compensated by his behaviour in that obstinate and bloody action which ensued. He rallied his dispersing army, and pushed the veteran and martial troops of France; and he obliged the Prince of Condé, notwithstanding his age and character, to exert greater efforts, and to risk his person more than hitherto. For the Prince of Orange, having found that the youth, he had ever commanded. After sunset, the action was continued by the light of the moon; and it was darkness at last, not the weariness of the combatants, which put an end to the contest, and left the victory undecided. "The Prince of Orange," said Condé, with candour and generosity, "has acted in every thing like an old captain, except venturing his life too like a young soldier." Oudenarde was afterwards invested by the Prince of Orange; but he was obliged by the necessity of his situation to raise the siege on the approach of the enemy. He afterwards besieged and took Grave; and at the beginning of winter, the allied armies broke up, with great distress and complaints on all sides.

The allies were not more successful in other places. Lewis, in a few weeks, reconquered Franche-comté. In Alaisce, Turvaine displayed, against a mob superior enemy, all that military skill, which had long rendered him the most renowned captain of his age and nation. By a sudden and forced march, he attacked and beat at Sintheim the Duke of Lorrain, and Caprara, general of the imperialists. Several detachments were sent to Alaisce, and took up their quarters in that province, which had retired into Lorrain, returned unexpectedly upon them. He attacked and defeated a body of the enemy at Mulhausen. He chased from Colmar the Elector of Brandenburg, who commanded the German troops. He gained a new advantage at Turckheim. And having dissolved all the allies, he obliged them to repass the Rhine, full of shame for their multiplied defeats, and still more of anger and complaints against each other.

In England all these events were considered by the people with great anxiety and concern; though the king and his ministers affected great indifference with regard to them. Considerable discussions were about this time made in the English ministry. Buckingham was dismissed, who had long, by his wit and entertaining humour, possessed the king's favour. Arlington, now chamberlain, and Danby the treasurer, possessed chiefly the king's confidence. Great laurels and jealousy took place between these ministers; and public affairs were somewhat disturbed by their quarrels. But Danby daily gained ground with his master; and Arlington declined in the same proportion. Danby, who, after the departure of Marlborough, and his distribution among education and industry, he brought the revenue into tolerable order. He endeavoured so to conduct himself as to give offence to no party; and the consequence was, that he was all the more as a minister to the king, who had been of the French alliance; but never possessed authority enough to overcome the prepossession which the king and the duke retained towards it. It must be ascribed to the prevalence of that interest, aided by money remitted from France, the Duke of Monmouth was able to carry off at last; and they should attempt to engage the king in such measures against France, during the ensuing campaign. They met not till the approach of summer.

Every step, taken by the Commons, discovered that ill-nature and ill-will to A parliament, by which the late open measures of the king, and his present secret attachments, gave but too just foundation. They drew up a new bill against popery, and resolved to insert in it many severe clauses, for the detection and punishment of priests: they presented addresses a second time against Lauderdale; and when the king's answer was not satisfactory, they seemed still determined to persevere in their applications: an accusation was moved against Danby; but upon examining the several articles, it was not found to contain any just reasons of a prosecution; and was therefore dropped: they applied to the king for recalling his troops from the French service, and as he only promised that they should not be recreant, they appeared to be much dissatisfied with the answer: a bill was brought in, making it treason to levy money without authority of parliament; another, vacating the seats of such members who were dier, to secure the liberty of the subject, and to prevent sending any person prisoner beyond sea.

That the court party might not be idle during these attacks, a bill for an introduction of the House of Peers by the Earl of Lindsey. All members of either House, and all who possessed any office, were by this bill required to swear, that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the king; that they abjured the tyrannous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those who were commissioned by him; and that they will not at any time endeavour the alteration of the Protestant religion, or of the established government either in church or state.

Great opposition was made to this bill; as might be expected from the present disposition of the nation. During seventeen days, the debates were carried on with much zeal; and all the reason and learning of both parties were displayed on the occasion. The question, indeed, with regard to resistance, was a point which entered into the controversies of the old parties, cavalier and roundhead; as it made an essential part of the present disputes between court and country. Few neutrals were found in the nation: but among such as could maintain a calm indifference, those prevalent sentiments made of those which were adopted by either party. Such persons thought, that all general, speculative declarations of the legislature, either for or against resistance, were equally impolitic, and could serve to no other purpose, than to signalize in their turn this triumph of one faction over another; that the simplicity retained in the ancient laws of England, as well as in the laws of every other country, ought still to be preserved, and was best calculated to prevent the extremes on either side: that the absolute exclusion of resistance, in all possible cases, was founded on false principles; its express admission might be attended with dangerous consequences; and there was no necessity for exposing the public to either inconvenience: that if a choice must necessarily be made, in the case, the preference of utility to truth in public institutions was apparent; nor could the supposition of resistance beforehand, and in general terms, be safely admitted in any government: that even in mixed monarchies, where that supposition seemed most requisite, it was yet entirely superfluous; since no man, on the approach of extraordinary necessity, could be at a loss, though not directed by legal declarations, to find the proper remedy: that even those who advanced the notion of exclusion, all resistance, would yet hearken to the voice of nature; when evident ruin, both to themselves and to the public, must attend a strict adherence to their pretended principles, that the question ought to be entirely excluded from all determinations of the
HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

[A.D. 1675.—CHAP. LXVI.] 716

Legislature, was, even among private reasoners, somewhat frivolous, and little better than a dispute of words: that one party could not pretend that resistance ought ever to become a familiar practice; the other would sorely have recourse to it in great extremities: and thus the difference could only turn on the degrees of danger or oppression, which would warrant this irregular remedy; a difference which, in a general question, it was impossible, by any means, to fix or to prevent.

There were many other absurdities in this test, particularly of that kind of speech on oath not to alter the government either in church or state; since all human institutions are liable to correction, and require various amendments, which are, in reality, so many alterations. It is not indeed possible to make a law which does not innovate, more or less, in the government. These difficulties produced such obstructions to the Bill, that it was carried only by two voices in the House of Peers. All the popular Lords, headed by the Earl of Bristol, voted against it. It was sent down to the House of Commons, where it was likely to undergo a scrutiny still more severe.

But a quarrel, which happened between the two Houses, prevented the passing of every bill proposed during the present session. One Dr. Shirley, being cast in a law-suit before chancery against Sir John Fag, a member of the House of Commons, preferred a petition of appeal to the House of Peers. The Lords received it, and summoned Fag to appear before them. He complained to the lower House, who espoused his cause. They not only maintained the number of their House; but would not hear before the Peers: they also asserted, that the upper House could receive no appeals from any court of equity; a pretension which extremely retrenched the jurisdiction of the Peers, and which was contrary to the practice which had prevailed the whole century. The Commons now Shirley to prison; the Lords assert their powers. Conferences are tried; but no accommodation ensues. Four lawyers are sent to the Tower by the Commons, for transgressing the House of Lords, and offending in this cause, before the Peers. The Peers deem this arbitrary commitment a breach of the great charter, and order the lieutenant of the Tower to release the prisoners: he declines obedience; they apply to the king, and desire him to punish the lieutenant for his contempt. The king summons both Houses; excuses them to unanimity; and informs them that the present quarrel had arisen from the controvrsy of the two Houses on their enemies, who expected that measure would be a dissolution of the parliament. His advice has no effect: the Commons continue as violent as ever; and the king, finding that no business could be finished, at last prorogued the parliament.

Oct. 15. A parliament is assembled. The king desired supplies, as well for the building of ships, as for taking of anticipations which lay upon his revenue. He even confessed, that he had not been altogether so frugal as he might have been, and as he resolved to be for the future; though he asserted, that, to his great satisfaction, he had found his expenses by no means so exorbitant as some had represented them. The Commons took into consideration the subject of supply. They voted 300,000 pounds for the building of ships; but they appropriated the sum by very strict rules of precedence, and in such a manner, as not to grant any supply for taking off the anticipations of the revenue. This vote was carried, in a full House, by a majority of four only; so nearly were the parties balanced. The quarrel was removed, to which Dr. Shirley's cause had given occasion. The proceedings of the Commons discovered the same violence as during the last session. A motion was made in the House of Peers, but rejected, for addressing the king to dissolve the present Parliament. The king contented himself with proroguing them to a very long term. Whether these quarrels between the Houses arose from controvrsy or accident was not certainly known. Each party might, according to their different views, esteem themselves either gainers or losers by them. The court might desire to obstruct all attacks from the Commons, by giving them other employment. The country party might desire the dissolution of a parliament, which, notwithstanding all disputes, still contained too many royalists, ever to serve all the purposes of the malcontents.

Soon after the prorogation, the quarrel appeared, which, now obscure and indistinct, but tends already to mark the genius of the English government, and of Charles's administration during this period. The liberty of the constitution, and the variety as well as violence of the parties, had been greatly increased. Many of the houses, even as the coffee-houses in particular were the scenes, where the conduct of the king and the ministry was canvassed with great freedom, a proclamation was issued to suppress these places of rendezvous. Such an act of power, during former reigns, would have been grounded entirely on the necessity; and before the accession of the house of Stuart, no scruple would have been entertained with regard to that exercise of authority. But Charles, finding doubts to arise upon his government, had recourse to the judges, who supplied him with a censure, and that too a frivolous one, by which he might justify his proceedings. The law, which settled the excuse, enacted, that licenses for retaining houses of entertainment were to be granted by the King himself, for payment of the duties. But coffee was not a liquor subjected to excise; and even this power of refusing licenses was very limited, and could not reasonably be extended. The proclamation was therefore, after some time, revoked, observing the people to be much distressed, yielded to a petition of the coffee-men, who promised for the future to restrain all seditious discourse to their houses; and the proclamation was revoked whole.

This campaign proved more fortunate to the campaign of the confederates than any other during the earlier part of the war. The French took the field in Flanders with a numerous army; and Lewis himself served as a volunteer under the command of his brother Louis, during all this campaign. Lewis was still under great preparations, he could gain no advantages but the taking of Huy and Limbourg, places of small consequence. The Prince of Orange, with a considerable army, opposed him in all his motions; and neither side was decisive, without a visible advantage, to hazard a general action, which might be attended either with the entire loss of Flanders on one hand, or the invasion of France on the other. Lewis, on the other hand, thought of no immediate campaign, returned to Ver-sailles; and the whole summer passed in the Low Countries without any memorable event.

Turenne commanded on the Upper Rhine, in opposition to his great rival Montecuccoli, general of the imperialists. The only object the former was to pass the Rhine, whence he entered into Alsace, Lorraine, or Burgundy, and to fix his quarters in these provinces: the aim of the former was to guard the French frontiers, and to disappoint all the schemes of his enemy. The most consummate skill was displayed on both sides; and if any superiority appeared in Turenne's conduct, it was chiefly ascribed to his greater vigour of body, by which he was enabled to inspect all the posts in person, and could on the spot take the justest measures for the execution of his designs. By posting himself on the German side of the Rhine, he not only kept Montecuccoli from passing that river: he had also laid his plan in so mosty a manner, that, in a few days, he must have obliged him to retreat. This was a most consummate and security siderable advantage over them; when a period was put to his life, by a random shot, which struck him on the breast as he was taking a view of the enemy. The consternation of his army was insuperable. The French troops, who, at a moment before, were assured of victory, now considered themselves as entirely vanquished; and the Germans, who would have been glad to compound for a safe retreat, expected the severest vengeance. But de Lorges, nephew to Turenne, succeeded him in the command, and possessed a great share of the genius and capacity of his predecessor. By his skilful operations the French were enabled to repass the Rhine, without com-

Several historians have affirmed, that the Commons found, this season, the government, in the revenues arising from the taxes, amounting to 700,000 pounds a year; that the necessary expense was but 70,000, and have appealed to the Journal for a proof. But there is not the least appearance of this in the Journal, and the fact is impossible.
siderable loss; and this retreat was deemed equally glorious with the greatest victory. The valour of the English troops, who were placed in the rear, greatly contributed to save the French army. They had been seized with the same passion as the native troops of France, for their brave general, and fought with ardour to revenge his death on the Germans. The Duke of Marlborough, then Captain Churchill, here learned the rudiments of that art, which he afterwards practised with such fatal success against France.

The Prince of Condé left the army in Flanders under the command of Luxembourg; and carrying with him a considerable reinforcement, succeeded to Turenne's command. He defended Alsace from the Germans, who had passed the Rhine, and invaded that province. He obliged them first to raise the siege of Hagenau, then that of Sals-berge. He secured all their attempts to bring him to a battle; and, having dexterously prevented them from establishing themselves in Alsace, he forced them, notwithstanding their superiority of numbers, to repass the Rhine, and to take up winter-quarters in their own country.

After the death of Turenne, a detachment of the German army was sent to the siege of Treves: an enterprise, in which the imperialists, the Spaniards, the Palatines, the Duke of Lorraine, and many other princes, passionately concerned for their own interest, or otherwise actuated, engaged with vigour. Mareschal Crequi, on the other hand, collected an army, and advanced with a view of forcing the Germans to raise the siege. They left a detachment to guard the passes of the Rhine, and then attacked the army of the Duke of Zell and Ossemburg, marched in quest of the enemy. At Conarbric, they fell unexpectedly, and with superior numbers, on Crequi, and put him to rout. He escaped with a small body of horse, and having digested himself into Treves, resolved, by a vigorous defence, to make stone-ment for his former error or misfortune. The garrison was brave, but not abandoned to that total despair by which they resolved to impede upon her. The Dutch could not refuse the king's mediation, and the Congress of Nimeguen, after many difficulties, was at last fixed on as the place of congress; yet, under one head it could not be carried. He was to be in the hands of ambassadors, and no progress was made in the negotiation. Lord Berkeley, Sir William Temple, and Sir Lionel Jenkins, were the English ministers at Nimeguen. The French were represented by M. de K. who, knowing how Lewis, who hoped to divide the allies, and who knew that he himself could neither be seduced nor forced into a disadvantageous peace, sent ambassadors: the Swedes, who hoped to recover the north, which they had lost by the arm, were also forward to negotiate. But as these powers could not proceed of themselves to settle terms, the con-} emperor and Spain, two powers strictly coquined by blood and alliance, at last appeared. The Dutch had threatened, if they abstained themselves any longer, to proceed to a separate treaty with France. In the consequences and negotiations, the disposition of the parties became every day more apparent.

The Hollanders, loaded with debts and harasses with taxes, were destrous of putting an end to the war, in which, besides the disadvantages attending all leagues, the weakness of the Spaniards, the divisions and delays of the German, prognosticated nothing but trouble and misfortunes to their commerce. They, therefore, in the first instance, laid it to the charge of the commerce of England, by reason of her neutrality, flourished extremely; and they were apprehensive, lest advantages once lost, would never thoroughly be regained. They had themselves no further motive for continuing the war, than to secure a good frontier to Flanders: but gratitude to their allies still engaged them to try whether another campaign might procure a peace, which would give general satisfaction. The States of Orange, urged by motives of honour, of ambition, and of animosity against France, endeavoured to keep them steady to this resolution. The Spaniards, not to mention the other incurable weakness of the Hollanders, and their chances of falling, were disheartened with domestic dissensions between the parties of the queen-regent and Don John, natural brother to their young sovereign. Though unable of themselves to defend Flanders, they were ready to conclude a peace which would leave it exposed to every assault or inroad; and while they made the most magnificent promises to the States, their real trust was in the protection of England. They said that, if that small but important territory were once delivered by France, the Hollanders, exposed to so terrible a power, would fall into dependence, and would endeavour, by submissions, to ward off that destruction to which a war, in the heart of their state, must necessarily expose them. They believed that Lewis, sensible how much greater advantages he might reap from the alliance than from the subjection of the republic, which must scatter its people and depress its commerce, would be satisfied with very moderate conditions, and would turn his enterprises against his other neighbours. They thought it impossible but the people and parliament of England, foreseeing these obvious consequences, must at last force the king to take care of the safety of his dominions. They had found themselves entangled in such opposite motives and engagements, as he had not resolution enough to break, or patience to unravel. On the one hand, he always regarded his alliance with France as the only support of his kingdom among his own subjects, and whatever schemes he might still retain for enlarging his authority, or altering the established religion, it was from that quarter alone he could expect assistance. He had actually in secret sold his neutrality to France, and he received remittances of a million of livres a-year, which was afterwards increased to two millions; a considerable supply in the present embarrassed state of his revenue. And he dreaded lest the parliament should treat him as they had formerly done his father; and after they had engaged him in a war on the continent, should take advantage of his necessities, and make him purchase supplies by sacrificing his prerogative and abdicating his ministers.

On the other hand, the cries of his people and parliament, seconded by Danby, Arlington, and most of his ministers, incited him to take part with the allies, and to correct the unequal balance of power in Europe. He might apprehend danger from opposing such earnest desires; he might hope for large supplies if he concurred with them; and however inglorious and indolent his disposition, the renown of acting as aifter of Europe would probably have preserved him from his character, and move him to support the character with which he stood invested.

It is worthy of observation, that, during this period, the king was, by every one, abroad and at home, by France and by the allies, allowed to be the undisputed arbiter of Europe; and no terms of peace, which he would have prescribed, could have been refused by either party. Though France afterwards found means to resist the same alliance, joined with England; yet was she then obliged to make such violent efforts as quite exhausted her; and it was the utmost necessity which pushed her to all resources, far surpassing her own expectations. Charles was sensible, that so long as the war continued abroad, he should never enjoy ease at home, from the impatience and anxiety which it occasioned; nor could he not resolve an impose a peace by openly joining himself with either party. Terms advantageous to the allies must lose him the friendship of France; the contrary would enrage his parliament. Between these views he perpetually fluctuated; and from his conduct, it is observable, that a carelessness in his situation, agitated by opposite motives, is capable of as great inconsistencies as are incident even to the greatest imbecility and folly.

The parliament was assembled; and the 15th. Feb. king made them a plausible speech, in which he endeavoured to persuade them that the war was to be continued, and that the public peace could not be established, without the aid of foreign assistance.

The parliament were unwilling to hear this. A parliament. They declared it was to the interest of every prudent person to sue on the government for the conclusion of a peace; and that they would not consent to any laws for the further security of their religion, liberty, and property. The parliament was dissolved.

Before the parliament entered upon business, they were stopped by a riot of the people; when, at last, they were permitted to proceed. But nothing was done. It was only by means of the substance of the crown, that the restorers to the crown could avoid the imminent danger of the subject. It was determined to restore the crown to the absence of the king, and to take measures for the assistance of his personal estate. The king being in great need of money, was unwilling to impounce towards answering those questions, which might happen in all kingdoms, and which have been a considerable burden on me this last year.

The Commons at first seemed to proceed with temper. They granted the sum of 386,000 pounds, for building thirty ships; though they strictly appropriated the money to that service. They estimated the crown to be worth 270,000l. but it was afterwards found that they fell short near 100,000l. They also voted, agreeably to the king's request, the continuance of the additional excise for three years. This excise had been granted for nine years in 1666. Every thing seemed to promise a peaceable and an easy session.

But the parliament was roused from this tranquillity by the news of the war abroad. The French king had taken the field in the middle of February, and laid siege to Valenciennes, which he carried in a few days by storm. He next invaded both Cambray and St. Omer. The Prince of Orange, alarmed with his progress, hastily assembled an army, and marched to the relief of St. Omer. He was encountered by the French under the Duke of Orleans and Mareschal Luxembourg. The prince possessed great talents for war; courage, activity, vigilance, patience; but still he was inferior in genius to those consummate men who opposed him by Lewis; and though he always found the French ambition, and contrary to his interests, a little time against the victors, he was, during his whole life, unsuccessful. By a masterly movement of Luxembourg, he was here defeated, and obliged to retreat to Ypres. Courtrai and 54 Omer were soon after surrendered to Lewis.

This success, derived from such great power and such wise conduct, infused a just terror into the English parliament. They addressed the king, representing the danger to which the kingdom was exposed from the greatness of France, and praying that his majesty, by such alliances as he should think fit, would both secure his own dominions and the Spanish Netherlands, and thereby quiet the fears of his people. The king, desirous of eluding thisapplication, which he considered as a kind of attack on his measures, replied to general terms, that he would use all means for the preservation of Flanders, consistent with the peace and safety of his kingdom. This answer was an evasion, or rather a denial. The Commons, therefore, thought proper to be more explicit. They entreated him not to defer the entering into such alliances as might attain that great end: and in case war with the French king should be the result of his refusal, to grant to him all the aids and supplies which would enable him to support the honour and interest of the nation. The king was also more explicit in his reply. He told them, that the navy was exhausted by a war with France, and the king in a condition to make preparati ons for their security. This message was understood to be a demand of money. The parliament accordingly empowered the king to borrow on the additional excuse 200,000 pounds at seven percent: a very small sum indeed; but which they deemed sufficient, with the ordinary revenue, to equip a good squadron, and thereby put the nation in security, till further resolutions should be taken.

But this concession fell far short of the king's expectations. He therefore informed them, that, unless they granted him the sum of 600,000 pounds upon new funds, it would not be possible for him, without exposing the nation to manifest danger, to speak or act those things, which would answer the end of their several addresses. The House took this message into consideration: but before they came to any resolution, the king sent for them to Whitehall, where he told them, upon the word of a king, that they should not repent any trust which they would repose in him for the safety of his kingdom; that he would not for any consideration break credit with them, or employ any artifice to draw the nation into a condition to make preparations for their security. This speech brought affairs to a short issue. The king required them to trust him with a large sum; he pawned his royal word for their security: they must either run the risk of losing all their money, or fail of those alliances which they had projected, and at the same time declare to all the world the highest distrust of their sovereign.

Parliament's distrust of the king. But there were many reasons which determined the House of Commons to put no trust in the king. They considered, that the pretence of danger was obviously groundless, while the French were opposed by such powerful alliances on the continent, while the king was master of a good fleet at sea, and while all his subjects were so heartily united in opposition to foreign enemies. That the only justifiable reason, therefore, of Charles's backwardness, was not the apprehension of danger from abroad, but a diffidence, which he might have perhaps entertained of his parliament; lest, after engaging him to put the nation to a great charge, he should take advantage of his necessities, and extort from him concessions dangerous to the royal dignity. That this parliament, by their past conduct, had given no foundation for such suspicions; and, above all, that, in order to the satisfaction of the nation, that they had granted supplies for the first Dutch war; for maintaining the triple league, though concluded without their advice; even for carrying on the second Dutch war, which was entered into contrary to their opinion, and contrary to the safety and interest of England. That, on the other hand, the king bad, by former measures, excited very reasonable jealousies in his people, and did, with a bad grace, require at present their trust and confidence. That he had, without scruple, demanded supplies for maintaining the triple league, at the very time he was concert ing measures for breaking it, and had accordingly employed to that purpose the supplies which he had obtained by those delusive pretences. That his union with France, during the war against Holland, must have been founded on projects the most dangerous to his people; and as the same union was still secretly maintained, it might justly be feared that the same projects were not yet entirely abandoned. That he could not seriously intend to prosecute vigorous measures against France; since he had so long remained entirely unconcerned during such obvious dangers; and, till prompted by his parliament, whose proper business it was not to take the lead in those parts of administration, had suspended all his activity.

That if he really meant to enter into a cordial union with his people, he would have taken the first step, and have engaged them to prosecute their own ends, by putting up with it, to restore that confidence, which he had lost, by his rash and delusive measures. That it was in vain to ask so small a sum as 600,000 pounds, in order to secure him against the future attempts of the parliament; since that sum must soon be delivered to France, and be expended in maintaining his union with that kingdom, which was become, in some degree, essential to the constitution. That if he would form the necessary alliances, that sum or a greater would instantly be voted; nor could there be any reason to dread, that the parliament would immediately desert measures, in which they were engaged by their honour, their inclination, and the public interest. That the real ground, therefore, of the king's refusal, was either apprehension of danger from foreign enemies, or jealousy of parliamentary encroachments; but a desire of obtaining the money which he intended, notwithstanding his royal word, to employ to other purposes. And that, by using such dishonourable means to so ignoble an end, he rendered himself still more unworthy the confidence of his people.

The House of Commons was now regularly divided into two parties, the court and the country. Some were enlisted in the court party by offices, or a few by bribes secretly given them; a practice first begun by Clifford, a dangerous minister: but great numbers were attached merely by inclination; so far as they esteemed the measures of government to be the best which the king and his ministers had either employed or suggested; and faction had likewise drawn several into the country party: but there were also many of that party, who had no other object than the public good. These disinterested members on both sides fluctuated between the factions; and gave the superiority sometimes to the court, sometimes to the opposition. In the present emergency, a general distrust of the king prevailed; and the parliament resolved not to hazard their money in expectation of alliances, which, they believed, were never intended to be formed. Instead of granting the supply, they voted an address, wherein they "besought his majesty to enter into a league, offensive and defensive, with the States general of the United Provinces, against the growth and power of the French King, and for the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands; and to make such other alliances with the confederates as should appear fit and useful to that end." They supported these advice with good reasons; and promised speedy and effectual supplies, for preserving his majesty's honour, and ensuring the safety of the public. The king pretended the highest anger at this address, which he represented as a dangerous encroachment upon his prerogative. He reproved the Commons in strong terms; and ordered them immediately to be adjourned.

It is certain, that this was the critical moment when the king both might with ease have preserved the majesty of power in the whole of Europe, which it has since cost this island a great expense of blood and treasure to restore, and might by perseverance have at last regained, in some tolerable measure, after all past errors, the confidence of his people. This opportunity being neglected, the wound became incurable; and notwithstanding his momentary appearances of vigour against France and popery, and their momentary inclinations to rely on his faith; he was still believed to be at bottom engrossed in the same interest, and they soon relapsed into distrust and jealousy.

The secret memoirs of this reign, which have since been published, prove, beyond a doubt, that the king had, at this time, concerted measures with France, and had no intention to enter into a war in favour of the discontents, which happened, which promised a more prosaical issue to the quarrel with France, and revived the hopes of all the English who understood the interests of their country.

The king, saw, with regret, the violent discontent which prevailed in Europe, and which seemed every day to augment upon him. Desirous by his natural temper to be easy himself, and to make every body else easy, he sought expedients to appease those marmurs, which, as they were very disagreeable for the present, might, in their consequences, prove extremely dangerous. He knew that, during the late war with Holland, the malcontents at home had made applications to the Prince of Orange; and he continued still to neglect the prince's interest, and to thwart the inclinations of his own people, he apprehended lest their common complaints should cement a lasting union between them. He saw that the religion of the Dutch, and the nation with dissial apprehensions; and though he had obliged his brother to allow the young princes to be educated in the protestant faith, something further, he thought, was necessary, in order to satisfy the nation. He entertained, therefore, proposals for marrying the Prince of Orange to the Lady Mary, the elder princess, and hair apparent to the crown, (for the duke had no male issue,) and he hoped, by so tempting an offer, to engage him entirely in his interests. A peace he purposed to make, and which satisfied France, to remove his connexion with that crown: and he intended to sanctify it by the approbation of the prince, whom he found to be extremely revered in England, and respected throughout Europe.

All the recommendations of this alliance were seconded by the solicitations of Dunky, and also of Temple, who was at that time in England; and Charles at last granted permission to the prince, when the campaign should be over, to pay him a visit.

The king very graciously received his nephew at Newmarket. He would have entered immediately upon business; but the prince desired first to be acquainted with the Lady Mary; and he declared, that, contrary to the usual sentiments of persons of his rank, he placed a great part of happiness in domestic satisfaction, and would not, upon any consideration of interest or politics, match himself with a person disagreeable to him. He therefore introduced to her, who was found in the bloom of youth, and extremely amiable both in her person and her behaviour. The king now thought that he had a double tie upon him, and might safely expect his consent. The engagement was proposed to the prince to find the prince decline all discourse of business, and return to concert any terms for the general peace, till his marriage should be finished. He foresaw, he said, from the situation of affairs, that his allies were likely to have hard terms; and he never would expose himself to the reproach of having sacrificed their interest to promote his own purposes. Charles still believed, notwithstanding the cold, severe manner of the prince, that he would abate of that rigid punctilio of honour; and he procrastinated the time, hoping, by his own inaction and address, as well as by the allurements of liberal terms, to win him to compliance. One day, Temple found the prince in very bad humour, repenting that he had ever come to England, and resolve in a few days to leave it: but before he went, the king, he said, must choose the terms on which he should be contented. He therefore, he told him, when he pawned his royal word to his people, than to procure a grant of money; and he trusted, that while he eluded their expectations, he could not afterwards want presents for satisfying his conduct.

Negotiations meanwhile were carried on between France and Holland, and an eventual treaty was concluded; that is, all their differences were adjusted, provided they could afterwards satisfy their allies on both sides. This work, though in appearance difficult, seemed to be extremely forwarded by further bad successes on the part of the confederates, and by the great impatience of the Hollanders, to new expeditions, which promised a more prosaical issue to the quarrel with France, and revived the hopes of all the English who understood the interests of their country.

The king saw, with regret, the violent discontent which prevailed in Europe, and which seemed every day to augment upon him. Desirous by his natural temper to be easy himself, and to make every body else easy, he sought expedients to appease those murmurs, which, as they were very disagreeable for the present, might, in their consequences, prove extremely dangerous. He foresaw, he said, from the situa-in case of refusal, the king promised to enter immediately into the confederacy. To carry so imperious a message, and so little expected from the English court, Temple was the person pitched on, whose declared aversion to the French, and who was possessed of the most forcible and vigorous and promptitude in the execution of his commission. But Charles next day felt a reticence in this assumed vigour. Instead of Temple he despatched the Earl of Feversham, a creature of the duke's, and a Frenchman by birth; and he thought it wise to send to general, in case it was needless to aggravate it by a disagreeable messenger. The prince left London; and the king, at his departure, assured him that he never would abate in the least point of the scheme conceived, and would enter into war with Lewis, if he rejected it.

Negotiations. Lewis received the message with seeming gentleness and complacency. He told Feversham, that the king of England well knew that he might always be master of the peace; but some of the towns in Flanders it seemed very hard to demand, especially Tournay, upon whose fortifications such immense sums had been expended; he would therefore take some short time to consider of an answer Feversham said, that he was limited to two days' stay: but when that time was elapsed, he was prevailed on to remain some few days longer; and he came away at last without any positive answer. Lewis was not to be outdone by the French, and he did not break with him for one or two towns; and with regard to them, too, he would send orders to his ambassador at London to treat with the king himself. Charles was softened by this; and the whole was the blow was thus artfully eluded. The French ambassador, Barillon, owned at last, that he had orders to yield all except Tournay, and even to treat about some equivalent for that fortress, if the king absolutely insisted upon it. The prince was gone who had given spirit to the English court; and the negotiation began to draw out into messages and returns from Paris.

By intervals, however, the king could rouse himself, and show still some firmness and resolution. Finding that affairs were not likely to come to any conclusion with France, he summoned, notwithstanding the long adjournment, the parliament, on the fifteenth of January; an unusual measure, and capable of giving alarm to the French court. Temple was sent for to the council, and the king told him that he intended he should go to Holland, in order to form a treaty of alliance with the States; and that he supposed, if of it, it would be like the triple league, to force both France and Spain to accept of the terms proposed. Temple was sorry to find this act of vigour qualified by such a regard to France, and by such an appearance of solicitude for the interests of his sovereign. He told the king, that the resolution agreed on, was to begin the war in conjunction with all the confederates, in case of no direct and immediate answer from France; that this measure would satisfy the prince, the allies, and the people of England; advantages which could not be expected from such an alliance with Holland alone: that France would be disoblige, and Spain likewise; nor would the Dutch be satisfied with such a faint imitation of the triple league, a measure concerted when they were equally at peace with both parties. For these reasons, Temple declined the employment; and Lawrence Hyde, second son of Chancellor Chirendon, was sent in his place.

A.D. 1675. Temple of Orange, did not regard without contempt such symptoms of weakness and vigour conjoin the English councils. He was resolved, however, to make the best of a measure which he did not approve; and as Spain secretly consented that her ally should form a league, which was seemingly directed against her as well as France, but which was to fall only on the latter, the States concluded the treaty in the terms proposed by the king.

Meanwhile the English parliament met, after some new adjournments; and the king was astonished, that notwithstanding the resolve measures which he thought he had taken, great distrust and jealousy and discountenance were apt, at intervals, still to prevail among the members. Though in his speech he had allowed that a good peace could no longer be expected from negotiation, and assured them that he was resolved to enter into the war for that purpose, he was afraid to insert in their reply several harsh and even unreasonable clauses. Upon his reproving them, they seemed penitent, and voted, that they would assist his Majesty in the prosecution of the war. A fleet of ninety sail, an army of thirty thousand, and a million and a half of money, they voted. Great difficulties were made by the Commons with regard to the army, which the House, judging by past measures, believed to be intended more against the liberties of England, than against the progress of the French monarch. To this perilous situation had the king reduced both himself and the nation. In all debates, severe speeches were made, and were received with seeming approbation: the duke and the treasurer began to be apprehensive of impeachments: many motions against the king's ministers were lost by a small majority: the Commons appointed a day to consider the state of the kingdom with regard to popery; and they even went so far as to vote, that, whatever sooner the occasion, they would lay no further charge on the people, till secured against the prevalence of the Catholic party. In short, the parliament was impatient for war whenever the king seemed averse to it; he could not express a wish for peace; as soon as he complied with their requests, and seemed to enter into their measures.

The king was enraged at this last vote: he approached Temple with his usual severity of manner, and asked him how he thought the House of Commons could be trusted for carrying on the war, should it be entered on, when in the very commencement they made such declarations? The uncertainties indeed of Charles's conduct were so multiplied, and the jealousies on both sides so inculcable, that even those who approached nearest the scene of action could not determine, whether the king ever seriously meant to enter into a war, or whether, if he did, the House of Commons would not have taken advantage of his necessities, and made him purchase supplies by a great sacrifice of his authority.

The king of France knew how to avail himself of all the advantages which these distractions afforded him. By his emissaries, he represented to the Dutch the impudence of their depending on England, where an indolent king, averse to all war, especially with France, and irresolute in his measures, was actuated only by the usual breath of a factitious parliament. To the aristocratical party, he remarked the danger of the prince's alliance with the royal family of England, and revived their apprehensions: lest, for the sake of a temporary peace, they should be thus distinguished by the same alliance, he would violently attempt to enlarge his authority, and enslave his native country. In order to enforce these motives, Campan of 1678, with further terrors, he himself took the field very early in the spring; and after threatening Luxembourg, Mons, and Namur, he suddenly sat down before Ghent and Ypres, and in a few weeks made himself master of both places. This success gave great alarm to the Hollanders, who were nowise satisfied with the conduct of England, or with the ambiguous treaty lately concluded; and it quickened all their advances towards an accommodation.

In March, after the parliament had voted the supply, the king began to enlist forces; and such was the ardour of the English for a war with France, that an army of above 20,000 men, to the astonishment of Europe, was completed in a few weeks. Three thousand men, under the Duke of Monmouth, were sent over to secure Orleans; and some regiments were recalled from the French service; a fleet was fitted out with great diligence: and a quadruple alliance was projected between England, Holland, Spain, and the emperor.

But these vigorous measures received a sudden damp from a passionate address of the lower House; in which they justified all their past proceedings that had given disgust to the king; desired to be acquainted with the measures taken by him; prayed him to dismiss evil counsellors; and named in particular the Duke of Lauderdale, on whose removal they strenuously insisted. The King told them, that their address was so extravagant, that he was afraid to receive any answer to it, which he perceived to be the case.

And he began again to lend an ear to the proposals of Lewis, who offered him great sums of money, if he would consent to France's making an advantageous peace with the enemy.

Temple, though pressed by the King, refused to have any concern in so dishonourable a negotiation; but he informs us, that the king said, there was one article proposed, to which he assented, that he should never be afraid to forget it. William goes no further; but the editor of his works, the famous Dr. Swift, says, that the French, before they would agree to any payment, required as a preliminary, that the king should engage never to keep above 8000 regular troops in Great Britain. 1 Charles broke into a passion.

"Cod's fish," said he, his usual oath, "does my brother of France think to serve me thus? Are all his promises to me absolute, or are my people come to this! Or does he think that a thing to be done with eight thousand men?"

Van Beverning was the Dutch ambassador at Nimeguen, a man of great authority with the States. He was eager for peace, and was persuaded, that the salvation of the king, and the jealousies of the parliament, would for ever disappoint the allies in their hopes of succour from England. Orders were sent him by the States to go to the French court, to obtain a new blockade of the terms of the general treaty, as well as procure a present truce for six weeks. The terms agreed on were much worse for the Spaniards than those which had been planned by the King and the Prince of Orange. Six towns, some of them of no great importance, were to be restored to them: but Ypres, Conde, Valenciennes, and Tournay, in which consisted the chief strength of the frontier, were to remain with France.

Great expectations arose in England when it was known that Flanders was to be left in so defenceless a condition. The chief complaints were levelled against the king, who, by his concurrence at first, by his favour afterwards, and by his delays at last, had raised the power of France to such an enormous height, that it threatened the general liberties of Europe. Charles, uneasy under these imputations, dreading the consequence of losing the affections of his subjects, and perhaps disgusting them by the secret article proposed by the Duke of Buckingham, and other projects, where he heartily disapproved, would have restor'd him to his ancient popularity.

An opportunity unexpectedly offered itself for his display of the new disposition. While the ministers of Nimeguen were concerting the terms of a general treaty, the Marquis de Balbecres, the Spanish ambassador, asked the ambassadors of France, at what time France intended to restore the six towns in Flanders. They made no difficulty in declaring that the king, their master, being obliged to see an entire restitution made to the Swedes of all they had lost in the war, could not evacuate these towns till that crown had received satisfaction; and that this detention of places was the only means to induce the powers of the north to accept of the peace.

The States immediately gave the king intelligence of a pretention which might be attended with such dangerous consequences. The King was both surprised and angry. He immediately despatched Temple to concert with the

2 Sir John Dalrymple, in his Appendix, has given us, from Balbecres's despatches, some particulars of what passed between these intrusted. They were joined on Lord Russell, Lord Holland, Lord Ilchester, the Duke of Buckingham, and men of the court, Monmouth, Richmond, St. John, Sir Edward Harley, Sir John Farmer, Sir Roger Hill, Beverning, Van Beverning, and other great people. One of these last, Sir Edward Harley, was left to his own discretion, and the duke, engaged him, independently of the money, into the same novation, provided he would intimate to them by the Duke of Berwick, that France, therefore, with the parliament, were a roughly small expedition. These words, however, were not known, were of infinitely greater consequence. The sums distributed to all these men, excepting Montague, did not exceed 15,000 pounds in Lewis, and was bribed into an interest contrary to that of his people. His active schemes, in conjunction with France, were highly pernicious; his neutrality was equally ignominious; and the jealous refractory behaviour of the parliament, the Jacobites, and the disaffected citizens of himself, to judge by the late printed accounts, was to many greater ills, with which the public, from the misguided counsels of the king, was so nearly threatened.
Such were the dispositions of men's minds at the conclusion of the peace of Nieuwpoort: and these dispositions naturally prepared the way for the reverses which were to follow.

We must now return to the affairs of State of affairs Scotland, which we left in some disorder, in Scotland,
the suppression of the insurrection in 1666. The Next day Temple received an express from England, which informed him that the treaty lately concluded with the States, together with orders immediately to proceed to the exchange of th m. Charles was now returned to his former inclinations for war with France.

Van Beverning was loudly exclaimed against by the ambassadors of the allies at Nieuwpoort, especially those at Brandenburg and Denmark, whose masters were obliged, by the treaty, to restore all their acquisitions. The ministers of Spam and the emperor were sullen and disgusted:
and all men hoped that the States, unperturbed and encouraged by continual solicitations from England, would dissavow their ambassador and renew the war. The Prince of Orange even took an extraordinary step in order to engage the English and in order to have his own spleen and resentment. The day after signing the peace at Nieuwpoort, he attacked the French army at St.
Denis, near Monn; and gained some advantage over them, which, however, they, concluded to the latter and concluded the war to be finished. The prince knew, at least had reason to believe, that the peace was signed, though it had not been formally notified to him, and he here, sacrificial wantly, under a proper motive, the lives of many brave men on both sides, who fell in this sharp and well contested action.

Hyde was sent over with a view of persuading the States to disavow Van Beverning; and the king promised, that England, if the peace, which was signed at Nieuwpoort, would immediately declare war, and would pursue it, till France were reduced to reasonable conditions. Charles at present went further than words. He hurried on the embarkation of his army for Flanders; and all his preparations were a hostile appearance. But the States had been too often deceived to trust him any longer. They ratified the treaty signed at Nieuwpoort; and all the other powers of Europe were at last, after many, many months' disgusts, obliged to accept of the terms prescribed to them.

Peace of Nieuwpoort. glory which ambition can afford. His ministers and negociators appeared as much superior to those of all he had experienced the same time and the field. A successful war had been carried on against all an alliance, composed of the greatest potencies in Europe. Considerable conquests had been made, and his territories enlarged on every side. An advantageous peace was at last concluded, where he had given the law. The allies were so enraged against each other, that they were not likely to cement soon in any new confederacy. And thus he laid, during some years, a real prospect of attaining the monarchy of Europe, and of exceeding the empire of Charlemagne, perhaps equaling that of ancient Rome. Had England continued much longer in the same condition, and under the same government, it is not easy to conceive that he could have failed of his purpose.

In proportion as these circumstances exalted the French,
they excited indignation among the English, whose ani-mousity, raised by terror, mounted to a great height against that rival nation. Instead of taking the lead in the affairs of Europe, Charles, they thought, had, contrary to his own honour and interest, acted a part entirely subservient to the yelling of his Jacobite, the combing the establishment for project at all, or such as was highly criminal and danger-

nation; but laid claim to an entire superiority, and to the exercise of extreme rigour against their adversaries. The covenant, which they idolized, was a persecuting as well as a sedulous bond of confedera ery; and the government, instead of treating them like madmen, who should be soothed, and flattered, and deceived into tranquillity, thought themselves entitled to a rigid obedience, and were too apt, from a mistaken policy, to retaliate upon the dis- dained from the Scotch from the spirit of persecution. Amidst these disturbances, a new parliament was assembled at Edinburgh; and Lauderdale was sent down commissioner. The zealous presbyterians, who were the chief adherents of the covenant, were, as of old, to resist, with any success, the measures of government; and in parliament the tide still ran strongly in favour of monarchy. The commissioner had such influence as to get two acts passed, which were of great consequence to the ecclesiastical and civil liberties of the kingdom. By the one, it was declared, that the settling of all things, with regard to the external government of the church, was a right of the crown: that whatever related to ecclesiastical meetings, matters, and persons, was to be ordered according to such directions as the king should send to his privy council: and that these, being published by them, should have the force of laws. The other act regarded the militia, which the king, by his authority, had previously established, instead of the army, which was disbanded. By this act the militia was settled to the number of 22,000 men, who were to be constantly armed and regularly disciplined. And, if any rebels should be found, they were to be held in readiness to march into England, Ireland, or any part of the king's dominions, for any cause in which his majesty's authority, power, or greatness, was concerned; on receiving orders, not from the king himself, but from the privy council of parliament. Lauderdale boasted extremely of his services in procuring these two laws. The king, by the former, was rendered absolute master of the church, and might legally, by the latter, do what he pleased, and, if thought fit, the establishment of religion in Scotland. By the latter, he saw a powerful force ready at his call: he had even the advantage of being able to disguise his orders under the name of the privy council; and in case of failure in his enterprise, could, by such a pretence, apologize for his conduct to the parliament of England. But in proportion as these laws were acceptable to the king, they gave alarm to the English Commons, and were the chief cause of the re- cision of that act which they made against the King's forces. These attacks, however, served only to fortify him in his interest with the king: and though it is probable that the militia of Scotland, during the divided state of that kingdom, might have been of some use to the government, had it been in a condition of little service against England; yet did Charles regard the credit of it as a considerable support to his authority: and Lauderdale, by degrees, became the prime, or rather sole, minister for Scotland. The natural indolence of the king disposed him to place entire confidence in a man who had so far extended the royal prerogative, and who was still disposed to render it absolutely uncontrollable.

In a subsequent session of the same parliament, a severe law was enacted against conventicles. Rigorous fines were imposed both on the preachers and bearers, even if the meetings had been in houses, but field conventicles were subjected to the penalty of death, and confiscation of goods. The commissioners, for which they made the reward to those who should seize the criminals; and they were indemnified for any slaughter which they might commit in the execution of such an undertaking. And as it was found difficult to get evidence against these conventicles, however numerous, it was enacted by another law, that whoever, being required by the council, refused to give information upon oath, should be punished by an imprisonment. Thus all persecution naturally, or rather necessarily, adopts the iniquities, as well as rigours, of the inquisition. What a considerable part of the society consider as their duty and honour, and even many of the opposite party are apt to regard with compassion and dulgence, can by no other expedient be subjected to such severe penalties as the natural sentiments of mankind appropriate only to the greatest crimes.

Though Lauderdale found this ready compliance in the parliament, he did not forget to recommend himself to the king, who, during the present depression and insufficiency of the revenue, was not able to repay the expenses of Lauderdale's administration. But even their complaints to him might be dangerous; and all approaches of truth to the throne were barred by the ridiculous law against conventicles. Any malcontents who had been extorted by the ancient nobility, in order to protect their own tyranny, oppression, and injustice. Great precautions therefore, were used by the Scottish malcontents in their representation to the king; but no redress was obtained. Charles leaned them with caresses, and continued Lauderdale in his authority.

A very bad, at least a severe, use was made of this authority. The privy council dispatched twelve gentlemen or noblemen of their houses; which were converted into so many garrisons, established for the suppression of conventicles. The nation, it was pretended, was really, on account of these religious assemblies, in a state of war; and by the king's orders, all who were not in the army were required to place a garrison in any house where he should judge it expedient.

It was endless to recount every act of violence and arbitrary law against the adversaries of the state. Any proposal to retract the former, was at the moment of its adoption, and its representation to the state. All the lawyers were put from the bar, nay, banished, by the king's order, twelve miles from the capital, and by that means the whole justice of the kingdom was suspended for a year; till these lawyers were brought to declare, as their opinion, that all the laws on which they were grounded were illegal. A letter was procured from the king, for expelling twelve of the chief magistrates of Edinburgh, and declaring them incapable of all public office, though their only crime had been their adherence of obedience with Lauderdale. The boroughs of Scotland have a privilege of meeting once a-year by their deputies, in order to consider the state of trade, and make bye-laws for its regulation: in this convention petition was voted, complaining of some late acts, which obstructed commerce, and praying the king that he would empower his commissioner, in the next session of parliament, to give his assent for repealing them. For this presumption, as it was called, several of the members were fined and imprisoned. The king, as a member of parliament, having moved to the House, that, in imitation of the English parliament, no bill should pass except after three readings; he was, for this pretended offence, invited to the bar of the House, there to be tried by the commissioner.

The private department of Lauderdale was as insolent and provoking as his public administration was violent and tyrannical. Justice likewise was universally perverted by faction and interest: and from the great capacity of that duke, and still more of his duchess, all offices and favours were openly put to sale. No one was allowed to approach the throne who was not dependent on him; and no remoter could be hoped for or obtained against his manifold oppressions. The case of Mitchel shows that this minister was as much destitute of truth and honour, as of lenity and justice.

Mitchel was a desperate fanatic, and had entertained a resolution of taking arms to defend religion. Archbishop of St. Andrews, who, by his former apostasy and subsequent rigour, had rendered himself extremely odious to the covenanters. In the year 1668, Mitchel fired a pistol at the prince, as he was sitting in his coach; but the Bishop of Orkney, stepping into the coach, happened to stretch out his arm, which intercepted the ball, and was much shatter y by it. This happened in the principal street of the city; but so generally was every act of annoyance to the prince allowed peaceably to walk off; and having turned a street or two, and thrown off a wig, which disguised him, he immediately appeared in public, and remained altogether unsuspected. Some years after, Sharpe remarked one, who seemed to eye him very eagerly; and being still and to humble them against the established hierarchy.

The commotions were ever so numerous, and early in the western counties, frequent conventicles without reserve; and the gentry, though they themselves commonly abstained from these illegal places of worship, condescended at this irregularity in their inferiors. In order to interest the forms and proceedings of the law, a convention or contract was, by order of the privy council, tendered to the landlords in the west, by which they were to engage for the good behaviour of their tenants; and in case of any tenant frequenting conventicles, the landlord was to subject himself to the same fine, as could by law be exacted from the delinquent. It was ridiculous to give sanction to laws by voluntary contracts; it was iniquitous to make one man answerable for the conduct of another, and to impose such hard conditions upon men, who had no wise offended. For these reasons the greater part of the county refused to sign these bonds; and Lauderdale, engaged at this opposition, endeavored to break their spirit by expedients which were still more unusual and more arbitrary.

The law enacted against conventicles, had called them seminaries of rebellion. This expression, which was nothing but a reproach of the other side, Lauderdale and the privy council were willing to understand in a literal sense; and because the western counties abounded in conventicles, though otherwise in profound peace, they pretended to bring in the spirit of a state of open war into these free counties. They made therefore an agreement with some highland chieftains to call out their clans, to the number of 8000 men: to these they joined the guards, and the militia of Angus: and they sent the whole to live at free quarters upon the lands of such as had refused the bonds illegally required of them. The obnoxious counties were the most populous and most industrious in Scotland. The highlanders were the people the most disordered and the least civilized. It is easy to imagine the havoc and destruction that would have ensued. A multitude, not accustomed to discipline, averse to the restraint of laws, trained up in rapine and violence, were let loose amidst those whom they were taught to regard as enemies to their prince and to their religion. Nothing escaped their ravenous hands: by menaces, by violence, and sometimes by terrors, men were obliged to discontinue their unremitted wealth. Neither age, nor sex, nor innocence, afforded protection; and the gentry, finding that even those who had been most compliant, and who had subscribed the bonds, were equally exposed to the rapacity of those barbarians, confirmed themselves still more in the resolve of refusing them. The voice of the nation was raised against the council in this affair: and after a free quarter, the highlanders were sent back to their hills, loaded with the spoils and executions of the west.

Those who had been engaged to subscribe the bonds, finding themselves could find no security, by turning themselves to the law, they suspected of an inclination to conventicles, and thereby depopulating their estates. To increase the misery of these unhappy farmers, the council enacted, that none should be received any where, or allowed a habitation, who brought not a certificate of his conformity from the parish minister. That the obstinate and refractory might not escape further persecution, a new device was fallen upon. By the law of Scotland, every man, who should go before a magistrate, and swear that he thought himself in danger from another, might obtain a writ of law-breaking, as it is called; by which the latter was bound, under the penalty of imprisonment and outlawry, to find security for his good behaviour. Lauderdale entertained the absurd notion of making the squire out writs of law-breakers against his subjects. On this pretence, the refusers of the bonds were summoned to appear before the council, and were required to bind themselves, under the penalty of two years' retd, neither to frequent conventicles themselves, nor allow their family and tenants to be present at these unlawful assemblies. Thus chicanery was joined to tyranny; and the majesty of the king instead of being revered, was in reality prostituted; as if he were obliged to seek the security of his own subjects, which one neighbour might require of another.

It was an old law, but seldom executed, that a man who was accused of any crime, and did not appear, in order to stand his trial, might be intercompelled, that is, he might be publicly outlawed; and whoever afterwards, either on account of business, relation, or charity, had the least intercourse with him, was subjected to the same penalties as could by law be inflicted on the criminal himself. Several persons, not communicating were not indicted against the hearers and preachers in conventicles; and by this severe and even absurd law, crimes and guilt went on multiplying in a geometrical proportion. Where laws themselves are so violent, it is no wonder that an administration should be growing hard and intolerable.

Lest the ery of an oppressed people should reach the throne, the council forbade, under severe penalties, all noblemen or gentlemen of landed property to leave the kingdom: a severe edict, especially where the sovereignty itself resided in a foreign country. Notwithstanding this act of council, Cassillis first, afterwards Hamilton and Tweddale, went to London and had their complaints before the king. These violent proceedings of Lauderdale were opposed to the natural temper of Charles; and he immediately issued orders for discontinuing the bonds and the writs of law-boroughs. But as he was commonly little touched with what lay at a distance, he entertained not the proper indignation against those who had abused his authority: even while he retracted these oppressive measures, he was prevailed with to arrow and praise them, in a letter which he wrote to the privy council. This proof of confidence might fortify his hatred. Sir George Hamilton, the learned physician, to poison him. This intelligence, he added, had been communicated to him by Doctor Tongue; whom, if permitted, he would introduce to his majesty. Tongue for some time, against the advice and wishes of his active, restless, full of projects, void of understanding. He brought papers to the king, which contained information of a plot, and were dug into forty-three articles.

The king, not having leisure to peruse them, sent them to the treasurer Danby, and ordered the two informers to lay the business before that minister. Tongue confessed to Danby, that he himself had not drawn the papers, that they had been secretly thrust under his door, and that, though he suspected, he did not certainly know, who was the author. After a few days he returned, and told the treasurer, that his suspicions, he found, were just; and that the author of the intelligence, whom he had met twice or thrice in the street, had acknowledged the whole matter, and had given him a more particular account of the conspiracy, but desired that his name might be concealed, being apprehensive lest the papists should murder him.

The minister was requested to demand of the impostors and Tongue the intentions of shooting the king; and Tongue even pretended that, at a particular time, they were to set out for Windsor with that intention. Orders were given to bring the person engaged in the plot to Windsor; but no papers, no confessor, no confession, appeared in that place: but though this alarm was more than once renewed, some frivolous reasons were still found by Tongue for their having delayed the journey. And the king concluded, both from these erasions, and from the mysterious, artificial manner of communicating the intelligence, that the whole was an imposture.

Tongue came next to the treasurer, and told him, that a packet of letters, written by Jesuits concerned in the plot, was that night to be put into the post-house for Windsor, directed to Benfield, a Jesuit, confessor to the duke. When this intelligence was conveyed to the king, he replied, that the packet mentioned had a few hours before been brought to the duke by Benfield; who said, that he suspected some bad design upon him; that the letters seemed to contain matters of a dangerous import; and that he knew them not to be the handwriting of the persons whose names were subscribed. He could not imagine the incident still further confirmed the king in his incredulity.

The matter had probably slept for ever, had it not been for the anxiety of the duke; who, hearing that priests and Jesuits, who had been at a meeting with himself, had been accused, was desirous that a thorough inquiry should be made by the council into the pretended conspiracy. Kirby and Tongue were inquired after, and were now found to be living in close conjunction with Tiques; and the person who was said to have conveyed the first intelligence to Tongue. Gates affirmed, that he had fallen under suspicion with the Jesuits; that he had received three blows with a stick, and a box on the ear from the provincial of that order, for revealing their conspiracy; and that, overpowered with his pain and the severity of his treatment, he had withdrawn and concealed himself. This man, in whose breast was lodged a secret, involving the fate of kings and kingdoms, was allowed to remain in such seclusion, that no person was allowed to supply him with food daily; and it was a joyful surprise to him, when he heard that the council was at last disposed to take some notice of his intelligence. But as he expected more encouragement from the public, than from the king or his himself, unable to plead good cause, he retired from the council, to go with his two companions to Sir Ed- monsbury Godfrey, a noted and active justice of peace, and to give evidence before him of all the articles of the conspiracy.

The wonderful intelligence, which Oates's narrative conveyed both to Godfrey and the council, and afterwards to the parliament, was to this purpose. The Pope, he said, on examining the matter in the con- gregation de propaganda, had found himself entitled to the possession of England and Ireland on account of the heresy of prince and people, and had accordingly assumed the sovereignty of these kingdoms. This supreme power he declared to have undergone the great fire, that the fire of Jesuitical superstition and De Oliva, general of that order, in consequence of the papal grant, had exerted every act of regal authority, and particularly had supplied, by commissions under the seal of the regal authority, all the mandates and military orders. Lord Arundel was created chancellor, Lord Powis treas- urer, Sir William Godolphin privy seal, Coleman secretary of state, Langhome attorney general, Lord Bellasis general of the papal army, Lord Peters lieutenant-general, Lord Stafford paymaster; and inferior commissions signed by the provincial of the Jesuits, were distributed all over England. All the dignities, too, of the church were filled, and many of them with Spaniards and other foreigners. The provincial had filled a council of the Jesuits under his authority; where the king, whom they opprobriously called the Black Bastard, was solemnly tried and con- demned as a heretic; and a resolution taken to put him to death. Father le Shee (for so great a plotter and in- former called Father la Chaise, the noted confessor of the French king) had consigned in London ten thousand pounds, to be paid to any man who should merit it by this assassination. A Spanish provincial had expressed like liberality towards the English catholics was willing to the length of six thousand: the Dominicans approved of the action; but pleaded poverty. Ten thousand pounds had been offered to Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, to stir him up to fire a design against the king; for so great a service his demand was complied with: and five thousand had been paid him by advance. Lest this means should fail, four Irish ruffians had been hired by the Jesuits, at the rate of twenty guineas a-piece, to stab the king at Windsor; and Coleman, secretary to the late Duchess of York, had given the messenger, who carried them orders, a guinea to quicken his diligence. Grove and Pickering were also employed to shoot the king with silver bullets; the former was to receive the sum of fifteen hundred pounds; the latter, being a pious man, was to be rewarded with thirty thousand masses, which, estimating masses at a shilling a-piece, amounted to a like value. Pickering would have executed his purpose, had not the flint at one time drop out of his pistol, at another time the priming. Comer, the Jesuit, had bought a knife at the price of ten shillings, which he thought was not dear, consi- dering the purpose for which he intended it, to stab the king. Letters of subscription were circulated among the catholics all over England, to raise a sum for the same purpose. No less than fifty Jesuits had met in May last, at the White-horse tavern, where it was unanim- ously resolved to murder the king himself. This plot did afterwards, for more convenience, divide themselves into many lesser cabals or companies; and Oates was em- ployed to carry notes and letters from one to another, all tending to the same end, of murdering the king. He even cured by the intrigues of the Catholic and French party, who thereby intended to show the Dutch and their conced to the execution of the Catholic designs. The king asked him, what sort of a man Don John was; he answered, a tall lean man; directly contrary to truth, as the king well knew. He totally mistook the situation of the Spanish ambassador at Paris, and pretended great intimacies with Coleman, he knew him not, when placed very near him; and had no other excuse than that his sight was bad in candle-light. He fell into like mistakes with regard to himself, and the favours of the king, had inspired the Catholic priests with new hopes of recovering in these islands their lost dominion, and gave fresh vigour to that impertinent zeal by which they are commonly actuated. Their first aim was to obtain a toleration; and such was the evidence, they believed, of their theological tenets, that could they

but procure entire liberties, they must infallibly in time

open the eyes of the people. After they had converted considerable numbers, danger was threatened, to reinsure themselves in full authority, and entirely to suppress that heresy, with which the kingdom had so long been infected. Though these dangers to the Protestant religion were great, they appeared not such as to make it necessary to find that the heir of the crown was so blinded with bigotry, and so deeply engaged in foreign interests;

and that the king himself had been prevailed on, from fear and anxiety, to hearken to his dangerous insinuations.

Very great consequences might ensue from such pernicious

and attachments; nor could the nation and parliament guard against them with too anxious a precaution. But that the Roman pontiff could hope to assume the sovereignty of these islands, is by no means probable; as, even during the darkness of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, would have appeared chimerical; that he should delegate this authority to the Jesuits, that order in the Roman church, which was the most hated; that a massacre could be attempted of the Protestants, who surpassed the Catholics

a hundred fold, and were invested with the whole authority of the state; that the king himself was to be assassinated, and even the duke, the only support of the party; these were things so extraordinary and impolitic, sufficient to prove; much less the evidence of one man, who was noted for infamy, and who could not keep himself, every moment, from falling into the grossest incompet-encies. In other passages the king's confidence in the picture of Aligamp's, the salvation of his own soul, and the conversion of our poor kingdom. In other passages the interest of the crown of England, those of the French king, and those of the Catholic religion, are spoken of as impossible. The duke is also said to have connected his interests unalterably with those of Lewis. The king himself, he affirms, is always inclined to favour the Catholics,

when he may do it without hazard. "Money," Coleman

adds, "cannot fill of persuading the king to any thing.

There is nothing which cannot make him do, were it ever so much to his prejudice. It has an absolute power over him, that he cannot resist it. Logic, built upon money, that in our country more important considerations than any other sort of argument." For these reasons, he proposed to Father In Chasse, that the French king should remit

the sum of 300,000 pounds on condition that the parliament be dissolved; a measure to which, he affirmed, the king was, of himself, sufficiently inclined, were it not for his hopes of obtaining money from that assembly. The parliament, he said, had already constrained the king to make peace with Africa, which was contrary to the views of the catholic religion, and of his most Christian majesty; and if they should meet again, they would surely engage him further,

even to the making of war against France. It appears also from the same letters, that the assembling of the par-lement so late as April in the year 1675, had been pro-

self: he had rings on his fingers, and money in his pocket: it was therefore inferred, that he had not fallen into the hands of robbers. Without further reasoning, the cry rose, that he had been assassinated by the papists, on account of his taking Oates's evidence. This clamour was quickly propagated, and met with universal belief. The public were conscious to the inextricable complexity of the whole conspiracy, and all men, astonished with fear, and animated with rage, saw in Godfrey's fate all the horrible designs ascribed to the catholics, and no further doubt remained of Oates's veracity. The claptrap heard about the irritated sect; and, notwithstanding that the bloody conspiracy was supposed to be now detected, men could scarcely be persuaded that their lives were yet in safety. Each chiefs seemed with new rumours and dangers. In general, visions from abroad, insurrections at home, mutual jealousies, even private murders and poisonings, were apprehended. To deny the reality of the plot was to be an accomplice: to hesitate was criminal: royalist, republican, churchman, secretary, courtier, patriot; all parties concurred in the illusion. The city prepared for its defence, as if the enemy were at its gates: the chains and posts were put up: and it was a noted saying at that time of Sir Thomas Player, the charlemagne, that were it not for these precautions, all the citizens might rise next morning with their throats cut.

In order to propagate the popular frenzy, several artisans were employed to keep the streets and the corners of the city filled with their spectator. The funeral pomp was celebrated with great parade. The corpse was conducted through the chief streets of the city: seventy-two clergymen marched before: above a thousand persons a procession followed after. The funeral cortège, two hundred strong, mounted the pulpit, and stood on each side of the preacher, lest, in paying the last duties to this unhappy magistrate, he should, before the whole people, be murdered by the papists.

In this disposition of the nation, reason could no more be heard than a whisper in the midst of the most violent hurricane. Even at present, Godfrey's murder can scarcely, upon any system, be rationally accounted for. That be was assassinated by the catholics, seems utterly improbable. These religionists could not be engaged to commit that crime from policy, in order to deter other magnates from acting against them. They were many wise capable of producing that effect, unless it were publicly known, that the catholics were his murderers; an opinion which, it was easy to foresee, must prove the ruin of the pause. These magnates, during more than a century, had acted in this manner, towards one another against the catholics, without its ever been suspected that any one had been cut off by assassination! Such jealous times as the present were surely ill fitted for beginning these dangerous experiments. Shall we therefore say, that the catholics were pushed on, not by policy, but by blind revenge against Godfrey! But Godfrey had given them little or no occasion of offence in taking Oates's evidence. His part was merely an act of form, belonging to his office; nor could he, ur any man in his station, possibly refuse it. In the rest of his conduct, he lived on good terms with the catholics, and was far from distinguishing himself by his severity against that people. It is even certain that he had contracted no intimacy with Cole- man, and took care to inform his friend of the danger to which, by reason of Oates's evidence, he was at present exposed.

There are some writers, who, finding it impossible to account for Godfrey's murder by the machinations of the catholics, have recourse to the opposite supposition. They lay hold of that obvious presumption, that those commit the crime who reap advantage by it: and they affirm that it was Shaftesbury, and the heads of the popular party, who perpetrated that deed, in order to throw the odium of it on the papists. If this supposition be received, it must also be admitted, that the whole plot was the contrivance of those politicians of that time, who were ardent under their direction. But it appears that Oates, dreaded probably the opposition of powerful enemies, had violently and solemnly purchased the duke, Danby, Ormond, and all the ministry; persons who were certainly the most ob- stinate to the popular leaders. Besides, the whole texture of the plot contains such low absurdity, that it is impossible to have been the invention of any man of sense or education. It is true, the more monstrous and horrible the conspiracy, the better it was fitted to terrify, and hence to convince, the populace: but this effect, we may safely say, no one could beforehand have expected; and a fool was in this case more likely to succeed than a wise man.

But Lord Shaftesbury laid the plan of a popish conspiracy, he had probably rendered it moderate, consistent, credible; and on that very account had never met with the prodigious success, with which Oates's tremendous fictions were attended.

We must, therefore, be contented to remain for ever ignorant of the actors in Godfrey's murder; and only pronounce in general, that that event, in all likelihood, had no connexion, one way or other, with the popish plot. Any man, especially so active a magistrate as Godfrey, much in such a city as London, has many enemies, of which his friends and family had no suspicion. He was a melancholy man; and there is some reason, notwithstanding the public confidence of the contrary, to believe that he fell by his own hands. The affair was never examined with tranquillity, or even with common sense, during the time; and it is impossible for us, at this distance, certainly to account for it.

No one doubted but the papists had assassinated Godfrey; but still the particular actors were unknown. A proclamation was issued by the king, offering a pardon and reward of five hundred pounds to any one who should discover them. As it was a sermon, and unexchangeable, that the theme of a like assassination would prevent discovery, a new proclamation was issued, promising absolute protection to any one who should reveal the secret. Thus were indemnity, money, and security offered to the fairest holder: and no one needed to fear, during the present fury of the people, that his evidence would undergo too severe a scrutiny.

While the nation was in this ferment, the parliament was assembled. In his speech, the king told them, that, though they had given money for disturbing the army, he had found Flanders so exposed, that he had thought it fit to resist. He was, at the same time, and doubted not but this measure would meet with their approbation. He informed them, that his revenue lay under great expectations, and at best was never equal to the constant expense of the popish conspiracy; as would appear from the state of it, which he intended to lay before them. He also mentioned the plot formed against his life by Jesuits; but said, that he would forbear delivering any opinion of the matter, lest he should seem to say too much or too little; and that he would leave the scrutiny of it entirely to the law.

The king was anxious to keep the question of the popish plot from the parliament; where, he suspected, many design- ing people would very much abuse the present credibility of the nation; but Danby, who hated the catholics, and courted popularity, and perhaps hoped that the king, if his life were believed in danger from the Jesuits, would be more cordially disposed to the contrary, of the two, had adopted opposite designs; and the very first day of the session, he opened the matter in the House of Peers. The king was extremely displeased with this temerity, and told his minister, 'Though you do not believe it, you will find, that you have given the parliament a handle to run upon, as well as to disturb all my affairs; and you will surely live to repent it.' Danby had afterwards sufficient reason to applaud the sagacity of his master.

The cry of the house was immediately echoed from one House to the other. The authority of parliament gave sanction to that fury, with which the people were already agitated. An address was re-throwing the charges of his naval armament, and for paying the Princess of Wales's portion.
voted for a solemn fast; a form of prayer was contrived for that solemnity; and because the popish plot had been omitted in the first draft, it was carefully ordered to be inserted; lest Ominousness should want intelligence; to use the word of the King.

In order to continue and propagate the alarm, addresses were voted for laying before the House such papers as might discover the horrible conspiracy; for the removal of popish prejudices; for making manifest every degree where the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; for denying access to court to all unknown or suspicious persons; and for appointing the trans-stands of London and Westminster to be in readiness. The Lords Powis, Stafford, Arran, Peters, and Bellaun, were committed to the Tower, and were soon after impeached for high treason. And both Houses, after hearing Oates's evidence, voted, "That the Lords and Commons are of opinion, that there has been, and still is, a damnable and hellish plot, contrived and carried on by the popish recusants, for assassinating the king, for subverting the government, and for rooting out and destroying the protestant religion.

So vehement were the Houses, that they sat every day, forenoon and afternoon, on the subject of the plot: for no other business could be attended to. A committee of Lords was appointed to examine prisoners and witnesses: blank warrants were put into their hands, for the committee might be ascended. Of the whole, no, though his evidence were true, must, by his own account, be regarded as an infamous villain, was by every one applauded, caressed, and called the saviour of the nation. The Government was repeated by the House of Commons. He was lodged in Whitchall, protected by guards, and encouraged by a pension of 1200 pounds a-year.

Bedloe's warrant, concerning the supposed new witnesses William Bedloe, a man, if possible, more infamous than Oates, appeared next upon the stage. He was of very low birth, had been noted for several cheats and even thieves, had travelled over many parts of Europe under borrowed names, had frequently posed himself for a man of quality, and had endeavoured, by a variety of lies and contrivances, to prey upon the ignorant and unwary. When he appeared before the council, he gave intelligence of Godfrey's murder only, which he said, he had been perpetrated in Somerset-house, where the queen lived, by papists, some of them servants in her family. He was questioned about the plot; but utterly denied all knowledge of it, and also asserted that he had no acquaintances with Oates. Next day, when examined before the committee of Lords, he betook himself better, and was ready to give an ample account of the plot, which he found so anxiously inquired into. This narrative he made to tally, as well as he could, with the account which had been given: but being he could make him self acceptable by new matter, he added some other circumstances, and these still more tremendous and extraordinary. He said, that ten thousand men were to be landed from Flanders in Burlington Day, and immediately to seize Hull: that Jersey and Guernsey were to be surprized by forces from Brest; and that a French fleet was, all last summer, hovering in the channel for that purpose: that the Lords Powis and Peters were to form an army in Radnorshire, to be joined by another army, consisting of twenty or thirty thousand religious men and pilgrims, who were to land at Milford Haven from St. Iago in Spain; that there were forty thousand men ready in London; besides those, who would, on the alarm, be posted at every alehouse door, in order to kill the soldiers, as they came out of their quarters: that Lord Stafford, Coleman, and Father Ireland, had money sufficient to defray the expenses of all these armaments: that he himself was to receive four thousand pounds, as one that could murder a man; as also a commission from Lord Bellaun, and a benefaction from the Pope: that the king was to be assassinated; all this time the Pope, who would not seriously be converted; the government offered to ore, if he would consent to hold it of the church, but if he should refuse that condition, as was suspected, the supreme authority would be given to certain lords under the nomination of the Pope. In a subsequent examination before the Commons, Bedloe added, (for these men always brought out their intelligence successively and by piece-meal,) that Lord Carrington was to be assassinated also in the capacity for raising money for the government; as was likewise Lord Brunedel. These noblemen, with all the other persons mentioned by Bedloe, were immediately committed to custody by the parliament.

It is remarkable, that the only resource of Spain, in her present decayed condition, lay in the assistance of England; and so far from being in a situation to transport ten thousand men for the invasion of that kingdom, she had solicited and obtained English forces to be sent into the garrisons of Flanders, which were not otherwise able to defend themselves against the French. The French too, we may observe, were at that very time in open war with Spain, and yet are supposed to be engaged in the same design against England; as if religious motives were become the sole actuating principle among sovereigns. But none of these circumstances, however obvious, were able, when set in opposition to multiplied agitations, and pleadings, and prejudices, to engage the least attention of the populace; for such the whole nation were at this time become. The popish plot passed for uncontestable: and had not men been expected with certainty the legal punishment of those criminals, it might have been a great hazard of an universal massacre. The terror indeed of national prejudices ran so high, that no one, without the most imminent danger, durst venture openly to oppose it; nay, several persons were next year executed on the judgment of such multitudes, that some of them have esteemed themselves sufficiently moderate, when they affirmed that many circumstances of the plot were true, though some were added, and others much magnified. But it is an obvious principle, that a witness, who purports himself in, one circumstance, is credible in none: and the authority of the plot, even to the end of the prosecutions, stood entirely upon witnesses. Though the Catholics had been suddenly and unexpectedly detected, at the very moment when their conspiracy, it is said, was ripe for execution; no arms, no ammunition, no money, no commissions, no papers, no letters, after the most rigorous examination were ever produced to confirm the evidence of Oates and Bedloe. Yet still the nation, though often frustrated, went on in the eager pursuit and confident belief of the conspiracy: and even the manifold inconsistencies and absurdities, contained in the narratives, instead of discarding the committee, afforded them motives to discover the bottom of the plot, and were considered as slight objections, which a more complete information would fully remove. In all history, it will be difficult to find such another instance of popular frenzy and bigoted delusion.

In order to support the panic among the people, especially among the citizens of London, a pamphlet was published with this title: "A narrative and impartial discovery of the horrid popish plot, carried on for burning and destroying the cities of London and Westminster, with their suburbs; setting forth the several consents, orders, and resolutions of the Jesuits, concerning the same: by William Bedloe, lately engaged in that horrid design, and one of the popish committee for carrying on such fires." Every fire which had happened for several years past, is there ascribed to the machinations of the Jesuits, who purposed, as Bedloe saith, by such attempts to obtain an opportunity for the general massacre of the protestants; and in the mean time, were well pleased to enrich themselves, by pillaging goods from the fire.

The king was informed of this discovery, wherever he could speak freely, to throw the highest ridicule on the plot, and on all who believed it; yet found it necessary to adopt the popular opinion before the parliament. The torrent, he saw, ran too strong to be controlled; and he could only hope, by a seeming compliance, to be able, after some time, to guide and direct and elude its fury. He made, therefore, a speech to both Houses; in which he told them, that he would take the utmost care of his person during the next session. The speech being heard, their hearts could wish, to join them in all means for establishing the Protestant religion, not only during his own time, but for all future ages; and that, provided the right of succession were preserved, he would consent to any laws for restraining a popish successor; and, in conclusion, he exhorted them to think of effectual means for the conviction of popish recusants; and he highly praised the duty and loyalty of all his subjects, who had disregarded the former. These gracious expressions abstained nothing of the vehemence of parliamentary proceedings. A bill was introduced for a new test, in which popery was denominated idolatry; and all members, who refused this test, were excluded from both Houses. The bill passed the Commons without much opposition; but in the upper House the duke moved, that an exception might be admitted in his favour. With great earnestness, and even with tears in his eyes, he said he was now to cast himself on their kindness, in the greatest concern which he could have in the world; and he protested, that whatever his religion might be, it should only be a private thing between himself and God. The House then adjourned to examine his public conduct. Notwithstanding this strong effort, in so important a point, he prevailed only by two voices; a sufficient indication of the general disposition of the people; his own language was perceived in the debate on this bill, as much as a popish man or a popish woman to remain here; not so much as a popish dog or a popish bitch; not so much as a popish cat to pur or meow about the king. What more extraordinary, this speech met with praise and approbation.

Encouraged by this general fury, the witnesses went still a step further in their accusations; and though both Oates and Bedloe had often declared, that there was no other person of distinction whom they knew to be concerned in the plot, they were now so audacious as to accuse the queen herself of entering into the design against the life of her husband. The Commons, in an address to the king, gave countenance to this scandalous accusation; but the Lords would not be prevailed with to join in the address. It is here, in any where, that we may suspect the suggestions of the popular leaders to have had place. The king, it was well known, bore no great affection to his consort; and now, when he was so much hated, had reason to be desirous of issue, which might quiet the jealous fears of his people. This very hatred, which prevailed against the duke, would much facilitate her designs, as though he needed any further excuse for the exclusion of that prince; and nothing further seemed requisite for the king, than to give way in this particular to the rage and fury of the nation. But Charles, notwithstanding all allurements of pleasure, or interest, or safety, had the generosity to protect his injured consort. They think," said he, "I have a mind to a new wife; but for all that, I will not see an innocent woman abused." He immediately ordered Oates to be strictly confined, seized his papers, and dismissed his servants; and this daring informer was obliged to make applications to parliament, in order to recover his liberty.

During this agitation of men's minds, the parliament gave new attention to the militia; a circumstance which, even during times of greatest tranquillity, can never prudently be neglected. They passed a bill, by which it was enacted, that a regular militia should be kept in arms, during the six weeks of the year, and a third part of them do duty every fortnight at that time. The popular leaders were intended to make use of the general prejudices, and even to turn the arms of the people against the prince. But Charles refused his assent to the bill, and told the parliament, that he would not continue it, unless it half an hour in part so far with the power of the sword: but if they would contrive any other bill for ordering the militia, and still leave it in his power to assemble or dismiss them as he thought proper, he would willingly give it the royal assent. The Commons, dissatisfied with this negative, though the king had never before employed that prerogative, immediately voted that all the new levied forces should be disbanded. The next day the queen, in her presence, gave the reasons of her dissent: but to show their extreme jealousy of the crown, besides appropriating the money by the strictest clauses, they ordered it to be paid, not into the exchequer, but into the chamber of London. The Lords demurred with regard to so extraordinary a clause, which threw a violent reflection on the king's ministers, and even on himself, and by that means the act remained in suspense. It was no wonder, that the present ferment and confusion should be the panic of the nation; for men of infamous character and indigent circumstances to become informers, when persons of rank and condition could be tempted to give in to that scandalous practice. Montague, the king's ambassador at Paris, had procured a seat in the lower House; and without obtaining or asking the king's leave, he suddenly came over to England. Charles, suspecting his intention, ordered his papers to be seized; but Montague, who foresaw this message, had foreseen it, and provided for it; and immediately went before the House of Commons. It was a letter from the treasurer Danby, written in the beginning of the year, during the negociations at Nimoguen for the general peace. Montague was of the opinion, that it was suspected that he had borrow'd five hundred pounds from France; or, in other words, the king was willing secretly to sell his good offices to Lewis, contrary to the general interests of the confederates, and even to those of the letter. Among other things, Danby's letter contains these words: In case the conditions of peace shall be accepted, the king expects to have six millions of livres a-year for three years, from the time that this agreement shall be signed between his majesty and the King of France; because it will probably be two or three years before the parliament will be in humour to give him any supplies after the making of any peace with France; and the ambassador here has always agreed to that sum; but not for so long a time." Danby was so unwilling to engage in this negociation, that the king, to satisfy him, subjoined, with his own hand, these words: This letter is writ by my order, C. R." Montague, who revealed this secret correspondence, had even the baseness to sell his base treachery at a high price to the French monarqu'a.

The Commons were inflamed with this intelligence against Danby; and carrying their suspicions further than the truth, they concluded, that the king had all along proceeded with the design to make war; and now, that what he had taken in conjunction with the allies, had been illusory and deceitful. Desirous of getting to the bottom of so important a secret, and being pushed by circumstance, he immediately proceeded. Danby's number of votes had already proved, that he immediately voted an impeachment of high treason against that minister, and sent up six articles to the House of Peers. These articles were, That he had traitorously engaged to himself regal power, by giving instructions to his majesty's ambassadors, with the participation of the secretaries of state, or the privy council: that he had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the government, and introduce arbitrary power; and to that end had levied and continued an army, contrary to act of parliament; that he had traitorously endeavoured to alienate the affections of his majesty's subjects, by negotiating a disadvantageous peace with France, and procuring money for that purpose, that he was popishly affected, and had traitorously concealed, after he had notice, the late horrid and bloody plot, contrived by the papists against his majesty's person and government; that he had wasted the king's treasure; and that he had, by indirect means, obtained several exorbitant grants from the crown.

It is certain that the treasurers, in giving instructions to an ambassador, had exceeded the bounds of his office; and as the genius of a monarchy, strictly limited, requires that the proper means should be used for every abuse of power, the Commons, though they here advanced a new pretension, might justly themselves by the utility, and even necessity, of it. But in other respects their charge against Danby was very ill grounded. That minister made it appear in the House of Lords, not only that Montague, the informer against him, had all along promoted the money-negotiations with France, but that he himself was ever extremely averse to the interests of that crown, which he considered as his master. This was evidently the French nation, he said, had always entertained, as he was certainly informed, the highest contempt, both of the king's person and government. His diligence, he added, in tracing the popish plot, was generally known; and if he had common sense, not to say common honesty, he would surely be anxious to preserve the life of a master, by whom he was so much favoured. He had wanted no treasure, because there was no treasure to waste. And though he had reason to be grateful for the king's bounty, he had made more moderate acquisitions than were generally imagined, and than others in his office had often done, even during a shorter administration.

The House of Peers plainly saw, that allowing all the charges of the Commons to be true, Danby's crime fell not under the statute of Edward III.; and though the words treason and treason were had been carefully inserted in several articles, this appellation could not change the nature of things, or subject him to the penalties annexed to that crime. They refused, therefore, to commit Danby upon this irregular charge: the Commons insisted on their demand; and a great contest was likely to arise, when the king, who had himself certified, in the presence of the whole chamber, his contrary declaration, was likely to come up. The alarm of the parliament, thought proper to procrastinate them. This postponement was soon after followed by a dis junction; a desperate remedy was taken in the present disposition of the nation. But though the disease, it must be owned, the king had reason to esteem desperate. The utmost rage had been discovered by the Commons, on account of the popish plot; and their fury began already to point against the royal family, if not against the throne itself. The duke had been struck at in several motions: the treasurer had been impeached: all supply had been refused, except on the most disgraceful conditions: fears, jealousies, and animosities, were every day multiplying in parliament: and though the people were strongly infected with the same prejudices, the king hoped, that, by dissolving the presentcabals, a set of men might be chosen more moderate in their pursuits, and less tainted with the vulgus of faction.

Thus came to a period a parliament, which, in its character, had sat during the whole course of this reign, one year excepted. Its conclusion was very different from its commencement. glittering in the glorious and festive restoration, it consisted almost entirely of royals; who were disposed to support the crown by all the liberality which the habit of that age would permit. Alarmed by the alliance with France, they gradually withdrew their confidence, and all the king; and finding him still to persevere in a foreign interest, they proceeded to discover symptoms of the most refractory and most jealous disposition. The popish plot pushed them beyond all bounds of moderation; and before their dissolution they seemed to be treading fast in the footsteps of the last long parliament, on whose conduct they then at first such violent blame. In all their variations, they had still followed the opinions and prejudices of the nation; and ever seemed to be more governed by humour and party views than by public interest, and more by public interest than by any corrupt or private influence.

During the sitting of the parliament, and after its proceeding and dissolution, the trials of the pretended criminals were carried on, and the courts of judicature, places which, if possible, ought to be kept more pure from injustice than even national assemblies themselves, were strongly infected with the same party rage, and begot prejudices.

Coleman, the most obstreperous of the conspicuous Trials of Coleman's
Terrorists, was first brought to his trial. His letters were produced against him. They contained, as he himself was surprised to hear, not his own, but the whole conspiracy, so far as it is illegal to a zealous catholic, they seemed to prove nothing criminal, much less reasonable, against him. Oates and Bedloe deposed, that he had received a commission, signed by the superior of the Jesuits, to be papal secretary of state, and had consented to the poisoning, shooting, and stabbing of the king; he had even, according to Oates's deposition, advanced a guinea to promote these bloody purposes. These wild stones were consequently thrown away; and the checks which were put on them by Coleman received sentence of death. The sentence was soon after executed upon him. He suffered with calmness and constancy, and to the last persisted in the strongest protestations of innocence. Coleman's execution was succeeded by the trial of Father Ireland, who, it is pretended, had signed, together with fifty Jesuits, the great resolution of murdering the king. grove and Pickering, who had undertaken to shoot him, were tried at the same time. The only witnesses against the prisoners were still Oates and Bedloe. Ireland affirmed that he was in Staffordshire all the month of August last, a time when Oates's evidence made him in London. He proved his assertion by good evidence, and would have proved it by undoubted, had he not most mistakenly been detained, while in prison, from all use of pen, ink, and paper, and denied the liberty of attending for his own defence. All the witnesses, were condemned in the opinion of the judges, jury, and spectators; and to he a Jesuit, or even a catholic, was of itself a sufficient proof of guilt. The chief justice, in particular, gave a reason why the sentences and judgments of the popish plots, and of the Jesuits, were fixed on the papal. Instead of being capricious for the prisoners, as his office required, he pleaded the cause against them, browbeat their witnesses, and on every occasion represented their guilt as certain and uncontroverted. He even went so far as publicly to affirm, that the papists had not the same principles which protestants have, and therefore were not entitled to that common creed, which the principles and practices of the latter call for. And when the jury brought in their verdict against the prisoners, he said, "You have done, gentlemen, like very good subjects, and very good Christians, that is to say, like very good protestants: and now much good may their 30,000 masses do them!" alluding to the masses by which Pickering was to be rewarded for murdering the king. All these unhappy men went to execution, protesting their innocence; a circumstance which made no impression on the spectators. The opinion that the Jesuits were allowed of lies and mental reservations, for that reason, promoting a good cause, was at this time so universally received, that no credit was given to testimony delivered either by that order or by any of their disciples. It was regarded as an instrument of the king's and the pope's powder treason, and Garnet, the Jesuit, among the rest, had freely, on the scaffold, made confession of their guilt.

Though Bedloe had given information of Goffrey's murder, he still remained a single evidence against the persons accused; and all the king's reasons and honour had not hitherto tempted any one to confirm the testimony of that informer. At last means were found to complete the legal evidence. One Prince, a silversmith and a catholic, had been accused by Bedloe of being an accomplice in the murder; and upon his denial had been thrown into prison, loaded with heavy irons, and confined to the condemned hole, a place cold, dark, and full of insatfor silversmiths. All this information, with regard to the plot, as well as the murder of Godfrey, France solemnly retracted, both before the king and the secret committee; but the other two belonged to the popish chapel at Somerset house. It is needless to run over all the particulars of a long trial: it will be sufficient to say, that Bedloe's evidence and France's were, in many circumstances, too plausible not to make both her stories and those of others unanswerable difficulties, so not to say gross absurdities, and that they were invalidated by contrary evidence, which was altogether convincing. But all was in vain: the prisoners were condemned and executed. They all denied their guilt at their execution; and as Berry died a protestant, this circumstance was regarded as very considerable: but, instead of its giving some check to the general credulity of the people, men were only surprised, that a protestant could be induced, at his death, to persist in so manifest a falsehood.

As the army could neither be kept up, nor disbanded, without money, the king, how little hopes soever he could entertain of bringing over the Papists, at last summoned a new parliament. The blood, alredy shed on account of the popish plot, instead of satiating the people, served only as an incentive to new crimes. Each conviction, each execution, the people regarded as an aggravation of those horrible designs imputed to the papists. This election is perhaps the first in England, which, since the commencement of the monarchy, had been carried on by a violent contest between the parties, and where the court interested itself, to a high degree, in the choice of the national representatives. But all its efforts were fruitless, in opposition to the torrent of prejudices which prevailed. Religion, liberty, property, even new elections, were at stake, and no security, it was thought, except in a vigilant parliament, could be found against the impious and bloody conspirators. Were there any part of the nation to which the ferment, occasioned by the popish plot, had not as yet propagated itself; the new elections, by interesting the whole people in public concerns, tended to diffuse it into the remotest corner; and the consternation universally excited, proved an excellent engine for influencing the electors. The most of the former parliament were re-chosen; new ones were added; the presbyterians, in particular, being transported with the most inveterate un-animity against popery, were very active and very successful. The king, who, as usual, had interfered in the election, did this time the abuse of splitting their freeholds, in order to multiply votes and electors. By accounts which came from every part of England, it was concluded, that the new representatives would, if possible, exceed the old, in their refractory opposition to the court, and furious persecution of the catholics.

The king was alarmed, when he saw so dreadful a tempest arise from such small and unaccountable beginnings. His life, if Oates and Bedloe's information were true, had been aimed at by the catholics: even the duke's was in danger: the higher, therefore, the rage mounted against popery, the more should the nation have been reconciled to these princes, in whom, it appeared, the church of Rome had none found himself object to sophistry which attends all the passions; especially those into which the populace enter. Men gave credit to the informers, so far as concerned the guilt of the catholics. But they still retained their old suspicions, that those religious were secretly favoured by the king, and had obtained the most entire ascendant over his brother. Charles had too much penetration not to see the danger, to which the public had exposed, that his own, and his own, to be stood exposed. A numerous party, he found, was formed against him; on the one hand, composed of a populace, so credulous from prejudice, so blinded with religious antipathy, as implicitly to believe the most palpable absurdities; and conducted, on the other hand, by leaders so little scrupulous, as to endeavour, by encouraging perjury, subordination, lies, impostures, and even by shedding innocent blood, to gratify their own furious ambition, and subvert all legal authority. Roused from his lethargy by so imminent a prospect, he now resolved to proceed in a manner, of which, on great occasions, he was not destitute; and without quitting, in appearance, his usual facility of temper, he collected an industry, firmness, and vigilance, of which he was believed altogether incapable. These qualities, joined to dexterity and prudence, conducted him happily through the many shoals which surrounded him; and he was at last able to make the storm fall on the heads of those who had blindly raised or artfully conducted it.

One chief step, of which the king took, towards gratifying and appeasing his people and parliament, was desiring the duke to withdraw beyond sea, that no further suspicion might remain of the influence of popish counsels. The duke readily complied; but first required an order for that purpose, signed by the king, lest his absenting himself should be interpreted as a proof of fear or of guilt. He also desired that his brother should satisfy him, as well as the public, by a declaration of the illegitimacy of the Duke of Monmouth.

James, Duke of Monmouth, was the king's natural son by Lucy Walters, and born about ten years before the restoration. He possessed all the qualities which could possibly be needed, to oblige the people, and to command a distinguished vallor, an affable address, a thoughtless generosity, a graceful person. He rose still higher in the public favour, by reason of the universal hatred to which the duke, on account of his extreme Romanism, Monmouth's capacity was mean; he tempered his plans, that notwithstanding his great popularity, he had never been dangerous, had he not implicitly resigned himself to the guidance of Shaftesbury, a man of such a restless temper, such subtle wit, and such abandoned selfishness, as during political bad flattered Monmouth with the hopes of succeeding to the crown. The story of a contract of marriage, passed between the king and Monmouth's mother, and secreted from the nation to be at stake, and no security, it was thought, except in a vigilant parliament, could be found against the impious and bloody conspirators. Were there any part of the nation to which the ferment, occasioned by the popish plot, had not as yet propagated itself; the new elections, by interesting the whole people in public concerns, tended to diffuse it into the remotest corner; and the consternation universally excited, proved an excellent engine for influencing the electors. The most of the former parliament were re-chosen; new ones were added; the presbyterians, in particular, being transported with the most inveterate un-animity against popery, were very active and very successful. The king, who, as usual, had interfered in the election, did this time the abuse of splitting their freeholds, in order to multiply votes and electors. By accounts which came from every part of England, it was concluded, that the new representatives would, if possible, exceed the old, in their refractory opposition to the court, and furious persecution of the catholics.

The king was alarmed, when he saw so dreadful a tempest arise from such small and unaccountable beginnings. His life, if Oates and Bedloe's information were true, had been aimed at by the catholics: even the duke's was in danger: the higher, therefore, the rage mounted against popery, the more should the nation have been reconciled to these princes, in whom, it appeared, the church of Rome had none found himself object to sophistry which attends all the passions; especially those into which the populace enter. Men gave credit to the informers, so far as concerned the guilt of the catholics. But they still retained their old suspicions, that those religious were secretly favoured by the king, and had obtained the most entire ascendant over his brother. Charles had too much penetration not to see the danger, to which the public had exposed, that his own, and his own, to be stood exposed. A numerous party, he found, was formed against him; on the one hand, composed of a populace, so credulous from prejudice, so blinded with religious antipathy, as implicitly to believe the most palpable absurdities; and conducted, on the other hand, by leaders so little scrupulous, as to endeavour, by encouraging per principles upon which it could be decided.\(^5\) By way of compromise, it was agreed to set aside both candidates. Gregory, a lawyer, was chosen; and the election was rated for his vote, and his understanding not to deliver the choice of the speaker lies in the House; but that the king retains the power of rejecting any person disagreeable to him.

Seymour was deemed a great enemy to Danby; and it was the influence of that nobleman, as commonly supposed, which had engaged the king to enter into this ill-timed controversy with the Commons. The impeachment therof of Danby was, on that account, the most urgent of all. But it was maintained by the Commons, that notwithstanding the intervening dissolution, every part of that proceeding stood in the same condition in which it had been left by the last parliament: a pretension, which, though unusual, seems tacitly to have been yielded them. The king had, before hand, had the precaution to grant a pardon to Danby; and, in order to screen the chancellor from all attacks by the Commons, he had taken the great seal into his own hands, and had himself affixed it to the parchment. He told the parliament, that, as Danby had acted in every thing by his orders, he was in no respect criminal; that his pardon, however, he would insist upon; and if it should be found any way defective, he would request it again and again, till it should be rendered entirely complete; but that he was resolved to deprive him of all employments, and to remove him from court.

The Commons were now satisfied with this concession. They pretended, that no pardon of the crown could be pleaded in bar of an impeachment by the Commons. The prerogative of mercy had hitherto been understood to be altogether unlimited in the king; and this pretension of the Commons, it must be confessed, was entirely new. It was however not unsuitable to the genius of a monarchy strictly limited; where the king's ministers are supposed to be for ever accountable to national assemblies, even for such actions as his ministers have been guilty of on their master. The present emergence, while the nation was so highly infamed, was the proper time for pushing such popular claims; and the Commons failed not to avail themselves of this advantage. They still insisted on the impeachment of Danby. The Peers, in compliance with them, departed from their former scruples, and ordered Danby to be taken into custody. Danby absconded. The Commons passed a bill, appointing him to surrender himself before a certain day, or in default of it, attainting by law for treason. A bill had passed the upper House, mitigating the penalty to banishment; but, after some conferences, the Peers thought proper to yield to the violence of the Commons, and they agreed to stand by the bill as it stood then. The Commons then underse such penalties, Danby appeared, and was immediately committed to the Tower.

While a Protestant nobleman met with such violent prosecution, it was not likely that the Catholics would be overlooked by the zealous Commons. The Popish plot, the credit of the popish plot still stood upon the oaths of a few infamous witnesses. Though such immense preparations were supposed to have been made in the very bowels of the kingdom, no traces of them, after the most rigorous inquiry, had as yet appeared. Though so many thousands, both abroad and at home, had been engaged in the dreadful secret; neither hope, nor fear, nor remorse, nor levity, nor suspicions, nor prejudice, in short, had been able to confirm the evidence. Though the Catholics, particularly the Jesuits, were represented as guilty of the utmost indiscretion, inasmuch that they talked of the king's murder as common news, and wrote of it in plain terms by the common post, yet, among the great number of letters seized, no one contained any part of so complicit a confederacy. Though the informers pretended that, even after they had resolved to betray the secrets of the plot, formidable confessions, and papers had passed through their hands; they had not had the precaution to keep any one of them in order to fortify their evidence. But all these difficulties, and a thousand more, were not found too hard of digestion by the nation and parliament. The prosecution and further discovery of the plot were still the object of general concern. The Commons, having voted, or rather confirmed, the unpardonable felony, they would revenge his death upon the papists; not reflecting that this sect were not his only enemies. They promised rewards to new discoveries; not considering the pretenders, of great importance, of which there were many, and already engaged in perjury. They made Bedloe a present of 500 pounds, and particularly recommended the care of his safety to the Duke of Monmouth. Colonel Sackville, a member, having, in a private company, spoken approvingly of those who had signed the plot, which had been affirmed, the Peers gave power to their committees to send for and examine such as would maintain the innocence of these who had been condemned for the plot. A pamphlet having been published to discredit the informers, and to vindicate the catholic lords in the Tower, these lords were required to discover the author, and thereby to expose their own advocate to prosecution. And both Houses concurred in renewing the former vote, that the papists had undoubtedly entered into a horrid and treasonable conspiracy against the king, the state, and the protestant religion.

It must be owned that this extreme violence, in prosecution of so absurd an imposture, disgraces the meanest part of the nation of liberty, in which the parliament was engaged. We may even conclude, from such imputation of contrivance, that the prosecutors themselves retained a secret suspicion that the general plot was but small; and that among them were afraid to let in light, lest it might put an end to so useful a delusion: the weaker and less dishonest party took care, by turning their eyes aside, not to see a truth so opposite to these famous passions, by which they were actuated, and in which they were determined obstinately to persevere.

Sir William Temple had lately been recalled from his foreign employment; and the king, who, after the removal of Danby from the chancellorship, had more care with respect to the king's council, by which no man was so much as discourse with freedom of public affairs, was resolved, upon Coventry's dismission, to make him one of his secretaries of state. But that philosophical patriot, too little interested for the intrigues of a court, too full of spleen and delicacy for the noisy turbulence of popular assemblies, was alarmed at the universal discontent and jealousies which prevailed, and was determined to make his retreat, as soon as possible, from a scene which threatened such confusions. Meanwhile, no man was so satisfied with the confidence which with his master honoured him; and he resolved to employ it to the public service. He represented to the king, that, as the jealousies of the nation were extreme, it was necessary to be upon the watch, in order to restore that mutual confidence so requisite for the safety both of king and people; that to refuse every thing to the parliament in their present disjunction, or to yield every thing, was equally dangerous to the constitution, as well as to public tranquillity: that if the king would introduce his councils such men as enjoyed the confidence of his people, fewer concessions would probably be required; or if unreasonable demands were made, the king, under the sanction of such counsellors, might be enabled, with the greater safety, to refuse them: and that the heads of the popular party, being gratified with the king's favour, would probably abate of that violence by which they endeavoured to accomplish their end.

The king, pleased with these reasons; and in concert with Temple, he laid the plan of a new privy-council, without whose advice he declared himself determined for the future to take no measure of importance. The usual privy-council was to consist of thirty persons, and was never to exceed that number. Fifteen of the chief officers of the crown were to be continued, who, it was supposed, would adhere to the king; and, in case of any disagreement, the king would request that the other half of the council was to be composed, either of men of character, detached from the court, or of those who possessed chief credit in both Houses. And the king, in filing up the names of his new council, was well pleased to find that the members, in land and offices, possessed to the amount of 300,000 pounds a year; a sum nearly equal to the whole property of the House of Commons, against whose veto the new council was intended as a barrier to the throne. This experiment was tried, and seemed at first to give some satisfaction to the public. The Earl of Essex, a nobleman of great fortune, Lord Capel, who had been beheaded a little after the late king, was created treasurer in the room of Danby: the Earl of Sunderland, a man of intrigue and capacity, was made successor of Sir Robert Boyle, a fine genius, possessed of learning, eloquence, and great tranquility, and fond of refinements, was admitted into the council. These three, together with Temple, who often joined them, though he kept himself more detached from public business, formed a kind of cabinet council, from which all affairs received their first digestion. Shaftesbury was made president of the council, contrary to the advice of Temple, who foresaw the consequence of admitting a man of so dangerous a character into any part of the public administration.

In the parliament 1690, 1691, the speaker, who was Sir Edward Coke, advances a like position. D. Ew'n, p. 439. Townsend, p. 53. So that this pretension of the Commons seems to have been somewhat new; like many of their other powers and privileges.

As Temple foresaw, it happened. Shaftesbury, finding that he possessed no more than the appearance of court-favour, was resolved still to adhere to the popular party, by which he was hated and disregarded in the lower House, and possessed great influence in the other. The very appearance of court favour, empty as it was, tended to render him more dangerous. His parsimony, his avarice, his unchristian modesty, made him hope that he would soon acquire the entire ascendancy; and he constantly flattered them, that if they persisted in their purpose, the king, from indulgence, and necessity, and fondness for Monmouth, would at last be induced, even at the expense of his brother's right, to make them every concession.

Besides, the antipathy to poverty, as well as jealousy of the king and duke, had taken too fast possession of minds. It was no less than to remove the new council projected by Temple. The Commons, soon after the establishment of that council, proceeded so far as to vote unanimously, "That the Duke of York's being a papist, and the hopes of his coming to the crown, had given the highest countenance to the present conspiracies and designs of the papists against the king and the protestant religion." It was expected that a bill for excluding both the throne would soon be brought in. To prevent this heathenish and iniquitous measure, he kept himself in constant readiness to do everything that might preserve your religion, and secure it for the future in all events, I have commanded my lord chancellor to mention several particulars; which, I hope, will be an evidence that, in all things which concern the public security, I shall not follow your zeal, but lead it."

The limitations projected were of the utmost importance, and deprived the successor of the chief branches of royalty. A method was there chalked out, by which the nation, on every new reign, could be insured of having a parliament, which the king should not, for a certain time, have in his power to dissolve. In case of a papist successor, the prince was to forfeit the right of conferring any ecclesiastical preferments; no member of the privy council, no judge of the common law, or in chancery, was to be put in or dispensed with by consent of parliament; and the same precaution was extended to the military part of the government; to the lord lieutenants and deputy lieutenants of the counties, and to all officers of the navy. The chancellor, himself, added, "It is hard to invent another method of rendering any court illegitimate, which will depend upon the consent of parliament, and how im-destruction of monarchy, and even of all regular authority. But the Commons at this time were so jealous of the crown, that they brought it in a bill, which was twice read, excluding from the lower House all who possessed any large offices.

The standing army, and the king's guards, were by the Commons voted to be illegal: a new pretension, it must be confessed; but necessary for the full security of liberty and property.

Habeas corpus

Arbitrary imprisonment is a grievance, to which, in some degree, has place almost in every government, except in that of Great Britain; and our ancient security from it we owe chiefly to the present parliament; a merit which makes some atonement for the faction and violence into which their prejudices had, in other particulars, betrayed them. The great charter had laid the foundation of this valuable part of liberty; the petition of right had renewed and extended it; but some provisions were still wanting to render it complete, and prevent all evasion or delay from ministers and judges.

The act of habeas corpus, which passed this session, served these purposes. By this act it was precluded to send any one to a prison beyond sea. No judge, under severe penalties, must refuse to any prisoner a writ of habeas corpus, by which the gaoler was directed to produce in court the person imprisoned; and no provision was made, what name it was, and to certify the cause of his detainment and imprisonment.

If the gaoler be within twenty miles of the judge, the writ must be obeyed in three days; and so provision is made, in case the prisoner may be indicted the first term after his commitment, and brought to trial in the subsequent term. And no man, after being enlarged by order of court, can be re-committed for the same offence.

This law seems necessary to the preservation of liberty in this country: it has not place in any other form of government, this consideration alone may induce us to prefer our present constitution to all others. It must, however, be confessed, that there is some danger of abuse in the extremity of cases, the full security and the regular police of a state, especially the police of great cities. It may also be doubted whether the low state of the public revenue in this period, and of the military power, did not still render some discretionary authority in the crown necessary to the support of government.

During these jealous efforts for the protection of liberty, no complaisance for the crown was discovered by this parliament. The king's revenue lay under great debts and anticipations; those branches granted in the year 1659 and 1670 were ready to expire; and the fleet was represented by the king as in great danger of disorder. But the Commons being affected by these distresses of the crown, trusted chiefly to them for passing the exclusion bill, and for punishing and displacing all the ministers who were obnoxious to them. They were therefore in no haste to relieve the king; and grew only the more assuming on account of his complaints and necessities.

Jealous, however, of the army, they granted the same sum of 260,000 pounds, which had been voted for disbanding it by the late parliament; though the vote, by reason of the subsequent prorogation and dissolution, joined to some scruples of the Lords, had not been carried into an act. The money was appropriated by very strict clauses; but the Commons insisted not, formerly, upon its being paid into the London chamber.

The impeachment of the five popish lords in the Tower, with that of the Earl of Danby, was carried on with vigour. The power of this minister, and his credit with the king, rendered him extremely obnoxious to the popular leaders; and the Commons hoped, that if they were pushed to extremity, he would be obliged, in order to justify his own conduct, to lay open the whole intrigue of the French alliance, which was expected to come to the knowledge of the nation, and be the means of delivering the court on the most dangerous nature. The king, on his part, apprehensive of the same consequences, and desirous to protect his minister, who was become criminal merely by obeying orders for whose violence, every man of sense was not of that pardon which had been granted him. The Lords appointed a day for the examination of the question, and agreed to hear counsel on both sides: but the Commons would not submit their pretensions to the discussion of argument and inquiry. They voted, that whoever should presume, without their leave, to maintain before the House of Peers the validity of Danby's pardon, should be accounted a betrayer of the liberties of the English Commons. And they made a demand, that the bishops, whom they knew to be devoted to the court, should be removed, not only when the trial of the earl should commence, but also when the validity of his pardon should be discussed.

The bishops before the Reformation had always enjoyed a seat in parliament; but so far were they anciently from regarding that dignity as a privilege, that they affected this exclusion to be a violation of the liberties of the civil magistrate, and accountable only to the Pope and to their own order. By the constitutions, however, of Clarendon, enacted during the reign of Henry II., they were obliged to give presence in parliament; but as the canon law prohibited them from assisting in capital trials, they were allowed in such cases the privilege of absenting themselves. A practice, which was at first voluntary, became afterwards a rule; and on the Earl of Strafford's trial, the Bishops, who were privileged by law, and who were no longer bound by the canon law, were yet obliged to withdraw. It had been usual for them to enter a protest, asserting their right to sit; and this protest was regarded as the formality of the rule, and not disregarded. But here was started a new question of no small importance. The Commons, who were now enabled, by the violence of the people and the necessities of the crown, to exercise the authority of their choice, insisted that the bishops had no more title to vote in the question of the earl's pardon than in the impeachment itself. The bishops asserted that the pardon was merely a preliminary; and that, neither by the ancient custom, nor the practice of proceedings, were they ever obliged, in capital cases, to withdraw till the very commencement of the trial itself. If their absence were considered as a privilege, which was its real origin, it depended on their own choosing how far they would go in a diminution of their right of peerage, such unfavourable customs ought never to be extended beyond the very circumstance established by them; and all arguments, from a pretended purity of reason, were in that case of little or no authority.

The House of Lords was so much influenced by these reasons, that they admitted the bishops' right to vote, when the validity of the pardon should be examined. The Commons insisted still on their withdrawing; and thus a quarrel being commenced between the two Houses, the king, who expected nothing but fresh instances of violence from this parliament, began to entertain thoughts of laying the hand of state on an assembly, by a prerogative session by a prorogation. While in this disposition he was alarmed with sudden intelligence, that the House of Commons was preparing a remonstrance, in order to inflame the nation still further upon the favourite topics of the plot and of popery. He hastened, therefore, to execute his intention, even without consulting his new council, by whose advice he had promised to regulate his whole conduct. And thus were dismissed all the projects of the malcontents, who were extremely enraged at this vigorous measure of the king's. Shaftesbury publicly threatened that he would have the head of one who had advised it. The prorogation of the parliament was soon after dissolved without the advice of council; and writs were issued for a new parliament. The king was willing to try every means which gave a prospect of more compliance in his subjects; and, in case of failure, the blame, he hoped, would lie on those whose obstinacy forced him to extremities.

But even during the recess of parliament, there was no interruption of the prosecution of the catholics accused of the plot: the king found himself obliged to give way to this popular fury. Whitchurch, provincial of the Jesuits, Fenwick, Gavan, Turner, and their companions at Harcourt, were granted a pardon, the validity of which had been contested; but they were first brought to their trial. Besides Oates and Belloc, Durdale, a new witness, appeared against the prisoners. This man had been steward to Lord Aston, and,
though poor, possessed a character somewhat more respectable than the greater part of the informers. The numbers, the intensity of the masquerades and assassinations was equally monstrous and incredible. He even asserted that 200,000 papists in England were ready to take arms. The prisoners proved, by sixteen witnesses from St. Omers, students, and most of them young men, that the faction of the Jesuits in that city was a thing too horrible for belief at the time when he swore that he was in London: but as they were catholics, and disciples of the Jesuits, their testimony, both with the judges and jury, was totally discredited. The whole court was full of outrage and mockery. One of them saying that Oates always continued at St. Omers, if he could believe his senses: "You papists," said the chief justice, "are taught not to believe your senses." It must be confessed that Oates, in opposition to the students of St. Omers, found means to bring evidence of his having been at the time in London; but this evidence, though it had, at that time, the appearance of some solidity, was afterwards discredited, when Oates himself was tried for perjury, to be altogether deceitful. In order further to discredit that witness, the Jesuits proved, by undoubted testimony, that he had perjured himself in Father Ireland's trial, whom they alleged to have been in Staffordshire at the very time when Oates swore that he was committing treason in London. But all these pleas availed them nothing against the general prejudices. They received several other, more severely as wrong relating to their last breath in the most solemn, earnest, and deliberate, though disregarded, protestations of their innocence.

and of Lang.

The next trial was that of Langbome, an eminent lawyer, by whom all the concursus of the Jesuits were managed. Oates and Bedloe swore, that all the papal commissions, by which the chief officers in England were filled with catholics, passed through his hands. When the verdict was given against the prisoner, the spectators expressed their savage joy by loud acclamations. So high indeed had the popular rage mounted, that the witnesses for this unhappy man, upon approaching the court, were almost torn in pieces by the rabble: one in particular was brusied to such a degree as to put his life in danger: and another, a woman, declared that, unless the court would afford her protection, she durst not give evidence: but as the judges could go no farther than promise to punish such as should do her any injury, the prisoner himself had the humanity to wave her testimony.

So far the informers had proceeded with success: their accusation was hitherto equivalent to a sentence of death. Without the exception of their confession was only the trial of Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, whom they accused of an intention to poison the king. It was a strong circumstance in favor of Wakeman, that Oates, in his editions of the Acts of War, before the council, had accused himself only upon hearsay; and when asked by the chancellor, whether he had any thing further to charge him with? he added, "God forbid I should say any thing against Sir George; for I know nothing more against him." On the trial he gave positive evidence of the prisoner's guilt. There were many other circumstances which favoured Wakeman: but what chiefly contributed to his acquittal, was the connexion of his charge with that of the queen, whom, as one, even during the high-est prejudices of the times, could sincerely believe guilty.

The great importance of the trial made men recolect themselves, and recall that good sense and humanity which seemed to have all but disappeared. The chief justice himself, who had hitherto favoured the witnesses, exaggerated the plot, and railed against the prisoners, was observed to be considerably mollified, and to give a favourable change to the jury. Oates and Bedloe had the assurance to attack him to his face, and even to accuse him of perjury before the council. The whole party, who had formerly much extolled his conduct, now made him the object of their resentment. Wakeman's acquittal was a great check to the further prosecution of the plot, and fixed an indelible stain upon the witnesses. But Wakeman, after he recovered his liberty, finding himself exposed to such invertebrate enmity, and being threatened with further prosecutions, thought it prudent to retire beyond seas: and his flight was interpreted as a proof of guilt, by those who were still resolved to persist in the belief of the conspiracy.

The great discontent in England, and the State affairs by the refractory disposition of the parliament, drew such deep guilt and terror to the public. The country was so deeply engaged in this fearful affair, from their valour and fortune alone, for that indemnity, which the severity of the government left them no hope of ever being able otherwise to obtain. They pushed on to Glasgow; and though at first repulsed, they afterwards made themselves masters of that city: dispersed the established clergy; and issued proclamations, in which they declared that they fought against the king's supremacy, against popery and prelacy, and against a popish successor.
How accidental soever this insurrection might appear, there is reason to suspect that some great men, in combination with the popular leaders in England, had secretly instigated it, as being the natural sequel to a scheme and need for such extremities, and hoped for the same effects that had forty years before ensued from the disorders in Scotland. The king, also, apprehensive of like consequences, immediately despatched another Monmouth with a small body of English cavalry. These parties were joined to these expeditions, and some of the body of rebels who defended it, maintained their post as long as their ammunition lasted. When they sent for more, they received orders to quit their ground, and to retire backwards. This imprudent measure occasioned an immediate defeat to the covenanters. Monmouth passed the bridge without opposition, and drove up his forces opposite to the enemy. His cannon alone put them to rout. About 700 fell in the pursuit; for properly speaking, there were but twelve hundred which were taken prisoners; and were treated by Monmouth with a humanity which they had never experienced in their own countrymen. Such of them as would promise to live peaceably were dismissed. About three hundred, who were so obstinate as to refuse this easy condition, were shipped for Barbadoes; but unfortunately perished in the voyage. Two of their clergy were hanged. Monmouth was of a generous disposition; and besides aimed at popularity in Scotland. The king intended to intrust the government of that kingdom in his hands. He had married a Scottish lady, heir of a great family, and allied to all the chief nobility. And Lauderdale, as he was now declining in his parts, and was much decayed in his memory, began to lose with the king that influence which he had maintained during so many years; notwithstanding the efforts of his numerous enemies both in Scotland and England, and notwithstanding the many violent and tyrannical actions of which he had been guilty. Even at present he retained so much influence as to poison all the good intentions, which the king, either of himself, or by Monmouth's suggestion, had formed with regard to Scotland. An act of indemnity was granted by the king; and he made it a care that it should be so worded as rather to afford protection to himself and his associates, than to the unhappy covenanters. And though orders were given to convene the corteges at all covenanters, he found means, under a variety of pretences, to elude the execution of them. It must be owned, however, to his praise, that he was the chief person, who, by his counsel, occasioned the expeditious march of the forces and the prompt orders given to Monmouth; and thereby disappointed all the expectations of the English malcontents, who, reflecting on the disposition of men's minds in both kingdoms, had entertained great hopes from the progress of the Scottish insurrection.

A.D. 1679.

The king, observing that the whole nation concurred at first in the belief and prosecution of the popish plot, had found it necessary for his own safety to pretend, in all public speeches and transactions, an entire belief and acquiescence in that famous absurdity, and by this artifice he had eluded the violent and irresistible opposition which more could have been expected, as well as the execution of the pretended conspirators, had somewhat moderated the general fury, he was state of parties, now enabled to form a considerable party, devoted to the interests of the crown, and determined to oppose the designs of the Scottish malcontents.

In every mixed government, such as that of England, the bulk of the nation will always incline to preserve the entire frame of the constitution; but according to the various purposes and interests of men, some will ever attach themselves with more passion to the regal, others to the popular, part of the government. Though the king, after his restoration, had endeavoured to abolish the distinction of parties, and had chosen the ministers from among all denominations; no sooner had he lost his popularity, and exposed himself to general jealousy, than he found it necessary to court the old cavalier party, and to promise them full compensation for that neglect of which they had hitherto complained. The present emergence made it still more necessary for him to apply for their support; and there were many circumstances which determined them, at this time, to fly to the assistance of the crown, and to the protection of the royal family.

A party, strongly attached to monarchy, would naturally be jealous of the right of succession, by which alone they supposed their power in the government would be fixed, and a barrier fixed against the encroachments of popular assemblies. The project openly embraced, of excluding the duke, appeared to that party a dangerous innovation; and the design, secretly projected, of advancing Monmouth, made them apprehensive lest the inconveniences of a disputed succession should be propagated to all posterity. While the jealous lovers of liberty maintained, that a king, whose title depended on the parliament, would naturally be more attentive to the interests, at least to the humour, of the people; the passionate admirers of monarchy considered all dependence as a degradation of kingly government, and a great step towards the establishment of a commonwealth in England.

But though his union with the political royalists brought great accession of force to the king, he derived no less support from the confederacy, which he had, at this time, the address to form with the church of England. He represented to the ecclesiastics the great number of presby-terians and other sectaries, who had entered into the popular party; the encouragement and favour which they met with; the loneliness of their cries with regard to popery and arbitrary power; and he added, that if parliament did not engage their adherents to apprehend, that the old scheme of the abolition of presbytery, as well as monarchy was revived, and that the same miseries and oppressions awaited them, to which, during the civil wars and usurpations, they had so long been exposed.

The memory also of those dismal times united many indifferent and impartial persons to the crown, and begat a dread lest the zeal for liberty should engraft itself on fanaticism, and should once more kindle a civil war in the kingdom. Had not the king still retained the prerogative of dissolving the parliament, there was, indeed, reason to apprehend the renewal of all the past-then plagues, which had ushered in the last commotions. The one proceeded appeared an exact counterpart to the other; but still discerning judges could perceive, both in the spirit of the parties and in the genius of the prince, a material difference; by means of which Charles was enabled, at last, though with the imminent peril of liberty, to preserve the peace of the union.

The cry against popery was loud; but it proceeded less from religious apprehensions, than from party malice, in those who propagated it, and even in those who adopted it. The spirit of enthusiasm had occasioned so much mischief, and had been so successfully exploded, that it was not possible, by any artifice, again to revive and support it. Cant had been ridiculed, hypocrisy detected; the pretensions to thorough reformation, and to greater purity, had become suspicious; and instead of denouncing themselves the goodly party, the appellation affected at the beginning of the civil wars, the present patriots were content with calling themselves the reformers, and, by the usual nature of such a designation, almost entirely to themselves the good and the先进 party.* A most generous and liberal spirit animated their ranks; and the apprehensions of the duke of Buckingham and the clergy of the Established Church, to which the apprehensions of their party could be compared, was that the king might try whether time would alloy those humours which, by every other expedient, he had in vain attempted to mollify. In this measure he did not expect the concurrence of his council. The choice of his leaders was, however, such as to assure him that, if the proposition were carried, he would experience, as it were, the same effect which a resolution, having been so recommended, would zealously oppose a resolution, which discounts all their schemes; and that the royalists would not dare, by supporting it, to expose themselves to the vengeance of the people to which, at present, they all belong.

These reasons obliged him to take this step entirely of himself; and he only declared his resolution in council. It is remarkable, that though the king had made profession never to embrace any measure without the advice of these counsellors, he had, in this instance, resolved that such advice had not been necessitated, in affairs of the greatest consequence, to control their opinion. Many of them in disgust threw up about this time; particularly Lord Russell, the most popular man in the nation, as well from his mildness and integrity of his character, as from his zealous attachment to the religion and liberties of his country. Though carried into some excesses, his intentions were ever esteemed upright; and being heir to the greatest fortune in the kingdom, as well as void of ambition, men believed that nothing but the last necessity could ever engage him to embrace any desperate measures. Shaftesbury, who was, in most particulars, of an opposite character, was removed by the king from the cabinet office of president. He was succeeded by the Earl of Hadrorn, a man who possessed whimiscal talents, and spletic virtues, was substituted in his place.

It was the favour and countenance of the parliament which had changed his countenance. He had, in every respect, endeavored to rectify and mend the national inconveniences, and to improve and embellish the public service; but the nation had got so much into that vein of credulity, and every successive villain was so much incited by the success of Oates and Bedloe, that, even during the progration, the people were not allowed to remain in tranquility. There was one Dangerfield, a fellow who had been burned in the hand for crimes, transported, whipped, pilloried four times, fined for cheats, outlawed for felony, convicted of coming, and exposed to all the public infamy which the laws could inflict on the basest and most shameful enormities. The credulity of the people, and the humour of the times, enabled even this man to become a person of consequence. He was the author of a new incident, called the Meal-tub plot, from the place where some papers relating to it were found. The bottom of this affair it is difficult, and not very material, to discover. It only appears, that Dangerfield, under pretence of betraying the conspiracies of the presbyterians, had been counseled by some catholics of condition, and had even been admitted to the duke's presence and the king's: and that, under pretence of revealing new popish plots, he had obtained access to Shaftesbury and some of the grand seigniors, and, that the methods of leading them to cheat is uncertain; or whether he did not rather mean to cheat both: but he soon found that the belief of the nation was more open to a popish than a presbyterian plot; and he resolved to strike in with the prevailing humour. Though no weight could be laid on his testimony, great clamour was raised; as if the court, by way of retaliation, had intended to lead the presbyterians with the guilt of a false conspiracy. It must be confessed that the present period, by the prevalence and suspicion of such mean and ignoble arts on all sides, throws a great stain on the British annals.

One of the most innocent artifices, practised by party men at this time, was the additional ceremony, pomp, and expense, with which a pope-burning was celebrated in London: the spectacle served to entertain, and amuse, and inflame, the populace. The Duke of Monmouth likewise came over without leave, and made a triumphant procession through many parts of the kingdom, extremely caressed and admired by the people. All these arts seemed requisite to support the general opinion of the long continuance of the civil wars. Great endeavours were also used to obtain the king's consent for the meeting of that assembly. Seventeen peers presented a petition to this purpose. Many of the corporations imitated the example.

Notwithstanding several marks of displeasure, and even a menacing proclamation from the king, petitions came from all parts, earnestly insisting on a session of parliament. The king, however, and the terms of the plot, were never forgotten in any of these addresses.

Tumultuous petitioning was one of the chief artifices by which the malcontents in the last reign had attacked the crown: and though the manner of subscribing, and delivering petitions, was now somewhat regulated by act of parliament, the thing itself still remained; and was an admirable expedient for inflaming the court, for spreading discontent, and for uniting the nation in any popular clamour, against which there was no means of punishing those importunate, and, as he deemed them, undeserving solicitations, he was obliged to encounter them by popular applications of a contrary tendency. Wherever the church and court party prevailed, addresses were framed, containing expressions of the highest regard to his majesty, the most entire acquiescence in his wisdom, the most dutiful submission to his prerogative, and the deepest abhorrence of those who endeavoured to encroach upon it, by presenting to him any time for assembling the parliament. Thus the nation came to be distinguished into petitioners and absolvers. Faction indeed were at this time extremely animated against each other. The very names, by the very denominations, denoted the virulence and rancour which prevailed. For besides petitioner and absolver, appellations which were soon forgotten, this year is remarkable for being the epoch of the Whig and Tory: by which, and sometimes without any material difference, this island has been so long divided. The court party reproached their antagonists with their affinity to the fanatical conventiclers in Scotland, who were known by the name of Whigs: the country party found a resemblance between the courtiers and the popish banditti in Ireland, to whom the appellation of Tory was affixed. And after this manner, these foolish terms of reproach came into popular use, and are by their very nature not nearer their end than when they were first invented.

The king used every art to reconcile his partisans, and to reconcile the people to his government. He persevered in the great zeal which he affected against popery. He even allowed several priests to be put to death, for no other crime than that they had received orders in the Romish church. It is singular, that one of them, called Evans, was playing at tennis, when the warrant for his immediate execution was delivered to him: he aware that he would put out his set first. Charles, with the same view of acquiring popularity, formed an alliance with Spain, and also offered an alliance to Holland: but the Dutch, terrified with the present danger, and too dazzled with the splendor of the country so distracted as England, declined acceptance. He sent for the duke from Scotland, but desired him to return, when the time of assembling the parliament began to approach.

It was of great consequence to the popular party, while the meeting of parliament depended on the king's will, to keep the law, whose operations are perpetual, entirely on their side. The sheriffs of London by their office return the juries: it had been usual for the mayor to nominate one sheriff by drinking to him; and the common-hall had ever without dispute confirmed the mayor's choice. Sir Robert Clayton, the mayor, appointed one who was not to approach to the popular party: the common-hall rejected him; and Bethel and Cornish, two independents and republicans, and of consequence deeply engaged with the malcontents, were chosen by a majority of voices. In spite of all remonstrances and opposition, the citizens persisted in their choice; and the court party was obliged for the present to acquiesce.

Juries however were not so partial in the city, but that reason and justice, even when the popish plot was in question, were to a great extent preserved. Castlemaine, husband to the Duchess of Cleveland, was acquitted about this time, though accused by Otter and Dangerfield of an intention to assassinate the king. The last peace in 1670 was so generally desired by the north, being accused by two servants, whom he had dismissed for dishonesty, received a like verdict. These trials were great blows to the plot, which now began to stagger, in the judgment of most men, except those who were entirely devoted to the country party. But in order to still to keep up the zeal against the Earl of Shaftesbury appeared in Westminster-hall, attended by the Earl of Huntingdon, the Lords Russell, Caveatish, Gray, Brandon, Sir Henry Carely, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir William Cooper, and other persons of distinction, and presented to the grand jury of Middlesex reasons for indicting the Duke of York as a popish recusant. While the jury were deliberating on this extraordinary presentment, the chief justice sent for them, and suddenly, even somewhat imprudently, demanded of which he had never ever obtained the end for which he had undertaken this bold measure: he showed to all his followers the desperate resolution which he had embraced, never to admit of any accommodation or composition with the duke. By such daring conduct he gave them assurance, that he was fully determined not to desert their cause; and he engaged them to a like devoted perseverance in all the measures which he should suggest to them.

As the kingdom was regularly and openly divided into two zealous parties, it was not difficult for the king to know that the majority of the new House of Commons was engaged in interests opposite to the court: but that he might learn from the antagonists, distinct from the unhappy differences among his subjects, he resolved, at last, after a long interval, to assemble the parliament. In his speech, he told them that the several prorogations which had made had been very advantageous to his neighbours, and very useful to himself: that he had employed that interval to perfect with the crown of Spain an alliance, which had often been desired by former parliaments, and which, he doubted not, would be extremely agreeable to that, in order to give weight to this measure, and render it beneficial to Christendom, it was necessary to avoid all domestic dissensions, and to unite themselves firmly in the same views. The present answer seems not nearer their end than when they were first invented.

The king used every art to reconcile his partisans, and to reconcile the people to his government. He persevered in the great zeal which he affected against popery. He even allowed several priests to be put to death, for no other crime than that they had received orders in the Romish church. It is singular, that one of them, called Evans, was playing at tennis, when the warrant for his immediate execution was delivered to him: he aware that he would put out his set first. Charles, with the same view of acquiring popularity, formed an alliance with Spain, and also offered an alliance to Holland: but the Dutch, terrified with the present danger, and too dazzled with the splendor of the country so distracted as England, declined acceptance. He sent for the duke from Scotland, but desired him to return, when the time of assembling the parliament began to approach.

It was of great consequence to the popular party, while the meeting of parliament depended on the king's will, to keep the law, whose operations are perpetual, entirely on their side. The sheriffs of London by their office return the juries: it had been usual for the mayor to nominate one sheriff by drinking to him; and the common-hall had ever without dispute confirmed the mayor's choice. Sir Robert Clayton, the mayor, appointed one who was not to approach to the popular party: the common-hall rejected him; and Bethel and Cornish, two independents and republicans, and of consequence deeply engaged with the malcontents, were chosen by a majority of voices. In spite of all remonstrances and opposition, the citizens persisted in their choice; and the court party was obliged for the present to acquiesce.

Juries however were not so partial in the city, but that reason and justice, even when the popish plot was in question, were to a great extent preserved. Castlemaine, husband to the Duchess of Cleveland, was acquitted about this time, though accused by Otter and Dangerfield of an intention to assassinate the king. The last peace in 1670 was so generally desired by the north, being accused by two servants, whom he had dismissed for dishonesty, received a like verdict. These of those petitions. They did not reflect that it was as lawful for one party of men as for another, to express their sense of public affairs; and that the best established right may, in particular circumstances, be abused, and even the exertions of power and protection be grievances. For this offence, they expelled Sir Thomas Witherens. They appointed a committee for further inquiry into such members as had been guilty of a like crime; and complaints were lodged against Lord Ashton, Sir Robert Malverey, Sir Bransford of Herefordshire, Sir William North, and Turner of Dorset, for the king against Sir George Jeffreys, recorder of London, for his activity in the same cause; and they frightened him into a resignation of his office, in which he was succeeded by Sir Edward Lambert. They voted an impeachment against North, chief justice of the common pleas, for drawing the proclamation against tumultuous petitions: but upon examination found the proclamation so cautiously worded, that it afforded them no handle against him. A petition had been presented to the king from Taunton. "How dare you deliver me such a paper?" said the king to the person who presented it. "Sir," replied he, "my name is DARE." For this he was fined, and committed to prison. The Commons now addressed the king for his liberty, and for remitting his fine. Some printers also and authors of seditious libels were expelled.

Great numbers of the abhorrers, from all parts of England, were seized by order of the Commons, and committed to custody. The liberty of the subject, which had been exposed to whatever peril, and by the late law of habeas corpus, was every day violated by their arbitrary and capricious commitments. The chief jealousy, it is true, of the English constitution is naturally and justly directed against the crown; nor indeed have the Commons any other means of securing their privileges than by commitments, which, as they cannot beforehand be exactly determined by law, must always appear, in some degree, arbitrary. Sensible of these reasons, the people had better, without murmuring, see this discretion, power exercised by the House: but as it was now carried to excess, and was abused to serve the purposes of faction, great complaints against it were heard from all quarters. At last the vigour and courage of one Stowell of Exeter, an abhorrier, put an end to the practice. He refused to obey the sergeant-at-arms, stood upon his defence, and said that he knew of no law by which they pretended to commit him. The House, finding it equally dangerous to permit him to be insulted by them, or to rescind the votes, that Stowell was indisposed, and that a month's time was allowed him for the recovery of his health.

The chief violence of the House of Commons appeared in all their transactions with regard to the plot, which they prosecuted with the same zeal and the same credulity as their predecessors. They renewed the former vote, which affirmed the reality of the horrid popish plot; and, in order the more to terrify the people, they even asserted that, notwithstanding the discovery, the plot still subsisted. They expelled Sir Robert Carri, and Sir Robert Yeomans, who had been complained of for saying that there was no popish, but there was a presbyterian plot. And they greatly lamented the death of Bedloe, whom they called a maternal witness, and on whose testimony they much depended. He had been seized with a fever at Bristol; had sent for Chief-Justice North; confirmed all his former evidence, except that with regard to the duke and the queen; and desired North to apply to the king for some money to relieve him in his necessities. A few days after he expired; and the whole party triumphed extremely in these circumstances of his death: as if such a testimony could be deemed the affirmation of a dying man, as if his confession of perjury in some instances could assure his veracity in the rest, and as if the perseverance of the former was inconsistent with that of so many men, guilty of no crime but that of popery.

The Commons even endeavoured, by their countenance and protection, to remove the extreme infamy with which Duke of York was charged, and to take away the capacity of being an evidence. The whole tribe of informers they applauded and rewarded; Jennison, Turberwill, Dugdale, Smith, La Fara, appeared before them; and their testimony, however frivolous or absurd, met with a favourable reception: the king was applied to in their behalf for remitting their crimes and penalties. For this offence, that sanction which arose from the approbation of the House: Dr. Tongue was recommended for the first consideration, in the catholics. Considering men's determined resolution to believe, indignantly to regard, and to suffer for their principles, they were not surprised to find the people, whose conduct was supported by so many witnesses, it may justly appear wonderful, that no better evidence was ever produced against the catholics.

The principal reasons, which still supported the claimants to the crown, and the popish party, were these: that the king's resolve of being crowned in England and Wales, for the first time, of which more will be said hereafter; and that he had a crown of his own, purchased by many millions, and therefore it is very unjust, venal, and unusual, that they should be confined in it, and thereby made incapable of receiving a pardon but by act of parliament.

lessen the number of his partisans, and make it utterly

the bishops, except three, voted against it. Besides the influence of the court over them, the church of England, they imagined, or pretended, was in greater danger from the prevalence of presbyterianism than of popery, which, though they durst not openly avow, the king was extremely repugnant to the genius of the nation. The Commons discovered much ill-humour upon this disappointment. They immediately voted an address for the removal of his majesty from that presence for ever. Though the pretended cause was his advising the late frequent prorogations of parliament, the real reason was apparently his vigorous opposition to the exclusion bill. When the king applied for money to enable him to defend his country with his own person, and declared his revenues totally unable to defend; instead of complying, they voted such an address as was in reality a remonstrance, and one little less violent than that famous remonstrance, which ushered in the civil wars. All the abuses of government, from the beginning almost of the reign, are there insisted on; the Dutch war, the alliance with France, the prorogations and dissolutions of parliament; and all these measures, as well as the dismember and hellish plot, are there ascribed to the machinations of popish and papist, it was plainly insinuated that the king had, all along, lain under the influence of that party, and was in reality the chief conspirator against the religion and liberties of his people.

The Commons, though they conducted the great business of the exclusion with extreme violence and even impropriety, had yet much reason for the jealousy which gave rise to that address. Though the popular plot, even after so long an interval, discovers such a spirit, either of credulity or injustice, as admits of no apology. The imputation of the catholick lords in the Tower was revived; and as Viscount Stafford, from his age, infirmities, and narrow capacity, was deemed the least capable of defending himself, it was determined to make him the first victim, that his condemnation might pave the way for a second. This project was so well managed, and the chancellor, ** Nov.* now created Earl of Nottingham, was appointed high steward for conducting the trial.

Three witnesses were produced against the prisoner; Oates, Dugdale, and Turberville. Oates swore, that he saw Foxwell, the Jesuit, deliver to Stafford a commission signed by De Oliva, general of the Jesuits, appointing him paymaster to the papal army, which was to be levied for the subduing of England: for which, the Commons, in a posture still maintained its stress with the Commons. Dugdale gave testimony, that the prisoner at Tilbury, a seat of Lord Aston's, had endeavoured to engage him in the design of murdering the king; and had given orders for his assassination, and presented the church, a reward of 500 pounds for that service. Turberville deposed, that the prisoner, in his own house at Paris, had made him a like proposal. To offer money for murder- ing a king, without laying down any scheme by which the assassin may insure some probability or possibility of escape, is so incredible in itself, and may so easily be maintained by any prostitute evidence, that an accusation of that nature, not accompanied with circumstances, ought very little to be attended to by any court of justice. But notwithstanding the small hold which the witnesses afforded, the prisoner was able, in many material particulars, to discredit their testimony. It was sworn by Dugdale, that Stafford had assisted in the great council of the catholics held at Tilbury; but Stafford proved, by undoubted testimony, that at the time assigned he was in Bath, and in that neighbourhood. Turberville had served a novitiate among the Dominicans; but having deserted the convent, he had enlisted as a trooper in the French army; and being dismissed that service, he now lived in London, abandoned by all his relations, and exposed to great poverty. Stafford proved, by the evidence of this gentleman and his patrons, that Turberville had never, either at Paris or at London, been seen in his company; and it might justly appear strange, that a person who had so important a secret in his keeping, was so long entirely depouched of it.

The clamour and outrage of the populace during the trial, were extreme: great abilities and eloquence were displayed by the managers, Sir William Jones, Sir Francis Wintonning, and Serjeant Maynard. Yet did the prisoner, under all these disadvantages, make a better defence than was expected, either by his friends or his enemies: the unequal contest, which he was engaged in, was enabled by the source of compassion to every mind seasoned with humanity. He represented that during a course of forty years, from the very commencement of the civil wars, he had, through many difficulties, and still maintained his loyalty; and was it credible, that now, in his old age, easy in his circumstances, but dispirited by infirmities, he would be the whole course of his life, and engage against his royal master, from whom he had ever received kind and beneficent attentions? This question was most bloody of all conspiracies! He remarked the infamy of the witnesses; the contradictions and absurdities of their testimony; the extreme inducement in which they had lived, though engaged, as they pretended, in a conspiracy with kings, princes, and nobles; the credit and opulence to which they were at present raised. With a simplicity and tenderness more persuasive than the greatest oratory, he still made protestations of his innocence, and could not forbear, every moment, expressing the most lively surprise and indignation at the audacious impudence of the witnesses.

It will appear astonishing to us, as it did to Stafford himself, that the Peers, after a solemn trial of six days, should, by a majority of twenty-four voices, give sentence against him. He received, however, with resignation, the fatal verdict. God's holy name be praised, was the only exclamation which broke the profound silence of the house. Stafford, in a few words, told them that the Peers would intercede with the king for remitting the more cruel and ignominious parts of the sentence, hanging and quartering, he burst into tears: but he told the Lords that he was moved to this weakness by his sense of their goodness, not by any terror of that fate which he was doomed to suffer.

It is remarkable that, after Charles, as is usual in such cases, had removed against Stafford's imprudence, the two sheriffs, Bothel and Cornish, indulging their own republican humour, and complying with the prevalent spirit of their party, ever jealous of monarchy, started a doubt with regard to the king's power of executing even this small degree of lenity. "Since he cannot pardon the whole," said they, "how can he have power to remit any part of the sentence?" They proposed the doubt to both Houses: the Peers pronounced it superfluous; and even the Commons, apprehensive lest a question of this kind might make way for Stafford's escape, gave this singular answer: "This House is content, that the sheriffs do execute William, late Viscount Stafford, by severing his head from his shoulders; and the King, in the name of the nation, is the sole judge of the form of the fury of the times, than that Lord Russell, notwithstanding the virtue and humanity of his character, seconded in the House this barbarous scourge of the sheriffs.

In the interval between the sentence and execution, many efforts were made to shake the resolution of the infirm and aged prisoner, and to bring him to some confession of the treason for which he was condemned. It was even rumoured, that he had confessed; and the jealous partizans, who, no doubt, had secretly, notwithstanding their credulity, entertained some doubts with regard to the reality of the popish conspiracy, expressed great triumph on this occasion. The consultation of the Peers, discovered many schemes, which had been hatched by himself and others for procuring a toleration to the catholics, at least a mitigation of the penal laws enacted against them; and he promised to the Peers that this was the sole treason of which he had ever been guilty. Stafford now prepared himself for death with the intrepidity which became his birth and station, and which was the natural result of the innocence and integrity which, during the course of a long life, he had ever maintained: his mind seemed even to collect new force from the violence and oppression under which he laboured. When going to execution, he called for a cloak to cover himself against the weather.

"Perhaps," said he, "I may shake with cold; but I trust in God, not for fear." On the scaffold he con-

...inured, with retracted and earnest asseverations, to make protestations of his innocence: all his fervour was exerted on that point: when he mentioned the witnesses, whose perjuries had bereaved him of life, his expressions were full of mildness and of eloquence. He solemnly disavowed all those immoral principles which over-zealous protestants had ascribed, without distinction, to the church of Rome: and he hoped, he said, that the time was now approached when such representations would be discredited; and when the force of truth, though late, would engage the whole world to make reparation to his injured honour.

Conspiring, who had applauded at Stafford's trial and condemnation, were now melted into tears at the sight of that tender fortitude which shone forth in each feature, and motion, and accent of this aged noble. Their profound silence was only interrupted by sighs and groans. With difficulty they found speech to assent to those protestations of innocence, which he frequently repeated: "We believe you, my lord! God bless you, my lord!" These expressions, with a filtering accent, flowed from them.

The executioner himself was touched with sympa-thy. Twice he lifted up the axe, with an intent to strike the fatal blow; and as often felt his resolution to fail him. A deep sigh was heard to accompany his last effort; and the lord for whom the executioners seemed to feel the blow. And when the head was held up to them with the usual cry, "This is the head of a traitor, no charm of assent was uttered. Pity, remorse, and doubt took possession of every heart, and displayed itself to every countenance.

This is the last blood which was shed on account of the popish plot: an incident which, for the credit of the nation, it was better to bury in eternal oblivion; but which is necessary to be recorded in the true annals of history, as to warn, if possible, their posterity and all mankind never again to fall into so shameful, so barbarous a delusion.

...the case of Stafford gratified the prejudices of the country; but it contributed nothing to their power and security: an the contrary, by exciting commination, it tended still further to increase that disbelief of the whole plot, which began now to prevail. The Commons, therefore, not to lose the present opportunity, resolved to make both friends and enemies sensible of their power. They passed a bill for enacting the protestant dissenters, and for repealing the persecution statute of the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth: this laudable bill was likewise carried through the House of Peers. The chief justice was very obvious for dismissing the grand jury in an irregular manner, and thereby disappointing that bold measure of Shaftesbury and his friends, who had presented him as a recusant. For this crime the Commons sent up an impeachment against him; as also against Jones and Weston, two of the judges, who, in some speeches from the bench, had gone so far as to give to many of the first reformers the appellation of fanatics.

The king, in rejecting the exclusion bill, had sheltered himself secretly behind the authority of the House of Peers; and the Commons had been deprived of the usual pretence, to attack the sovereign himself, under colour of attacking his ministers and counsellors. In prosecution, however, of the scheme which he had formed, of throwing the blame on the Commons in case of any rupture, he made them a new speech. After warning them, that a neglect of this opportunity would never be retrieved, he added these words: "I did promise you the fullest satisfaction, which your hearts could wish, for the security of the protestant religion, and to concur with you in any remedies which might consist with preserving the succession of the crown in its due and legal course of descent. I do again, with the same reservations, renew the same promise: but I hope you will not consider this as a part of that which can reasonably be expected from me. I should be glad to know from you, as soon as may be, how far I shall be assisted by you, and what it is you desire from me.

The most reasonable objection against the limitations proposed by the king, is, that they introduced too considerable an innovation in the government, and almost totally annihilated the power of the future monarch. But considering the present disposition of the Commons and their leaders, we may fairly presume, that this objection would have been attended more with weight with them, and their dis-trust against the court would rather incline them to diminish than support regal authority. They still hoped, from the king's urgent necessities and his usual facility, that he would throw himself wholly into their bands; and that for preventing his flight, and disgracing the duke, they might immediately render themselves absolute masters of the government. The Commons, Violence of the therefore, besides insisting still on the exclusion, proceeded to bring in it as an important, and some of them an alarming, nature: one to renew the triennial act, which had been so inadvertently repealed in the beginning of the reign: a second to make the office of judge during good behaviour: a third to declare the leasing of money without consent of parliament to be high treason: a fourth to order an association for the safety of his majesty's person, for defence of the protestant religion, for the preservation of the protestant subjects against all invasions and opposition whatsoever, and for preventing the Duke of York or any papist from succeeding to the crown. The memory of the covenant was too recent for men to overlook the consequences of such an association; and it was necessary, for the permanent support of such a bill, that it could not fail of recollecting a memorable foreign instance, to fortify this domestic experience.

The Commons also passed many votes, which, though they had not the authority of law, might yet remove the danger, and save the honour of the nation. They voted, that whoever had advised his majesty to refuse the exclusion bill, were promoters of popery, and enemies to the king and kingdom. In another vote, they named the drummers of Westminster, the Earl of Charendon, Faversham, and Halifax, Laurence Hyde, and Edward Seymour, as those dangerous enemies; and they requested his majesty to remove them from his person and councils for ever: they voted that the exclusion bill, if it could not, consistently with the trust reposed in them, grant the king any manner of supply. And lest he should be enabled, by any other expedient, to support the government and preserve himself independent, they passed another vote, in which they declared that whoever should hereafter lend, by way of advance, any money upon those branches of the king's revenue, arising from customs, excise, or hearth-money, should be judged by the sitting of parliament, and be responsible for the same in parliament.

The king might presume that the Peers, who had rejected the exclusion bill, would still continue to defend the crown of the dangerous bills, introduced into the other House, would ever be presented for the royal assent and approbation. But as there remained no hopes of bringing the Commons to any better temper, and as their further sitting served only to keep faction alive, and to perpetuate the general ferment of the nation, he came secretly to a resolution of provoking them. They got intelligence about a quarter of an hour before the black rod came to the door. Not to lose such precious time, they passed Dissolution of parliament. in a tumultuous manner some extraordinary resolutions. They voted, That whoever advised his majesty to provoke this parliament by any votes of the House of Commons on the bill of exclusion, was a betrayer of the king, of the protestant religion, and of the kingdom of England; a promotor of the French interest, and a pensioner of France: That thanks be given to the city of London for their manifest loyalty, and for their care and vigilance in the preservation of the king, and of the protestant religion: That it is the opinion of this House, that the city was burned in the year 1666 by the papists, deputed to act in the execution of this power and popery into the kingdom: That humble application be made to his majesty for restoring the Duke of Monmouth to all his offices and commands, from which it appears to the House, he has had the misfortune of being relieved; and, That it is the opinion of the House, that the prosecution of the protestant dissenters upon the penal laws is at that time grievous to the subject, a weakening to the protestant interest, an encouragement of popery, and dangerous to the peace of the kingdom.

The king passed some laws of no great importance: but at this time, he endeavoured to corrupt, by privately ordering the clerk of the crown not to present to him. By this artifice, which was equally disobliging to the country party as if the bill had been rejected, and at the same time implied some turns in the thist, that salari act was in the present event. The king had often of himself attempted, and sometimes by irregular means, to give indulgence to nonconformists: but besides this he had usually expected to comprehend the catholics in the same measure, and the separation between the sectaries had much incensed him against them; and he was resolved, if possible, to keep them still at mercy.

The last votes of the Commons seemed to be an attempt of forming indirectly an association against the crown, after they found that their association bill could not pass: the dissenting interest, the city, and the Duke of Monmouth, they endeavoured to connect with the country party. A civil war indeed never appeared so likely as at present; and it was high time for the king to dissolve a parliament, which seemed to have entertained such dangerous projects. Soon after, he summoned another. Though it was said that the city party had established their interest so strongly in all the electing boroughs, that he could not hope for any disposition more favourable in the new parliament, this expedition was still a prosecution of his former project, of trying every method by which he could render the city pliant and amenable to Commons: and if all failed, he hoped that he could persuade the better justic to his people, at least to his party, a final breach with them.

It had always been much regretted by the royalists, during the civil wars, that the long parliament had been assembled at Westminster, and had thereby received force and encouragement from the vicinity of a potent and factious interest. The king was therefore pleased with the Commons: and if all failed, he hoped that he could persuade the better justic to his people, at least to his party, a final breach with them. Though the king was now possessed of guards, which in some measure overawed the populace, he was determined still further to obviate all inconveniences; and he summoned the new parliament to meet at Oxford. The city of London showed how just judgment he had formed of their dispositions. Besides re-electing the same members, they voted thanks to them for their former behaviour, in endeavouring to discover the depth of the horrid and hellish plot, and to exclude the Duke of York, the principal cause of the ruin and misery impending over the nation. Monmouth with fifteen Peers presented a petition against assembling the parliament at Oxford, "where the people of England" was said, "could not be in safety: but would be easily exposed to the swords of the papists and their adherents, of whom too many had crept into his majesty's guards." These insinuations, which pointed so strongly to a policy of the king, he considered not only by their substance, but by numerous bands of their partizans. The four city members in particular were followed by great multitudes, wearing ribbons, in which were woven these words, No protection for Englishmen: the king's guards to be mustered: his party likewise endeavoured to make a show of their strength: and on the whole, the assembly at Oxford rather bore the appearance of a tumultuous Polish diet, than of a regular English parliament.

The March, who had hitherto employed the most gracious expressions to all his parliaments, particularly the two last, thought proper to address himself to the present in a more authoritative manner. He told the representatives of the body politic at Oxford, of the proceedings of the former House of Commons; and said that, as he would never use arbitrary government himself, neither would be ever suffer it in others. By calling, however, this parliament so soon, he had sufficiently shown that no past irregularities could inspire him with a prejudice against those assemblies. He now afforded another apology, open and avowed, for the public safety; and to all the world had given one evidence more, that on his part he had neglected the duty incumbent on him.

The Commons were next overawed by the magisterial air of the king's speech. They consisted almost entirely of the same members; they chose the same speaker; and they instantly fell into the same measures, the impeachment of Danby, the repeal of the prosecuting statute of 1679, and the exclusion of the last. So violent were they on this last article, that no other expedition, however plausible, could so much as be hearkened to. Emley, one of the king's ministers, proposed that the duke should be banished, during life, five hundred miles from England, and that on the king's demise the next heir should be constituted regent with recall power: yet even this expedient, which left the duke only the bare title of king, could not, though seconded by Sir Thomas Lyttleton and Sir Thomas Mompesson, obtain the attention of the House. The past disappointments of the country party, and the opposition made by the court, had only rendered them more saucy and more determined. No method but their own, of excluding the duke, could give them any satisfaction.

There was one Fitz-harris, an Irish catholic, Fitz-harris's who had insinuated himself into the Duchess of Portsmouth's promotion, and was very busy in conveying to her intelligence of any libel written by the country party, or of any designs entertained against her or against the court. For services of this kind, and perhaps two, from a regard to his father, Sir Edward Fitz-harris, who had been an eminent royalist, he had received from the king a present of 250 pounds. This man met with one Everard, a Scotchman, a spy of the exclusionists and an admirer of his plot: they resolved to write a libel against the king, the duke, and the whole administration. What Fitz-harris's intentions were, cannot well be ascertained: it is probable, as he afterwards asserted, that he meant to carry this libel to his patron, the Duchess, and to make a merit of the discovery. Ever-ward, who suspected some other design, and who was well pleased, on his side, to have the merit of a discovery with his patrons, resolved to betray his friend: he posted Sir William Waller, a noted justice of peace, and two persons more, behind the hangings, and gave them an opportunity of seeing and hearing the whole transaction. The libel, sketched out by Fitz-harris, and executed partly by him, partly by Everard, was most forcibly, though not without an outstretched performance imaginable; and such as was fitter to hurt than serve any party, which should be so imprudent as to adopt it. Waller carried the intelligence to the king; and, when he received a knighthood, was not calculated to persuade him, but to inflame the people.

The exclusionists might have concluded, both from the king's dissolution of the last parliament, and from his summoning of the present to meet at Oxford, that he was determined to maintain his declared resolution of rejecting their favourite bill: but they still flattered themselves that his urgent necessities would influence his easy temper, and finally gain them the ascendant. The leaders came over, and concluded not only by their sentiments, but by numerous bands of their partizans. The four city members in particular were followed by great multitudes, wearing ribbons, in which were woven these words, No protection for Englishmen: the king's guards to be mustered: his party likewise endeavoured to make a show of their strength: and on the whole, the assembly at Oxford rather bore the appearance of a tumultuous Polish diet, than of a regular English parliament.

The March, who had hitherto employed the most gracious expressions to all his parlia-

ments, particularly the two last, thought proper to address himself to the present in a more authoritative manner. He told the representatives of the body politic at Oxford, of the proceedings of the former House of Commons; and said that, as he would never use arbitrary government himself, neither would be ever suffer it in others. By expert at poisoning as her sister, the Countess of Soissons, would, with a little phial, execute that design; that upon the king's death, the army in Flanders was to come over and massacre the protagonists; that money was raised in Italy for recruits and supplies, and there should be no more parliaments; and that the duke was privy to this whole plan, and had even entered into the design of Godfrey's murder, which was executed in the manner related by the popular leaders.

The popular leaders, had, all along, been very desirous of having an accusation against the duke; and though Oates and Bedloe, in their first evidence, had not dared to go so far as to accuse the duchess and蒡; in some instances, they had encouraged to supply so material a defect, by comprehending him in the conspiracy. The Commons, therefore, finding that Fitzharris was also willing to serve this purpose, were not ashamed to adopt his evidence, and resolved for that end to save him from the destruction with which he was at present threatened. The king had removed him from the city-prison, where he was exposed to be tampered with by the exclusionists; had sent him to the Tower; and had ordered him to be prosecuted by an indictment at common law. In order to prevent his trial and execution, an impeachment was voted by the Commons against him, and sent up to the Lords. That they might more effectually content the court, they ordered it by way of derision, that the impeachment should be carried up by Secretary Jenkins; who was so provoked by the intended affront, that he at first refused obedience; though being threatened with the commitment of his own men, was induced to comply. The Lords voted to remit the affair to the ordinary courts of justice, before whom, as the attorney-general informed them, it was already determined to try Fitzharris. The Commons, however, continued, that the Pains were obliged to receive every impeachment from the Commons; and this indeed seems to have been the first instance of their refusal; they therefore voted, that the Lords, in rejecting their impeachment, had denied justice, and was a contempt of the Commons. They also declared, that whatever inferior court should proceed against Fitz-Harris, or any one that lay under impeachment, would be guilty of a high breach of privilege. Great heats were likely to ensue; and as the king saw no appearance of any better temper in the Commons, he gladly laid hold of the opportunity, afforded by a quarrel between the two Houses; and proceeded to a dissolution of parliament. The secret was so well kept, that the Commons had no intimation of it, till the black rod came to their door, and summoned them to attend the king at the house of Peers.

There was no regular measure, though it might have been foreseen, expected such astonishment in the country party, as deprived them of all spirit, and reduced them to absolute despair. They were sensible, though too late, that the king had finally taken his resolution, and was determined to endure any extremity rather than submit to those terms which they had resolved to impose upon him. They found, that he had patiently waited till affairs should come to full maturity; and having now engaged a national party on his side, had boldly set his enemies at defiance: no parliament, they knew, would be summoned for some years; and during that long interval, the court, though perhaps at the head of an inferior party, yet being possessed of all authority, would have every advantage to dispurse and disunite. These reflections crowed upon every one; and all the exclusionists were terrified, lest Charles should follow the blow by some action more violent. They were alarmed by what they saw for a long and obstinate opposition to his measures. The king, on his part, was no less apprehensive lest despair might prompt them to have recourse to force, and make some sudden attempt upon his person. Both parties therefore hurried on their preparations; and at length, such a crowd was left, in its usual emptiness and tranquility. The court party gathered force from the dispersion and absorption of their antagonists, and adhered more firmly to the king, whose resolutions, they now saw, could be entirely depended on. The volucres of the opposing party, exclusionists were every where exclaimed against and aggravated; and even the reality of the plot, that great engine of their authority, was openly called in question. The clergy especially were busy in this great revolution, and being menaced, partly by their own fears, partly by the insinuations of the king, which should be no more their antagonists as sectaries and republicans, and rejoiced in escaping these perils, which they believed to have been hanging over them. Principles the most opposite to civil liberty were every where to be heard; and, adopted in numerous addresses; where the king was flattered in his present measures, and congratulated on his escape from parliaments. Could words have been certainty that the king had contributed nothing to his escape from, and that nothing could be depended upon, which came from one so corrupt, and so lost to all sense of honour; yet were they inclined, from his perseverance, to rely somewhat more on his veracity in these last assurances. But it appears that his wife had some connexions with Mrs. Wall, the favourite maid of the Duchess of Portsmouth: and Fitzharris hoped, if he persisted in a story agreeable to the court, that some favour might, on that account, be shown to be a非常的 plot, or sham-plot, as they were then called, with which the court, it was imagined, had endeavoured to load their adversaries. 4

The country party had intended to make use of Fitz-harris's evidence against the duke and the catholics; and his execution was the great tendon of it; but the king and his ministers were resolved not to be contended with so slender an advantage. They were determined to pursue the victory, and to employ against the exclusionists those very offensive arms, however unfair, which that party, in their anxiety to appease their adversaries. The whole gang of spies, witnesses, informers, suborners, who had so long been supported and encouraged by the leading patriots, finding now that the king was entirely master, turned short upon their old patrons, and offered their service to the ministers. To the disgrace of the court and of the ace, they were received with hearty welcome; and their testimony, or rather perjury, made use of in order to commit legal murder upon the opposite party. With an air of triumph and derision it was asked, 4 Are not these men good witnesses, who have established the popish plot, upon whose testimony Stafford and so many catholics have been executed, and whom you yourselves have so long supported in your capacity of credit and veracity? You have admitted them into your bosom: they are best acquainted with your treasons; they are determined to accommodate a shape to serve their king and country; and, to that same effect, whenever they are meted to others, should now, by a righteous doom or vengeance, be measured out to you. 4

It is certain, that the principle of retaliation may serve to some cases as a full apology, in others as so alleviation, for a conduct which would otherwise be exposed to great blame. But these infamous arts, which poison justice in its very source, and break all the bands of human society, are so detestable and dangerous, that no pretence of retaliation can be pleaded as an apology or even an alleviation of the crime incurred by them. On the contrary, the greater indignation the king and his ministers felt, when formerly exposed to the perjuries of abandoned men, the more reluctance should they now have discovered against employing the same instruments of vengeance upon their antagonists.

The first person, on whom the ministers fell, was one College, a London joineer, who had become extremely noted for his zeal against popery, and was much connected with Shaftesbury and the leaders of the country party: for as they relied much upon the populace, men of College's rank and station were useful to them. College had been in the council of state; and to prevent the exclusion of the whole of the parliament; and this was made the foundation of his crime. It was pretended that a conspiracy had been entered into to seize the king's person, and detain him in execution, and plant difficulties in the way of conducting him to the sheriffs of London. The sheriffs of London were in strong opposition to the court; and it was not strange, that the grand jury named by them rejected the bill against College. The prisoner was therefore sent to Oxford, where the treason was said to have been committed. Lord Norris, a courtier, was sheriff of the county; and the inhabitants were in general devoted to the court party. A jury was named, consisting entirely of royalists; and though they were men of credit and character, yet such was the factious rage which prevailed, that little justice could be expected by the prisoner. Some papers, containing hints and directions for his defence, were taken from him, as he was conducted to his trial: an injustice, which some pretended to justify by alleging, that a like violence had been practised against a prisoner during the fury of the popish plot. Such wild notions of retaliation were at that time propagated by the court party. Many witnesses produced against College were Dugdale, Turville, Haynes, Smith; men who had before given evidence against the catholics; and whom the jury, for that very reason, regarded as the most perjured villains. College, though beset with so many toils, was opposed with so many inquities, defended himself with spirit, courage, capacity, presence of mind; and he invalidated the evidence of the crown, by convincing arguments and undoubtedly testimony: yet did the jury, after half an hour's deliberation, bring in a verdict against him. The inhuman spectators received the verdict with a shout of applause: but the prisoner was nowise dismayed. At his execution, more than 100,000 came to witness the scene of his punishment, and the crime imputed to him. His whole conduct and demeanour prove him to have been a man led astray only by the fury of the times, and to have been governed by no honest, but indiscriminate zeal for his country and his religion.

Thus the two parties, actuated by insatiable rage, but cooped up within the narrow limits of the law, levelled with poisoned daggers the most deadly blows against each other's breast, and buried in their factious divisions all regard to truth, honour, and humanity. 4

When the cabal entered into the mysterious alliance with France, they took care to remove the Duke of Ormond from the committee of foreign affairs; and nothing tended further to increase the national jealousy, entertained against the new minister, than to see a man of so much loyalty, as well as probity and honour, excluded from public councils. They had even so great interest with the king as to get Ormond recalled from the government of Ireland; and Lord Goodwood, afterwards Earl of Radnor, succeeded him in that important employment. Lord Berkeley succeeded Roberts; and the Earl of Essex, Berkeley. At last, in the year 1677, Charles cast his eye again upon Ormond, whom he had so long neglected; and sent him over lieutenant to Ireland. "I have done every thing," said the king, "to disoblige that man; but it is not in my power to make him my enemy." Ormond, during his disgrace, had never joined the malecontents, nor encouraged those clamours, which, with too much reason, but often for bad purposes, were raised against the king's measures. He even thought it his duty, regularly, though with dignity, to pay his court at Whitehall; and to preserve the state of his court, and the dignity, inclination, and principle, not on any temporary advantages. All the expressions, which dropped from him, while neglected by the court, showed more of good humour, than the most perjured villains, and threw no aspersion upon the king, who did you no service," said he to his friends. "I have only the power left by my applications to do you some hurt." When Colonel Cary Dillson solicited him to second his pretensions for an office, and urged that he had no friends but God and his grace: "Alas! poor Cary," replied the duke, "I pity thee: thou couldst not have two friends that possess less interest at court." "I am thrown by," said he on another occasion, "like an old rustick clock; yet even that neglected machinie, twice in twenty-four hours, points right."

On such occasions, when Ormond, from decency, paid his attendance at court, the king, equally ashamed to show him civility and to neglect him, was abashed and confounded. "Sir," said the profligate Buckingham, "I wish to know whether it be the Duke of Ormond that is out of favour with your majesty, or your majesty with the Duke of Ormond; for, of the two, you seem the most out of countenance."

When Charles found it his interest to show favour to the old royalists, and to the church of England, Ormond, who was much revered by that whole party, could not fail of recovering, together with the attendant court, the esteem of Ireland, his former credit and authority. His administration, when lord lieutenant, corresponded to the general tenor of his life; and tended equally to promote the interests of prince and people, of protestant and catholic. Ever firmly attached to the established religion, he was able, even during those jealous times, to escape suspicion, though he gratified not vulgar prejudices by any persecution of the popish party. The revenue of Ireland to three hundred thousand pounds a-year: he maintained a regular army of ten thousand men; he supported a well-disciplined militia of twenty thousand; and though the act of settlement, so far as men informed, that catholics were not permitted to live in corporate towns, they were guarded with so careful an eye, that the most timorous protestant never apprehended any danger from them.

The objective of Essex's ambition was to return to the station of lord lieutenant, where he had behavied with honour and integrity: Shaftesbury and Buckingham bore an extreme hatred to Ormond, both from personal and party considerations: the great aim of the anti-courtiers was to throw reflections on every part of the king's government. It could be no surprise, therefore, to the lord lieutenant to learn, that his administration was attacked in parliament, particularly by Shaftesbury; but lie had the satisfaction, at the same time, to hear of the keen, though polite, defence, made by his son, the generous Ossory. After justifying several particulars of Ormond's administration against that intriguing patriot, Ossory proceeded in the following words: "Having seen what the actual lieutenant has done, I presume with the same truth to tell your lordships what he has not done. He never advised the breaking of the triple league; he never advised the shutting up of the exchequer; he never advised the declaration of war; he never advised the falling out with the Dutch and the joining with France: he was not the author of that most excellent position, Delenda est Carthago, that Holland, a protestant country, should, contrary to the true interests of England, be totally destroyed. I beg that your lordships will be so just as to judge of my father and all men, according to their actions and their counsels." These few sentences, pronounced by a plain gallant soldier, produced a surprising effect upon the audience, and confounded all the rhetoric of his eloquent and factious adversary. The Prince of Orange, who extolled the former character as much as he despised the latter, could not forbear congratulating by letter the Earl of Ossory on this new species of victory which he had obtained.

Ossory, though he ever kept at a distance from faction, was the most popular man in the kingdom; though he never made any compliance with the court, he was beloved and respected by the king. A universal grief appeared on his death, which happened about this time, and which the populace, as is usual wherever there is a shock, was likely to interpret with sorrow. Ossory bore the loss with patience and dignity: though he ever retained a pleasing, however melancholy, sense of the signal merit of Ossory. "I would not exchange my dead son," said he, "for any living son in Christendom."

These particulars may appear a digression; but it is with pleasure, I own, that I relax myself for a moment in the contemplation of these humane and virtuous characters, amidst that scene of fury and faction, fraud and violence, in which at present our narration has unfortunately engaged us.

Besides the general interest of the country party to destroy the conduct of all the king's ministers, the prudent and peaceful administration of Ormond was in a particular manner displeasing to them. In England, where the catholics were scarcely one to a hundred, means had been found to excite a universal panic, on account of insurrection, sedition, and tumults, projected by that sect; and it could not but seem strange that in Ireland, where they exceeded the protestants six to one, there should be no symptoms appear of any combination or conspiracy. Such an incident, when duly considered, might even in England be viewed with credit of the plot, and diminish the authority of such leaders, who had so long, with such industry, inculcated the belief of it on the nation. Rewards, therefore, were published in Ireland to any that would bring intelligence or become witnesses; and some proffirates were sent over to that kingdom, with a commission to seek out evidence against the catholics. Under pretence of searching for arms or papers, they broke into houses, and plundered them: they threw innocent men into prison, and took precautions for the safety of others, with such difficulty that the country, commonly fertile enough in witnesses, could furnish them with any fit for their purpose.

At last, one Fitzgerald appeared, followed by Ive, Sanvon, Dennis, Bourke, two Macnamara, and some others. These men were immediately sent over to England; and though they possessed neither character sufficient to gain the respect of their associates, nor intelligence sufficient to work credit with them, they were caressed, rewarded, supported, and recommended by the Earl of Shaftesbury. Oliver Plunket, the titular primacie of Ireland, a man of peaceable dispositions, was condemned and executed upon such testimony. And the Oxford parliament entered so far into the matter as to vote, that they were entirely satisfied in the reality of the horrid and damnable Irish plot. But such decisions, though at first regarded as infallible, had now lost much of their authority; and the public still remained somewhat indifferent and incredulous.

After the dissolution of the parliament, and the subsequent victory of the royalists, Shaftesbury's evidences, with their periodical attacks on the new ministers, and gave information of high treason against their former patron. It is sufficiently scandalous, that intelligence, conveyed by such men, should have been attended to; but there is some reason to think, that the court agents, now displayed, were more interested in the matter, and were active in endeavouring, though in vain, to find more reputable persons to support the blasted credit of the Irish witnesses. Shaftesbury was committed to prison, and his indictment was presented to the grand jury. The new sheriffs of London, Shute and Pilkington, were engaged as deeply as their predecessors in the country party; and they took care to name a jury devoted to the same cause: a precaution quite necessary, when it was scarcely possible to find men indifferent or attached to either party. As far as swearing could go, the treason was clearly proved against Shaftesbury; or rather so clearly as to merit no kind of credit or attention. Shaftesbury that veteran leader of a party, nursed from his earliest a hatred to faction and intrigue, to cabals and conspiracies, was represented as opening without reserve his treasonable intentions to these obscure banditti, and throwing out such abundant views of the king, as none but men of low education, like themselves, could be supposed to employ. The draft of an association, it is true, against popery and the duke, was found in Shaftesbury's lodgings, after his execution; but he might be drawn from many clauses of that paper. But it did not appear, that it had been framed by Shaftesbury, or so much as approved by him. And as projects of an association had been proposed in parliament, it was very natural for this nobleman, or his correspondents, to be thinking of some plan, which it might be proper to lay before that assembly. The grand jury, therefore, after weighing all these circumstances, rejected the indictment; and the people, who attended the hall, testified their joy by the loudest acclamations, which were echoed throughout the whole city.

About this time a scheme of oppression was laid in Scotland, after a manner still more flagrant, against a nobleman much less obnoxious than Shaftesbury; and as that country was reduced to a state of almost total subjection, the project had the good fortune to succeed.

The Earl of Argyll, from his youth, had distinguished himself by his loyalty, and had attempted a strong attachment to the royal family. Though his father was head of the coventeners, he himself refused to concur in any of their measures; and when a commission of colonel was given him to enter the execution of some measure, he acted upon it, till it should be ratified by the king. By his respectful behaviour, as well as by his services, he made himself acceptable to Charles, when that prince was in Scotland; and even after the battle of Worcester, all the misfortunes which attended the royal cause, could not engeage him to desert it. Under Middleton, he obstinately persevered to harass and infest the victorious English; and it was not till he received orders from that general, that he would submit to accept of a capitulation. Such jealousy of his, and the peril he was under, of the treachery of some commercial interests, wealth and protector, that a pretence was soon after fallen upon to commit him to prison; and his confinement was rigorously continued till the restoration. The king, sensible of the necessity of having men of his friends to help him, pardoned Argyle, and created him Earl of Argyle; and when a most unjust sentence was passed upon him by the Scottish parliament, Charles had anew remitted it. In the subsequent part of this reign, Argyle behaved himself most piously; and though he seemed not disposed to go all lengths with the court, he was always present, even in his opposition, to be a moe of timid dispositions and peaceable deportment.

A parliament was summoned at Edinburgh this summer, and the duke was appointed commissioner. Besides granting money to the king, and voting the indefeasible right of succession, this parliament enacted a test, which all persons, possessed of offices, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, were bound to take. To this test, the king's subscription was, the covenant renounced, passive obedience asserted to, and all obligations disclaimed of endeavouring any alteration in civil or ecclesiastical establishments. This was the state of the test, as proposed by the courtiers; but the parliament was not satisfied with it, which could not without decency be refused, expressing the person's adherence to the protestant religion. The whole was of an enormous length, considered as an oath; and what was worse, a confession of faith was there ratified, which had been imposed a little after the Reformation, and which contained many articles altogether forgotten by the parliament and nation. Among others, the doctrine of resistance was inculcated; so that the test, being voted in a hurry, was found on examination to be a medley of contradiction and absurdity. Several persons, the most attached to the crown, scrupled to take it; the bishops and many of the clergy renounced it; the Earl of Queensberry refused to swear, except he might be allowed to add an explanation; and even the privy council thought it necessary to publish, for general satisfaction, a solution of some difficulties attending the test.

Though the courtiers could not reject the clause of adhering to the protestant religion, they proposed, as a necessary mark of respect, that all princes of the blood should be exempted from taking the oath. This exception was negatived; but the king never assented to the test. Any such danger to be dreaded for the protestant religion must proceed from the perseverance of the royal family. By insisting on such topics, he drew on himself the secret indignation of the duke, of which he soon felt the fatal consequences.

When Argyle took the test, he did it also under the subjoin'd, in the duke's presence, an explanation, which he had before-hand communicated to that prince, and which he believed to have been approved by him. It was in these words: "I have considered the test, and am very desirous of giving obedience as far as I can. I am confident that the parliament never intended to impose contradictory oaths; therefore, I think, no man can explain it but for himself. Accordingly, I take it as far as it is consistent with itself and the protestant religion. And I do declare, that I mean not to bind myself, in my station, and in a lawful way, from wishing and endeavouring any alteration, which I think to be the advantage of church or state, and not repugnant to the protestant religion and my loyalty: and this I understand as a part of my oath." The duke, as was natural, heard these words with great tranquillity; no one took the least offence: Argyle was admitted to sit that day in council; and it was impossible to imagine that a capital offence had been committed, where occasion seemed not to have been given, so much as for a frown or reprimand.

The duke, however, a few days after, to find that a warrant was issued for committing him to prison; that he was indicted for high treason, leasing-making, and perjury; and that from these innocent words an accusation was extracted, by which he was to forfeit honours, life, and fortune. It is needless to enter into particulars, where the injustice of the whole is so apparent. Though the sword of justice was displayed, even her semblance was not put on; and the forms alone of law were preserved, in order to sanction some unconstitutional power. Of five judges, three did not scruple to find the guilt of treason and leasing-making to be incurred by the prisoner: a jury of fifteen noblemen gave verdict against him: and the execution of the sentence was pronounced; but the execution of it to be suspended till further orders.

It was pretended by the duke and his creatures, that Argyle's life and fortune were not in any danger, and that the sole reason for pushing the trial to such extremities against him, was in order to make him renounce some hereditary jurisdictions, which gave his family a dangerous authority in the highlands, and obstructed the course of public justice. But allowing the end to be justifiable, the means were infamous; and such as were incompatible, not only with a free but a civilised government. Argyle had therefore no reason to trust any longer to the justice or to the integrity of such enemies: he made his escape from prison, and till he should find a ship for Holland, he concealed himself during some time in London. The king heard of his lurking-place, but would not allow him to be arrested. All the parts, however, of his sentence, as far as the govenor in Scotland, were duly performed and executed; his estate confiscated, his arms reversed and torn.

It would seem, that the genuine passion State of affairs for liberty was at this time totally extinguished in Scotland; there was only preserved a spirit of mutiny and sedition, encouraged by a mistaken zeal for religion. Cameron and Cargil, two furious preachers, went a step beyond all their brethren: they publicly excommunicated the king for his tyranny, and breach of the covenant; and they renounced all allegiance to him. Cameron was killed by the troops in an action at Armissos; Cargil was taken and hanged. Many of their followers were tried and convicted. Their lives were offered them if they would say, God save the king; but they would only agree to pray for his repentance. This obstinacy was much insisted on as an apology for the rigours of the administration: but if duly considered, it will rather afford reason for a contrary inference. Such an unhappy delusion is an object rather of commination than of anger: and it is almost impossible that men could have been carried to such a degree of frenzy, unless provoked by a long train of violence and oppression.

As the king was master in England, and A. D. 1603. no longer dreaded the clanneries of the country party, he permitted the duke to pay him a visit; and James soon after prevailed on to allow of his return to England, and of his being elected a part in the new parliament. The duke went to Scotland, in order to bring up his family, and settle the government of that country; and he chose to take his passage by sea. The ship struck on a sand-bank, and was lost: the duke escaped in the barge; and it is pretended that, while many persons of rank and quality were drowned, and among the rest Hyde, his brother-in-law, he was very careful to save several of his dogs and priests: for these two species of favourites are coupled together by some writers. It has likewise been asserted, that the barge might safely have held more persons, and that some who swam to it were thrust off, and even their hands cut, in order to disengage them. But every action of every eminent person, during this period, is so liable to be misunderstood and misrepresented by faction, that we ought to be very cautious in passing judgment on too slight evidence. It is remarkable, that the sailors on board the ship, though they felt themselves sinking, and saw inevitable death before their eyes, yet, as soon as they observed the duke to be in safety, gave a loud shout, in testimony of their joy and satisfaction.

The duke, during his absence in Scotland, had behaved with great civility towards the gentry and nobility; and by his counsly demeanour had much won upon their affections: but his treatment of the enthusiasm was still somewhat rigorous; and in many instances he appeared to be a man of a scree, if not an unrelenting temper. It is even asserted, that he sometimes assailed at the torture of criminals, and looked on with tranquillity, as if he were considering a game. He left the impression then in the hands of the Earl of Abercorn, chancellor, and the Earl of Queensberry, treasurer. A very arbitrary spirit appeared in their administration; a gentleman of the name of Weir was tried, because he had kept company with some low people in the town; but that point had never been marked out by process or proclamation. The inferences upon which Weir was condemned (for a prosecution by the government and a condemnation were in those days the same thing) but taking the following manner: no man, it was supposed, could have been in a rebellion without being exposed to suspicion in the neighbourhood; if the neighbourhood had suspected him, it was to be presumed that each individual had likewise heard of the grounds of suspicion: every man was bound to declare to the government his suspicion against every man, and to avoid the company of traitors; to fail in this duty was to participate in the treason: the conclusion on the whole was, You have conversed with a rebel; therefore you are yourself a rebel. A reviurew was, with some difficulty, procured for Weir; but it was seriously determined to make use of the precedent. Courts of Castle, which were erected in the thirteen and west nine counties, and a strict inquisition carried on against this new species of crime. The term of three years was appointed for the continuance of these courts; after which any new representation having to be taken, the test, was instantly entitled to the benefit of this indemnity. The presbytery, alarmed with such tyranny, from which no man could deem himself safe, began to think of leaving the country, and some of those agents were sent to England, in order to treat with the proprietors of Carolina for a settlement in that colony. Any condition seemed preferable to their living in their native country, which, by the prevalence of persecution and violence, was become as insecure to them as a den of robbers.

Above two thousand persons were outlawed on pretence of their conversing or having intercourse with rebels; and they were continually hunted in their retreat by soldiers, spurs, informers, and oppressive magistrates. It was usual to put insinuating questions to people living peaceably in their own houses; such as, "Will you renounce the covenant? Do you esteem the rising at Bothwell to be rebellious? Is the killing of the Archbishop of St. Andrews a murder?" And when the poor deluded creatures refused to answer, capital punishments were inflicted on them. Even women were brought to the gibbet for this pretended crime, and murder was fastened on by public prosecution, had published a sedition declaration; renouncing allegiance to Charles Stuart, whom they called, as they, for their parts, had indeed some reason to esteem him, a tyrant. This incident afforded the privy-council a pretext for an unusual kind of oppression. Soldiers were dispersed over the country, and power was given to all commission-officers, even the lowest, to oblige every one they met with to abjure the declaration; and upon refusal, instantly, without further questions, to shoot the delinquent. It were endless, as well as shocking, to enumerate all the instances of persecution, or in other words, of absurd tyranny, which at that time prevailed in Scotland. One reason, however, is so singular, that I cannot forbear relating it.

Three women were seized; and the customary oath was tendered to them, by which they were to swear above five oaths, and that they had been, together with five women, and were condemned to a capital punishment by drowning. One of them was an elderly woman: the other two were young; one eighteen years of age, the other only thirteen. Even these violent persecutors were ashamed to put the youngest to death by the other means given them, and were condemned to a capital punishment by drowning. The two younger were conducted to the place of execution, and were tied to stakes within the sea-mark at low-water: a contrivance which rendered their death lingering and dreadful. The elderly woman was placed furthest in, and by the rising of the waters was first suffocated. The younger, partly terrified with the view of her companion's death, partly subdued by the entreaty of her friends, was prevailed with to abjure the declaration. As she was determined to make the spectators call out that she had submitted; she was commanded to stand up to the stake. Major Winram, the officer who guarded the execution, again required her to sign the abjuration; and upon her refusal, he ordered her instantly to be plunged in the water. Although that punishment had never been marked out by process or proclamation.

The severity of the administration in Scotland is in part to be ascribed to the duke's temper, to whom the king had consigned over the government of that country, and who gave submission to actions as to allow nothing of moment to escape him. Even the government of England, from the same cause, began to be somewhat infected with the same severity. The duke's credit was great at court. Though neither so much beloved nor esteemed as the king, he was more dreaded; and thence an attendance more exact, as well as a submission more obsequious, was paid to him. The saying of Waller was remarked, that Charles, in spite of the parliament, who had determined that the duke should not succeed the king, was resolved that he should reign even in his life-time.

The king, however, who loved to maintain a balance in his counsels, still supported Haddington, whom he created a duke, in order to oppose the king. This man, who possessed the finest genius and most extensive capacity of all employed in public affairs during the reign, was determined to turn the country against his party, and was esteemed the head of that small body known by the denomination of Trimmers. This conduct, which is more natural to men of integrity than of ambition, could not, however, please him the former character; and he was always, with reason, regarded as an intriguer rather than a patriot. Sunderland, who had promoted the exclusion bill, and who had been displaced on that account, was again, with the duke's consent, brought into the administration. The extreme duplicity, at least variablesiness, of this man's conduct, through the whole course of his life, made it be suspected that it was by the king's direction he had mixed with the country party. Hyde, created Earl of Rochester, was first commissioner of the treasury, and was entirely in the duke's interests.

The king himself was obliged to act as the head of a party; a disagreeable situation for a prince, and always the cause of much repression. He knew how monstrous the dissenters were to the church, and he resolved, contrary to the maxims of toleration which he had hitherto supported in England, to gratify his friends by the establishment of conformity. The two parties were now rigorously executed; an expedient which, the king knew, would diminish neither the numbers nor influence of the nonconformists; and which is therefore to be deemed more the result of passion than of policy.Securely any persecution serves the intended purpose but such as amounts to a total extermination.

Though the king's authority made every day great advances, it still met with considerable obstacles, chiefly from the city, which was entirely in the hands of the malcontents. The juries, in particular, named the sheriffs, were not likely to be impartial judges between the crown and the people; and, after the experiments already made, in the case of Stair, the situation of that of College, treason it was apprehended might there be committed with impunity. There could not therefore be a more important service to the court than to put affairs to a change. Lord Chancellor Jenkinson, who had been so long an employee of the Duke, was again made Lord Chancellor, and the Duke, by the influence of his friends, carried with him a strong party. That being lately returned from Turkey, he was, on account of his recent experience, better qualified to serve the purposes of the court. A poll was opened for the election of another

Sheriff; and here began the contest. The majority of the common hall, headed by the two sheriffs of the former year, refused to acknowledge the mayor's right of appointing one sheriff, but insisted that both must be elected by the livery. Papillon and Dubos were the men that the common hall and their Protestant subjects, it is said, elected: Box was pointed out by the couriers. The poll was opened; but as the mayor would not allow the election to proceed for two vacancies, the sheriffs and he separated. The county, one of the expense party, who voted with the sheriffs for Papillon and Dubos, were much more numerous than those who voted with the mayor for Box: but as the mayor insisted, that his election was necessary, to remove the danger of a new court, the poll was duly held all difficulties, however, were not surmounted. Box, apprehensive of the consequences which might attend so dubious an election, fined off; and the mayor found it necessary to proceed to a new choice. When the matter was proposed to the common hall, a loud cry was raised, No election! No election! The two sheriffs already elected, Papillon and Dubos, were insisted on as the only legal magistrates. But as the mayor still maintained, that the elections of 1678 had been legally obtained, and that it was now requisite to supply his place, he opened books anew; and during the tumult and confusion of the citizens, a few of the mayor's partisans elected Rich, who was confirmed in the election by the lawyers. North and Rich were accordingly sworn in sheriffs for the ensuing year; but it was necessary to send a guard of the train-bands to protect them in entering upon their office.

25th Oct.

The next day, after chosen, by means, as it is pretended, still more violent and irregular.

Thus the country party were disgusted from their strong hold in the city, where, even since the commencement of factions in the English government, they had, without interruption, almost without molestation, maintained a superiority. It had been happy, had the partialities, hitherto opposed to the law, been corrected, without giving place to partialities of an opposite kind. But in the present distracted state of the nation, an equitable neutrality was almost impossible to be attained. The court and church party, who were now named on jurors, made justice subservient to their factious views; and the king had a prospect of obtaining full revenge on his enemies. It was not long before the effects of these altercations were seen. When it was first reported, that the duke intended to leave Scotland, the gentlemen set about the country party for the expense, it being a very violent man, had broken out in these terms, "He has already burned the city, and is now coming to cut all our throats!" For these scandalous expressions, the duke sued Papillon and Dubos, as damages, for 100,000 pounds, were decreed against him. By the law of England, ratified in the great charter, no fine or damages ought to extend to the total ruin of a criminal. Sir Patience was procured to swear a declaration of a certain Mr. Walker, who was accused for perjury and condemned to the pillory: a severe sentence, and sufficient to deter all witnesses from appearing in favour of those who were prosecuted by the court.

A.D. 1663.

But though the crown bad obtained so great a victory in the city, it was not quite decisive; and the contest might be renewed every year at the election of magistrates. An important measure therefore, not only to make the king master of the city, but by that precedent to gain him uncontrollable influence in all the corporations of England, and thereby give the greatest wound to the legal constitution, which the most powerful arbitrary monarchs had ever yet been able to inflict. A writ of quo warranto was issued against the city; that is, an inquiry into the validity of its charter. It was pretended, that the city had thereby of its own free will, and out of desire to be declared no longer a corporation, on account of two offences which the city of aldermen and common council had committed. After the great fire in 1666, all the marks of property and the public buildings, not only to be fitted up with many conveniences; and, in order to defray the expense, the magistrates had imposed a small toll on goods brought to market: in the year 1679, the king addressed the

against the prorogation of parliament, and had employed the following terms:—Your petitioners are greatly surprised at the late prorogation, whereby the prosecution of the public justice of the kingdom, and the making of necessary provisions for the preservation of your majesty's peace, and for the punishment of the offenders is withheld. These words were pretended to contain a scandalous reflection on the king and his measures. The cause of the city was defended against the attorney and solicitor generals by Treby and Papillon. These last pleaded, that, since the foundation of the monarchy, no corporation had ever yet been exposed to forfeiture, and the thing itself implied an absurdity: that no corporation, as such, was incapable of being a public offence, and none were answerable for any inquity but the persons themselves who committed it: that the members, in choosing magistrates, bad intrusted them with legal powers only; and where the magistrates exceeded these powers, their acts were void, but could never involve the body itself in any criminal imputation: that such had ever been the practice of England, except at the reformation, when the monasteries were abolished; but this was not an extraordinary case; and it was even thought necessary to ratify afterwards the whole transaction by act of parliament: that corporate bodies, framed for public good, and calculated for perpetual duration, ought not to be arbitrary faults of the law, to which they might themselves, without hurting the community, be questioned for their offences: that even a private estate, if entailed, could not be forfeited to the crown, on account of treason committed for the ancestor; and the same demesne went to the next in remainder: that the offences, objected to the city, far from deserving so severe a punishment, were not even worthy of the smallest reprehen sion: that the corporation were invested with rights of making by-laws; and the smallest borough in England bad ever been allowed to carry the exercise of this power further than London had done in the instance complained of: that the city, having, at its own expense, repaired the markets, which were built upon its own estate, might as lawfully claim a small recompense from such as brought commodities thither, as a man might require rent for a house of which he was possessed: that those who disliked the condition might abstain from the market; and whoever paid, had done it voluntarily: that it was an arrows right of the subjects to petition; nor had the city in their address abused this privilege: that the king himself had often declared, that parliament ought to be in danger to be in danger from the popish plot; which, it is evident, could not be fully prosecuted but in a parliamentary manner; that the impeachment of the popish lords was certainly obstructed by certain prerogatives; as was also the enacting of necessary laws, and the defence of the nation: that the loyalty of the city, no less than their regard to self-preservation, might prompt them to frame the petition; since it was acknowledged, that the king's life was every moment exposed to the most imminent danger from the popish conspiracy; that the city had not accused the king of obstructing justice, much less of having any such intention; since it was allowed, that evil counsellors were alone answerable for all the pernicious consequences of any measure: and that it was unaccountable, that two public deeds which had not, during so long a time, subjected to any, even the smallest penalty, the persons offending therein, should now be punished so severely upon the corporation, which always was, and always must be, innocent.

It is evident, that those who would apologize for the measure, and made the case, that in this case, found their arguments not on law, but reasons of state. The judges, therefore, who condemned the city, are inexcusable; since the sole object of their determinations must be to uphold the pure principles of justice and equity. But the office of judge was at that time held during pleasure; and it was impossible that any cause, where the court bent its force, could ever be carried against it. After sentence was pronounced, the city applied in an humble manner to the king, and he was about to restitute their charter, but in return they were obliged to submit to the following regulations: that no mayor, sheriff, recorder, common serjeant, town clerk, or coroner, should be admitted to the exercise of his office without his majesty's appointment; that if in any faction the Twice of the mayor or sheriffs elected, he may by commission appoint these magistrates; that the mayor and court of aldermen may, with his majesty's leave, dispense any magistracy; and that no alderman, in the presence of a vacancy, shall be elected without consent of the court of aldermen, who, if they disapprove twice of the choice, may fill the vacancy.

All the corporations in England, having power by a special act of parliament, were moved to see how vain it would prove to contend with the court, and were, most of them, successively induced to surrender their charters into the king's hands. Considerable sums were exacted for restoring the charters; and all offices of power and profit were left at the disposal of the crown. It seems strange, that the independent royalists, who never meant to make the crown absolute, should yet be so elated with the victory obtained over their adversaries, as to approve of the step, which left no national privileges in security, but enabled the king, under like pretences, and by means of like instruments, to recall anew all those charters, which at present he was pleased to grant. And every friend to liberty must allow, that the nation, whose constitution was thus broken in the shock of faction, had a right, by every prudent expedient, to recover that security of which it was so unhappily bereaved.

The faction adhering to the crown, it is apparent, that resistance, however justifiable, could never be prudent; and all wise men saw no expedient but peaceably to submit to the present grievances. There was, however, a remote and insidious meditations evident in this disposition, that, even before this last iniquity, which laid the whole constitution at the mercy of the king, they had meditated plans of resistance; at a time when it could be as easily as practicable to carry them in execution. In the short time before the Oxford parliament, the king was seized with a fit of sickness at Windsor, which gave great alarm to the public. The Duke of Monmouth, a conspiracy, headed by Lord Russell, and instigated by the restless Shaftesbury, had agreed, in case the king's sickness should prove mortal, to rise in arms, and to oppose the succession of the duke. Charles recovered; but these dangerous projects were not laid aside. ancient constitution, and intended only the exclusion of the duke, and the redress of grievances. Lord Howard was a man of no principle, and was ready to embrace any party which his immediate interest should recommend to him. But notwithstanding this difference of characters and of views, their common hatred of the duke and the present administration united them in one party; and the dangerous experiment of an insurrection was fully reserved.

While these schemes were concerting among the leaders, there was an inferior order of conspirators, who held frequent meetings; and, together with the insurrection, carried on projects quite unknown to Monmouth and the cabal of

By-louse plot.

sey, an old republican officer, who had distinguished himself in Portugal, and had been recommended to the king by Mareschal Schomberg; Lieutenant-colonel Walcot, likewise a republican officer; Goodenough, under-sheriff of London, a zealous and noted party-man; West, Tyley, Norton, Aylobe, lawyers; Ferguson, Rouse, Home, Keiling, Holloway, Bourne, Lee, Rumhald. Most of these last were merchants or tradesmen; and the only persons of this confederacy who had access to the leaders of the party, were Rumsey and Ferguson. When these men met together, they indulged themselves in the most desperate and audacious sentiments. They pretended to have mentioned the assassination of the king and the duke, to which they had given the familiar appellation of hopping; they even went so far as to have thought of a scheme for that purpose. Rumhald, who was a malstress, possessed a farm called the King's Farm, with which he intended to fence the New-marlc, whether the king commonly went once a-year for the diversion of the races. A plan of this farm had been laid before some of the conspirators by Rumhald, who showed them how easy it would be, by removing the fences, to throw the king at a place which the king took as his private retreat; while they might fire upon him from the hedges, and be enabled afterwards, through by-lanes and across the fields, to make their escape. But this plan, though it promised great advantage to the conspirators, no concerted design was as yet laid, nor any men, horses, or arms, provided: the whole was little more than loose discourse, the overflows of the drowsy and raving. A house, in which the king lived at Newmarket, took fire accidentally; and he was obliged to leave that place eight days sooner than he intended. To this circumstance his safety was afterwards ascribed; and the conspiracy was detected; and the court party could have no reason of admiring the wise disposal of Providence. It is indeed certain, that as the king had thus unexpectedly left Newmarket, he was worse attended than usual; and Rumhald informed his confederates, with the greatest exultation, that a fine opportunity was thus unfortunately lost.

Among the conspirators I have mentioned Keiling, a sailor in London. This man had been engaged in a bold measure of arresting the mayor of London, at the suit of Papillon and Dubois, the outcast sheriffs; and being liable to prosecution for that action, he thought it safest to purchase a pardon, by revealing the conspiracy, in which he was deeply concerned. He brought to secretary Jenkins intelligence of the assassination-plot; but as he was a single evidence, the secretary, whom many false plots had previously rendered incredulous, scrupled to issue warrants for the confiscation of so many persons. Keiling, therefore, in order to fortify his testimony, engaged his brother in treasonable discourse with Goodenough, one of the conspirators: and Jenkins began now to give more attention to the intelligence. The conspirators had got some hint of the danger in which they were involved; and all of them concealed themselves. One person alone, of the name of Harley, an instrument-maker, was tried, and acquitted, in consequence of many particulars with Keiling's information, the affair seemed to be put out of all question: and a more diligent search was everywhere made, after the conspirators.

West, the lawyer, and Colonel Rumsey, finding the perils to which they were exposed in endeavouring to escape, resolved to save their own lives at the expense of their companions; and they surrendered themselves with an intention of becoming evidence. West could do little more than confirm the testimony of Keiling with regard to the assassination plot; but Rumsey, besides giving additional confirmation of the same design, was at last, though with much difficulty, led to reveal the meetings at Shephard's. Shephard was immediately apprehended; and had not courage to maintain fidelity to his confederates. Upon his information, several more of his great men engaged in the conspiracy. Monmouth absconded: Russell was sent to the Tower: Gray was arrested, but escaped from the messenger: Howard was taken, while he concealed himself in a chimney; and was seized by a certain assemblage of men assembled at Ruislip. In these circumstances, he scrupled not, in hopes of a pardon and a reward, to reveal the whole conspiracy. Essex, Sidney, and Hambden, were immediately apprehended upon his evidence. Every day some of the conspirators were detected in their lurking-places, and thrown into prison.

Lieutenant-colonel Walcot was first brought to his trial. This man, who was once noted for bravery, had been so far overcome by the love of life that he had written to Secretary Jenkins, and had offered, upon promise of pardon, to turn evidence: but no sooner had he taken this mean step than he felt more generous motives and a more manly spirit, and was resolved, in vain, to conceal himself. The witnesses against him were Rumsey, West, Shephard, together with Bourne, a brewer. His own letter to the secretary was produced, and rendered the testimony of the witnesses unquestionable. Home and Rouse, also, were tried. The story of the confederacy, as well as Walcot, acknowledged, at their execution, the justice of the sentence; and from their trial and confession it is sufficiently apparent, that the plan of an insurrection had been retailed by the conspirators, and that even the assassination had been often talked of, and not without the approbation of many of the conspirators.

The condemnation of these criminals was to the trial of Lord Russell. This nobleman was probably intended to be the leader of the conspiracy, and the great man of the insurrection: but the fact that the evidence had been brought against him, as well as Walcot, acknowledged, at their execution, the justice of the sentence; and from their trial and confession it is sufficiently apparent, that the plan of an insurrection had been retailed by the conspirators, and that even the assassination had been often talked of, and not without the approbation of many of the conspirators.

The condemnation of these criminals was to the trial of Lord Russell, and served to impress the public with a thorough belief of the conspiracy, as well as a horror against it. The witnesses produced against the noble prisoner were, Rumsey, Shephard, and Lord Howard. Rumsey swore, that he himself had been introduced to the cabal at Shephard's, where Russell was present; and had delivered them a message from Shaftesbury, urging them to hasten the intended insurrection; but had received for answer, that it was found necessary to delay the design, and that Shaftesbury must therefore, for some time, rest contented. This answer, he said, was delivered by Ferguson: but was assented to by the prisoner. He added, that some of his party had been engaged in taking a survey of the guards; and he thought that Monmouth, Gray, and Armstrong, undertook to view them. Shephard deposed, that his house had before-hand been bespoken by Ferguson for the secret meeting of the conspirators, and that he had been careful to keep all his servants from approaching them, and had served them himself. Their discourse, he said, ran chiefly upon the means of surprising the guards; and it was agreed, that Monmouth and his two friends should take a survey of them. The report, which they brought next meeting, was, that the guards were remiss, and that the design was practicable; but he did not affirm that my resolution was taken for executing it. Then he was asked whether he had been present at both these meetings; but he was sure that at least he was present at one of them. A declaration, he added, had been read by Ferguson in Russell's presence: the reasons of the intended insurrection were there set forth, and all the public grievances fully displayed.

Lord Howard had been one of the cabal of six, established after Shaftesbury's flight; and two meetings had been held by the conspirators at Enniskillen, through his agency at Russell's. Howard deposed, that at the first meeting it was agreed to begin the insurrection in the country before the city; the places were fixed, the proper quantity and kind of arms agreed on, and the persons engaged concerted: that at the second meeting the conversation chiefly turned upon their correspondence with Argyle and the discontented Scots, and that the principal management of that affair was intrusted to Sydney, who had sent one Aaron Smith into Scotland with proper instructions. He added, that in these deliberations no question was put, or votes collected; but there was no contradiction; and he took it, all of them, and the prisoner among the rest, gave their consent.

Rusney and Shephard were very unwilling witnesses against Russell, and it appeared, that several arguments of a constitutional nature, which had passed above eight months before, and which the persons had not at that time any intention to reveal, may beget some slight objection to their evidence. But on the whole it was undoubtedly proved, that the insurrection had been deliberated on by the prisoner, and fully resolved; the apprehension of the government having been deliberated on, but not fully resolved; and that an assassination had never once been mentioned nor imagined by him. So far the matter of fact seems certain: but still with regard to law, there remained a difficulty, and that of an important nature.

The English laws of treason, both in the manner of defining that crime, and in the proof required, are the most absurd, most inequitable, that are any where to be found. The two chief species of treason, contained in the statute of Edward III. are the compassing and intending of the king's death, and the actual levying of war against him; and by the law of Mary, the latter must be proved by the concurrence of testimony of two witnesses, to some overt act, tending to these purposes. But the lawyers, partly desirous of paying court to the sovereign, partly convinced of all consequences of the stopping of this act, and partly to avoid limitations, have introduced a greater latitude, both in the proof and definition of the crime. It was not required that the two witnesses should testify the same precise overt act: it was enough if they both testified some overt act of the same treason; and though this evasion may seem a subtility, it had long prevailed in the courts of judicature, and had at last been solemnly fixed by parliament at the trial of Lord Stafford. The lawyers had thus given to the same freedom with the law of Edward III. They had observed, that, by that statute, if a man should enter into a conspiracy for a rebellion, should even fix a correspondence with foreign powers for that purpose, should provide arms and money, yet, if he were detected and no rebellion ensued, he could not be tried for treason. To prevent this inconvenience, which it had been better to remedy by a new law, they had commonly had their indictment for intent to levy war: and the king's life, while he had produced no overt intention of rebellion as a proof of that other intention. But though this form of indictment and trial was very frequent, and many criminals had received sentence upon it, it was still considered as somewhat irregular, and may plainly confounding by a sophism, two species of treason, which the statute had accurately distinguished. What made this refinement still more exceptionable was, that a law had passed soon after the restoration; in which the consulting or the intending of a rebellion was, during Charles's lifetime, declared treason; and it was required, that the prosecution should be commenced within six months after the crime was committed. But notwithstanding this statute, the lawyers had provided themselves with the sophisme of evidence, that no one had murmured against this interpretation of the statute; and the lawyers thought that they might follow the precedent, even in the case of the late king. And, as, it is generally believed, Lord Russell's conspiracy was fell plainly within the statute of Charles the 1st.; but the facts sworn to by Rusney and Shephard were beyond the six months required by law, and to the other facts Lords Coningsby adduced. To make the indictment, therefore, more extensive, the intention of conspiring the king was comprehended in it; and for proof of this intention the conspiracy for raising a rebellion was assigned; and what seemed to bring the matter still nearer, the design of attacking the king's guards.

Russell, for his irregularity, and desired to have the point argued by counsel; the chief justice told him, that this favour could not be granted, unless he previously confessed the facts charged upon him. The artificial confessions of the two species of treason, though a piece supported by many precedents, is the chief, but not the only, hardship of which Russell had reason to complain on his trial. His defence was feeble; and he contended himself with protesting, that he never had entertained any design against the life of the king: his sincerity would not allow him to deny the conspiracy for an insurrection. The jury were men of fair and reputable characters, but zealous royalists: after a short deliberation, they brought in the Applications were made to the king for a pardon: even money to the amount of a hundred thousand pounds was offered to the Duchess of Portsmouth by the old Earl of Bedford, father to Russell. The king was inexorable. He had been extremely harassed with the violence of the country party; and he had observed, that the prisoner, besides his secret designs, had always been carried to the scandal of his country, and had always been under some suspicion, and had even adopted a sentiment, similar to what we meet with in a letter of the younger Brutus. Had his father, he said, advised the king to reject the rejection bill, he would be the first to move for a parliamentary impeachment against him. Such various proofs of the hereditary family was observed, his popularity, his humanity, his justice, his virtue, became so many crimes, and were used as arguments against sparing him. Charles therefore would go no farther than restoring the most innocuous part of the sentence, which the law requires to be pronounced against traitors. "Lord Russell," said he, "shall find, that I am possessed of that prerogative, which, in the case of a prince, entitles me to the exercise of my prerogative in these circumstances. I have ordered that the fury of the country party had rendered it impossible for the king, without the imminent danger of his crown, to pardon so many catholics, whom he firmly believed innovators, and with affectionate and loyal to him; he probably thought that, since the edge of the law was now ready to fall upon that party themselves, they could not reasonably expect that he would interpose to save them.

Russell's consort, a woman of virtue, daughter and heir of the good Earl of Southampton, threw herself at the king's feet, and pleaded with many tears the merits and loyalty of her father, as an atonement for those errors, into which honest, however mistaken, principles had the prince debauched: and the dignity of her sex, the instance of female weakness (if they deserve the name) which she betrayed. Finding all applications vain, she collected courage, and not only fortified herself against the fatal blow, but endeavoured, by her example, to strengthen the resolution of her unfortunate lord. With a tender and decent composure, they took leave of each other on the day of his execution. "The bitterness of death is now past," said he, "as he turned from her. Lord Cavendish had lived in the closest intimacy with Russell, and deserted not his friend in the present calamity. He offered to manage his escape by changing clothes with him, and remaining at all hazards in his stead. But Russell persevered to the end, which he would not exchange for a thousand worlds which might expose his friend to so many hardships. When the Duke of Monmouth by message offered to surrender himself, if Russell thought that this measure would anyhow contribute to his safety; "It will be no advantage to me," he said, "to have my friends die with me." Some of his expressions discover, not only composure, but good humour in this melancholy extremity. The day before his execution, he sent his father a letter, in which he asked leave to see his father. After his execution, the sheriffs conducted him to the scaffold, he wound up his watch. "Now I am to be done with time, and henceforth must think solely of eternity." and that, he seemed to regard all their confidence, now exposed to the utmost rigours of the law. As he was the most popular among his own party; so was he ever the least obnoxious to the opposite faction: and his melan-colical and melancholy sentiments on the state of humanity, in a tender compassion for him. Without the least change of countenance, he laid his head on the block; and at two strokes it was severed from his shoulders.

In the speech which he delivered to the sheriffs, he was very anxious to clear his memory from any imputation of ever intending the king's death, or any alteration in the government: he could not explicitly confess the projected insurrection without hurting his friends, who must still be called in question for it; but he did not purge himself of that design, which, in the present condition of the nation, he regarded as no crime. By many passages in his speech he seems to the last to have lain under the influence of party zeal; a passion which, being nourished by a social temper, and clothing itself under the appearance of principle, it is almost impossible for a virtuous man, who has acted in it, to disavow after some years. He had professed his entire belief in the popish plot; and he said, that, though he had often heard the sentence of the guards mentioned, he had ever disapproved of that attempt. To which Mr. Aldwell added, that the murdering of so many innocent men in cool blood was so like murder, that he could not but abhor it. Upon the whole, the integrity and virtuous intentions, rather than the capacity, of this unfortunate nobleman, seem to have been the shining parts of his character.

Trial of Alger~o Sidney. This gallant son, of the Earl of Leicester, had entered deeply into the war against the late house of Stuart, and the government, but as much as any, his enthusiasm, for which he had so far shared in all the councils of the independent republicans, as to have been named on the high court of justice, which tried and condemned that monarch; he thought not to have engaged his opinions among the judges. He ever opposed Cromwell's usurpation with zeal and courage; and after making all efforts against the restoration, he resolved to take no benefit of the general indemnity, but chose voluntary banishment, rather than submit to the laws and family which he abhorred as a source of his calamity. As long as the republican party had any existence, he was active in every scheme, however unpromising, which tended to promote their cause: but at length, in 1677, finding all the hopes he had entertained were extinguished, and his retreat to France and Holland, he applied for the king's pardon, and had obtained it. When the factions arising from the popish plot began to run high, Sidney, full of those ideas of liberty, which he had imbibed from the great examples of antiquity, joined the popular party; and was even willing to seek a second time, through all the horrors of civil war, for his adored republic.

From this imperfect sketch of the character and conduct of this singular personage, it may easily be conceived how obnoxious he was become to the court and ministry: what alone renders them blamable, was the illegal method which they took for effecting their purpose against him. On Sidney's trial, none but a mere sacrifice of justice, it was evident, of witnesses, who proved the reality of a plot in general; and when the prisoner exclaimed, that all these evidences said nothing of him, he was answered, that this method of proceeding, however irregular, had been practised in the prosecutions of the popish conspirators; a topic more fit to condemn one party, than to justify the other. The only witness who deposed against Sidney was Lord Howard; but the law required two witnesses, a strange expedient was taken to supply this deficiency. In running the prisoner's closet, some discourses on government were found; in which he had maintained principles favourite indeed to liberty, but such as the best and most dutiful subjects, who knew least of known treason; the original contract, the source of power from a consent of the people, the lawfulness of resisting tyrants, the preference of liberty to the government of a single person. These papers were asserted to be equivalent to a second witness, and even to many witnesses. The prisoner replied, that there was no other reason, for ascribing these papers to him, than the knowledge which he had, and the confidence, with which he was never admitted in criminal prosecutions: that allowing him to be the author, he had composed them solely for his private amusement, and had never published them to the world; and communicated them to many single persons; that, when examined, they appeared, by the colour of the ink, to have been written many years before, and were in vain produced as evidence of a present conspiracy against the government; and it positively requires two witnesses, one witness, attended with the most convincing circumstances, could never suffice; much less, when supported by a circumstance so weak and precarious. All these arguments, though urged by the prisoner with great courage and pregnancy of reason, had no influence. The violent and inhuman Jeffreys was now chief justice; and by his direction a partial jury was easily prevailed on to give verdict against Sidney. His execution followed a few days after: Dec. 17, he was executed, and with reason, of the iniquity of the sentence; but he had too much greatness of mind to deny those conspiracies with Monmouth and Russel, in which he had engaged himself, and to which, that he now suffered for that good old cause, in which, from his earliest youth, he said, he had enlisted himself.

The execution of Sidney is regarded as one of the greatest blemishes of the present reign. The evidence against him, it must be confessed, was not conclusive; though Russel and other who condemned him, were, for that reason, very blamable. But that after sentence passed by a court of judicature, the king should interpose and pardon a man, who, though otherwise possessed of merit, was undoubtedly guilty, who had ever been a most inflexible and most inverte enemy to the royal family, and who lately had even abused the king's elements, might be an act of heroic mercy, and should never be regarded as a necessary and indispensable duty.

Howard was also the sole evidence against Hambden; and his testimony was not supported by any material circumstance. The crown would therefore found it in vain to try the prisoner for treason; they had the indecency only for a misdemeanor, and obtained sentence against him. The fine imposed was exorbitant; no less than forty thousand pounds.

Holloway, a government of Bristol, one of the conspirators, had fled to the West Indies, and was now brought over. He had been nathless, but the year allowed him for surrendering himself was not expired. A trial was therefore had at first, but as he was not engaged in a conspiracy for an insurrection, and even allowed that he had heard some discourse of an assassination, though he had not approved of it, he thought it more expedient to throw himself on the king's mercy. He was executed, persisting in the same confession.

Sir Thomas Armstrong, who had been seized in Holland, and sent over by Chidley, the king's minister, was precisely in the same situation with Holloway; but the same favour, or rather justice, was refused him. The lawyers pretended, that, unless he had voluntarily surrendered himself before the expiration of the time assigned, he could not claim the privilege of a trial; not considering that the sending the prisoner to a country in equity to be supposed the accident which prevented him. The king bore a great enmity against this gentleman, by whom he believed the Duke of Monmouth to have been seduced from his duty: he also asserted that he had at first been very well to assassinate him; though it must be confessed, that the prisoner justified himself from this imputation by very strong arguments. These were the reasons of that injustice which was now done him. It was apprehended that suffer out evidence of his guilt could not be produced; and that even the partial juries, which were now returned, and which allowed themselves to be entirely directed by Jeffreys and other violent judges, would not give sentence even in all cases of which he confessed himself to be guilty.
with his throat cut. The coroner's inquest brought in their verdict, self-murder; yet because two children ten years old (one of whom too departed from his evidence) had affirmed that they heard a great noise from his window, and that they saw a hand that looked like a bloody spectre that the circumstances were laid hold of, and the murder was ascribed to the king and the duke, who happened that morning to pay a visit to the Tower. Essex was subject to fits of deep melancholy, and had been seen with one whom his adversary in parliament Mr. William Langton, who was committed to maintain the lawfulness of suicide; and his countenance, upon a strict inquiry, which was committed to the care of Dr. Burnet, found no reason to confirm the suspicion; yet could not all die at once. With these suspecting expressions, joined to the terror and uneasiness which produced them, it was decided to remove the imputation. It is no wonder, that faction so productive of vices of all kinds: for, besides that it inflames all the passions, it tends much to remove those great restraints, honour and shame; when men find, that no iniquity can lose them the applause of their own party, and no innocence secure them against the calumnies of the opposite.

But though there is no reason to think that Essex had been murdered by any orders from court, it must be acknowledged that an unjustifiable use in Russell's trial was made of that incident. The king's counsel mentioned it in their pleadings as a strong proof of the conspiracy; and it is said to have had great weight with the jury. It was in some degree a trial for the latter purpose.

Some memorable causes, tried about this time, though they have no relation to the house of parliament, show the temper of the bench and of the bar; which, though they were often called to a duty by a judge a popeish traitor; was condemned in damages to the amount of one hundred thousand pounds; and was adjudged to remain in prison till he should make payment.

A like sentence was passed upon Dutton Colt for a like offence. Sir Samuel Barnardiston was fined ten thousand pounds; because in some private letters, which had been intercepted, he had reflected on the government. This gentleman was obstinate, because he had been forewarned of that jury which rejected the bill against Shelburne. A pretence was therefore fallen upon for punishing him; though such a precedent may justly be deemed a very unusual act of severity, and sufficient to destroy all confidence in private friendship and correspondence.

There is another remarkable trial, which shows the position of the courts of judicature, and which, though it passed in the ensuing year, it may not be improper to relate in this place. One Rowse, a presbyterian preacher, was accused by three women of having spoken treasonable words in a sermon. They swore to two or three persons, and agreed so exactly together, that there was not the slightest difference in their deposition. The other hand, made a very good defence. He proved that the witnesses were lewd and infamous persons. He proved that, even during Cromwell's usurpations, he had always been a royalist; that he praved constantly for the king and his family; and that in his sermons he often insinuated the obligations of loyalty. And as to the sermon of which he was accused, several witnesses, who heard it, and some who wrote it in short-hand, deposed that he had used no such expressions as those which were imputed to him. He offered his own notes as a further proof. The women could not show, by any circumstance or witness, that they were at his meeting. And the expressions, to which they depose, that they were surmised, was supposed to employ them before a mixed audience. It was also urged, that it appeared next to impossible for three women to remember so long a period upon one single hearing, and to remember it so exactly, as to agree to a title in their depositions with regard to it. The prisoner offered to put the whole upon this issue: he would pronounce, with his usual tone of voice, a period as long as that to which they had sworn; and then let them try to repeat it. What was more unexpected, when they had forgotten even the text of his sermon; nor did they remember any single passage, but the words to which they gave evidence. After so strong a defence, the solicitors for the crown, who, not properly to resist it, left it to Jeffries went no further than some general declamations against conventicles and presbyterians; yet such violent were and animosity against France, seconded every where where the applications of the Spaniards. In the year 1681, he made a journey to England, in order to engage the king into closer measures with this party, and with the confidence also promised to the States to make an augmentation of their forces; but several of the provinces, and even the town of Amsterdam, had been gained by the French, and the proposal was rejected. By his enemies derived the most plausible reasons of their victory from the situation of Lewis's power, and the known and avowed attachments of the English monarch.

No sooner had Charles dissolved his parliament, and embraced the resolution of governing by forces employed than he dropped his new alliance with Spain, and returned to his former dangerous connections with Lewis. This prince had even offered to make him arbiter of his differences with Spain; and the latter power, sensible of Charles's partiality, had refused to submit to such an disadvantageous proposal. Whether any money was now remitted to England, we do not certainly know: but we may fairly presume, that the king's necessities were in some degree relieved by France. And though Charles had reason to apprehend the utmost danger from the great and still increasing naval power of that kingdom, joined to the weak condition of the English fleet, no consideration was able to do him justice in that respect on the part of the French.

It is here we are to fix the point of the highest exaltation, which the power of Lewis, or that of any European prince since the age of Charles-magne, had ever attained. The monarch, most capable of opposing his progress, was entirely engaged in his interests; and the Turks, invited by the malcontents of Hungary, were preparing to invade the emperor, and to disable that prince from making head against the progress of the French power. Lewis may even be accused of oversight, in not making sufficient advantage of such favourable opportunities, which he was never afterwards able to recall. But that monarch, though governed by motives of ambition, that by those of justice or moderation was still most accurately calculated, and his inquiries of vanity. He contented himself with insulting and domineering over all the princes and free states of Europe; and he thereby provoked their resentment without subduing their power. While every one, who approached his person, and believed with submission to his authority, was treated with the highest politeness; all the neighbouring potentates had successively felt the effects of his haughty imperious disposition. And by indulging his poets, orators, and courtiers, in their flatteries, and in their propagations of universal empire, he conveyed faster, than by the prospect of his power alone, the apprehension of general conquerors.

The French greatness never, during his whole reign, inspired Charles with any apprehensions; and Clifford, it is said, one of his most trusted ministers, went so far as to affirm, that it were better for the king to be contented under a great and generous monarch, than a slave to five hundred of his own insolent subjects. The ambition, therefore, and uncontrolled power of Lewis were no diminution of Charles's happiness; and in other respects his condition seemed at present more eligible than it had ever been since his restoration. A mighty faction, which had shaken his throne, and menaced his family, was totally subdued; and by their precipitate and ruinous incursions had exposed themselves both to the regard of the laws and to public hatred. He had recovered his former popularity in the nation; and what probably pleased him more than having a compliant parliament, he was enabled to govern according to his choice, and in such a manner as to make the king, amidst all these promising circumstances, was not happy or satisfied. Whether he found himself exposed to difficulties for want of money, or dredged a recoil of the popular humour from the present arbitrary measures, is uncertain. Perhaps the violent imprudent temerity of the duke, by pushing Charles upon dangerous extremities, gave him a turn to suspicion and unpopularity. He was overheard one day to say, in opposing some of the duke's hasty counsels, "Brother, I am too old to go again to my travels; you may, if you choose it." What was once the cause of the great distress, it seems probable, that he was meditating some change of measures, and had formed a new plan of administration. He was determined, it is thought, to send the duke to Scotland, to recall Monk, to summon parliament to meet, and to transfigure it into a popular militia, and to throw himself entirely on the good-will and affections of his subjects.

King's sickness. Amidst these truly wise and virtuous designs, he was seized with a sudden fit, which resembled an apoplexy; and though he was rescued from it by bleeding, he languished only for a few days, and expired, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fifth of his reign. He was so happy in a good constitution of body, and had been so remarkably careful of his health, that his death struck as a great surprise into his subjects, as if he had been in the flower of his youth. And their great concern for him, owing to the affecting view in which he was dead of his successor, very naturally, when joined to the critical time of his death, begat the suspicion of poison. All circumstances however considered, this suspicion must be allowed to vanish, like many others, of which all histroires are full.

During the few days of the king's illness, elegymen of the church of England attended him; but he discovered a total indifference towards their devotions and exhortations. Catholic priests were brought, and he received the sacrament from them, accompanied with the other rites of the Romish church. Two papers were found in his cabinet, written with his own hand, and containing arguments in favour of an union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland. He had the imprudence immediately to publish these papers, and thereby both confirmed all the reproaches of those who had been the greatest enemies to his brother's measures, and afforded to the world a specimen of his character.

If we survey the character of Charles II. and his reign, in the different lights which it will admit of, it will appear various, and give rise to different and even opposite sentiments. When considered as a companion, he appears the most amiable and engaging companion; and indeed, in this view, his deportment must be allowed altogether unexceptionable. His love of mirth was so tempered with good breeding, that it was never offensive; his temper and disposition were so charitable, that his friends never dreaded their becoming the object of it; his wit, to use the expression of one who knew him well, and who was himself a good judge, could not be said so much to be very refined or elevated, qualities apt to beget jealousy and apprehension in company, as to be a plain, gawking, well-bred, recommending kind of wit. And though perhaps he talked more than strict rules of behaviour might permit, men were so pleased with the affable, communicative deportment of the monarch, that they always went away contented both with him and with themselves.

This indeed is the most shining part of the king's character; and he seems to have been sensible of it; for he was fond of so much to be very refined or elevated, qualities apt to beget jealousy and apprehension in company, as to be a plain, gawking, well-bred, recommending kind of wit. And though perhaps he talked more than strict rules of behaviour might permit, men were so pleased with the affable, communicative deportment of the monarch, that they always went away contented both with him and with themselves.

In the duties of private life, his conduct, though not free from exception, was, in the main, laudable. He was an easy, generous, well-humoured man; a civil, obliging husband; a friendly brother, an indulgent father, and a good-natured master.

The voluntary friendships, however, which this prince contracted, nay, even his sense of gratitude, were feeble; and he never attached himself to any of his ministers or officers with a sincere affection. He believed them to have no motive in serving him but self-interest; and he was still ready, in his turn, to sacrifice them to present ease or convenience.

With a detail of his private character we must set bounds to our narrative. The other parts of his life...

JAMES II.

The first act of James's reign was to assemble the privy council; where, after some transactions, a speech bestowed on the memory of his predecessor, he made professions of his resolution to maintain the established government, both in church and state. Though he had been reported, he said, to have imbibed arbitrary principles, he knew that the laws of England were sufficient to make him as great a monarch as he could wish; and he was determined never to depart from them. As he had heretofore ventured his life in defence of the nation, he would still so far as any man in maintaining all its just rights and liberties.

This discourse was received with great applause, not only by the council, but by the nation. The king universally passed for a man of great sincerity and great honour; and as the current of favour ran at that time for the court, men believed his professions, and were conformable to his expressions. "We have now," it was said, "the word of a king; and a word never yet broken." Addresses came from all quarters, full of duty, ray, of the most servile adulation. Every one desired to pay court to the new monarch; and James had reason to think, that, notwithstanding the violent efforts made by so potent a party for his exclusion, no throne in Europe was better established than that of England.

The king, however, in the first exercise of his authority, showed, that either he was not sincere in his professions of attachment to the laws, or that he had entertained so lofty an idea of his own legal power, that even his utmost sincerity would tend very little to secure the liberties of the people. All the customs and the greater part of the excise had been settled by parliament on the late king during life, and consequently the grant was now expired; nor had the successor any right to levy these branches of revenue. But James issued a proclamation, ordering the customs and excise to be paid as before; and this exertion of power he would not design to qualify by the least act or even resolution. It was proposed to him, that, in order to prevent the ill effects of any intermission in levying these duties, entries should be made, and bonds for the sums be taken from the merchants and lawyers; but the king answered that the government should give authority to receive it. This precept was recommended as an expression of deference to that assembly, or rather to the laws; but for that very reason, probably, it was rejected by the king, who thought, that the Commons would thence be induced to assume more authority, and would regard the whole revenue, and consequently the whole power of the crown, as dependent on their will and pleasure.

They would correspond openly, and with all the ensigns of his dignity, to mass, an illegal meeting; and by this impiety he displayed at once his arbitrary disposition, and the bigotry of his principles; those two great characteristics of his reign, and base of his administration. He even sent Curyl as his agent to Rome, in order to make submission to the Pope, and to pave the way for a solemn traduction of England into the bosom of the catholic church; the Pope promised the XIXth that the present king not to be too precipitate in his measures, nor rashly attempt what repeated experience might convince him was impracticable. The Spanish ambassador, Ronquillo, deeming the tranquillity of England necessary for the support of Spain, used the freedom to make like remonstrances. He observed to the king, how busy the priests appeared at court, and advised him not to assent with too great facility to their demands. "Is it not the custom in Spain," said James, "for the king to consult with his confessor?" "Yes," replied the ambassador, "and it is for that very reason our affairs succeed so ill."

James gave hopes on his succession, that he would hold the balance of power to their due advantage, and that France, instead of rending England subservient to her ambitious projects, would now meet with strong opposition from that kingdom. Besides applying himself to business with great industry, he assumed great authority, and expressed great care, that no more respect should be paid to the French ambassador at London than his own received at Paris. But these appearances were not sufficiently supported, and he found himself immediately under the necessity of falling into a union with that great monarch, who, by his power as well as his zeal, seemed alone able to assist him in the projects formed for promoting the catholic religion in England.

Notwithstanding the king's prejudices, all the chief offices of the crown continued still in the hands of protestants. Rochester was treasurer; his brother Clarendon, chancellor of England; Godolphin, secretary of state; and Sedley, the duke of York, secretary of state; and Halifax, president of the council. This nobleman had stood in opposition to James during the last years of his brother's reign; and when he attempted, on the accession, to make some apology for his late and extreme conduct, that he might be allowed to do some thing past, except his behaviour during the bill of excommunication. On other occasions, however, James appeared not of so forgiving a temper. When the principal exclusionists were about to form a new ministry, and one of the principal persons was not admitted, or were received very coldly, sometimes even with frowns. This conduct might suit the character, which the king so much affected, of sincerity; but by showing that a king who had restored the garrisons of a Duke of York, he gave his people no high idea either of his lenity or magnanimity.

On all occasions, the king was open in declaring that he must now look for a more firm and more upright government, and that he would retain no ministers, who did not practise an unreserved obedience to his commands. We are not indeed to look for the springs of his administration so much in his council and chief officers of state, as in his own temper, and in the character of those persons with whom he secretly consulted. The queen had great influence over him; a woman of spirit, whose conduct had been popular till she arrived at that high dignity. She was much consulted by the priests, especially the Jesuits; and as these were also the king's favourites, all public measures were taken originally from the suggestions of these men, and more evident marks of their influence in government, and the inactivity of the parliament.

The king, however, had another attachment, seemingly not very consistent with this devoted regard to his queen and to his priests; it was to Mrs. Sedley, whom he soon after created Countess of Dorchester, and who expected to govern him with the same authority which the Duchess of Portsmouth had possessed during the former reign. But James, who had entertained the ambition of converting his people, was told, that the regularity of his life ought to correspond to the sanctity of his intentions; and he was prevailed with to remove Mrs. Sedley from court: a resolution in which he had not the courage to persevere. Good agreement between the mistress and the confessor of princes is not commonly a difficult matter to compass; but in the present case these two potent engines of command were found very incompatible. Mrs. Sedley, who possessed all the wit and magnificence of her father, Sir Charles, made the greatest efforts to wrest the power of the chief minister from her husband; and it is not to be doubted, but they, on their part, rebad them their exhortations with their pen to break off so criminal an attachment.

How little inclination sooner the king, as well as his queen and priests, might bear to an English parliament, it was absolutely necessary, at the beginning of the reign, to summon that assembly. The low condition, to which the wealth of the kingdom had fallen in the last years of Charles's reign, the odium under which they laboured on account of the Rye-house conspiracy; these causes made that party meet with little success in the elections. The general representation of the electors had made the courts of justice extremely dependent; and the recommendations of the court, though little assisted, at that time, by pecuunary influence, were become very prevalent. The new parliament, the House of Commons, therefore, consisted entirely of zealous persons and churchmen; and were of consequence strongly biased by their affections, in favour of the measures of the crown.

The discourse which the king made to the newly elected parliament was more fitted to work on their fears than their affections. He repeated indeed, and with great solemnity, the promise which he had made before the privy-council, of governing according to the laws, and preserving the established religion. But at the same time he told them, that he positively expected they would settle his revenue, and during life too, as in the time of his brother. "I might use many arguments," said he, "to enforce this demand; the benefit of trade, the support of the army, the necessities of the crown, and the interest of the government itself, which I must not suffer to be precarious; but I am confident, that your own consideration, and your sense of what is just and reasonable, will supply these arguments on this occasion. There is indeed one popular argument," added he, "which may be urged, against compliance with my demand: men may think, that by feeding me from time to time with such supplies as they think convenient, they will better secure frequent meetings of parliament: but as this is the first time I speak to you from the throne, I must plainly tell you, that such an expedient would be very improper to employ with me, and that the best way to engage the confidence of the people, is, wholly to shun them. It was easy to interpret this language of the king. He plainly intimated, that he had resources in his prerogative for supporting the government, independent of their supplies; and that so long as they complied with his demands, he would have recourse to them; but that any ill usage on their part would set him free from those measures of government, which he seemed to regard more as voluntary than as necessary. It must be confessed, that no parliament in England was ever placed in a more critical situation, nor where more forcible arguments could be urged, either for their opposition to the court, or their compliance with it.

Revenue for the next year was to be settled; but the usual discussion of the subject was struck short by the king. The arguments which had been used on either side, were therefore not to be repeated. The bill for settling the revenue was to be brought in the House of Commons, and was to be the subject of a most solemn conference between the two houses. The king's speech was to be read, and he would then make such observations as he should think proper; and the whole would settle on his present majesty, during life, all the revenue enjoyed by the late king, at the time of his demise. That they might not detract from this generosity by any symptoms of distrust, they also voted unanimously, that the House entirely relied on his majesty's royal word and repeated declarations to support the religion of the church of England; but they added, that that religion was to be maintained by the sovereign, whether present, or absent; and that for the present, but not for the future, the presentation of the revenue bill, took care to inform the king of the vote of the house with regard to religion; but could not, by so signal a proof of confidence, extort from him one word in favour of the present religion, on an occasion not so high a value. Notwithstanding the grounds of suspicion which this silence afforded, the House continued in the same liberal disposition. The king having de-upon that complicated fabric. That recent experience during the reign of the late king, a prince who wanted neither prudence nor moderation, had sufficiently proved the solidity of the constitution, and the ample basis upon which he had laid it. It was necessary for the monarch to return to the principles of the constitution, and to persevere in the laws, and required frequent meetings of parliament, in order to repair all the breaches, which either time or violence may have made.

manded a further supply for the navy and other purposes, they revived those duties on wines and vinegar, which had once been enjoyed by the late king; and they added some impositions on tobacco and sugar. This grant amounted to the whole to about six hundred thousand pounds a year.

The House of Lords were in a humour no less complacent. They even went some lengths towards breaking in and breaking the heads of the dissident party; that once formidable engine of bigotry and faction.

Oates convicted of perjury. A little before the meeting of parliament, Oates had been tried for perjury on two indictments. One for deposing that he was present as a consultant of Jesuits in London, the twenty-fourth of April, 1679: another for deposing that Father Ireland was in London between the sixteenth and twelfth of August, and in the beginning of September in the same year. Never criminal was convicted on fuller and more unblinched evidence. Two-and-twenty persons, who had been students at St. Omers, most of them of men of credit and family, gave evidence, that Oates had entered into that circular about Christmas in the year 1678, and had never been absent but one night till the month of July following. Forty-seven witnesses, persons also of untainted character, deposed, that Father Ireland, on the third of August, 1679, passed for the most likely depository of the votes and resolution of the Commons; to be employed in setting up in a thousand marks on each indictment, to be whipped on two different days from Aldegate to Newgate, and from Newgate to Tyburn, to be imprisoned during life, and to be pillori'd five times a year. The impudence of the man supported itself under an ordinance to oppose to the sentence of the court under the punishment. He made solemn appeals to Heaven, and protestations of the veracity of his testimony: though the whipping was so cruel that it was evident the cain was not to be put to him to deter him from that punishment, he was enabled, by the care of his friends, to recover; and he lived to King William's reign, when a pension of four hundred pounds a-year was settled on him. A considerable sum still adhered to him in his distresses, and regarded him as the martyr of the protestant cause. The populace were affected with the sight of a punishment, more severe than is commonly inflicted in England. And the sentence of perpetual imprisonment was deemed illegal.

The conviction of Oates's perjury was taken notice of by the House of Peers. Besides freeing the popish Lords, Plunket, Arundel, Bellarmi, and Tyrone, together with Danby, and all the other Commons which they went as far as to vote a removal of Stafford's attendant, on account of the falsehood of that evidence on which he had been condemned. This bill fixed so deep a reproach on the former proceedings of the exclusionists, that it met with great opposition among the Lords; and it was at last, after one reading, dropped by the Commons. Though the repARATION of injustice be the second honour which a nation can attain; the present emergence seemed very improper for granting so full a justification to the catholics, and throwing so foul a stain on the protestants.

The course of parliamentary proceedings was interrupted by the news of Monmouth's movement in the west with three ships from Holland. No sooner was this intelligence conveyed to the parliament, than they voted that they would adhere to his majesty with all their lives and fortunes. They passed a bill of attaint against Monmouth; and they granted a supply of four hundred thousand pounds for suppressing his rebellion. Having thus strengthened the hands of the king, they would then decide on him by the Prince of Orange. After the accession of James, the prince thought it necessary to dismiss Monmouth and all his followers; and that illustrious fugitive retired to Brussels. Finding himself still pursued by the king's severity, he was pushed, contrary to his judgment as well as inclination, to make a rash and premature attack upon England. He saw that James had lately mounted the throne, not only without opposition, but seemingly with the good will and affections of his subjects. A parliament was sitting, which discovered the greatest disposition to comply with the king, and whose engagement gave a soundness and reality to all public measures. The gneves of this reign were hitherto of small importance; and the people were not as yet in a disposition to remark them with great severity.

But all these considerations were little, if any, such was the impatience of his followers, and such the precipitate humour of Argyle, who set out for Scotland a little before him, that no reasons could be attended to; and this unhappy man was driven upon his fate.

The imprudence, however, of this enterprise did not at first appear. Though, on his landing at Lyme, in Dorsetshire, he had scarcely a hundred followers, so popular was his name, that in four days he had assembled above two thousand horse and foot. They were, indeed, almost all of them, the lowest of the people; and the declaration which he published, was chiefly calculated to suit the prejudices of the vulgar, and to therapeutize their rage. Less was such was the softness of Monmouth's nature, that Gray was still continued in his command. Fletcher of Salton, a Scotchman, a man of signal probity and fine genius, had been engaged by this republican principles in this enterprise, and recommended the cavalry together with Gray; but being insulted by one who had newly joined the army, and whose horse he had in a hurry made use of, he was promised by Monmouth to have much such usage himself as he had on the spot. This accident obliged him immediately to leave the camp; and the loss of so gallant an officer was a great prejudice to Monmouth's enterprise.

The next station of the rebels was Taunton, a disaffected town, which gladly, and even fondly, received them, and reinforced them with considerable numbers. Twenty young maid's of some rank presented Monmouth with a pair of colours of their handiwork, together with a copy of the Bible. Monmouth was here persuaded to take upon him the title of king, and assert the legitimacy of his birth; a claim which he advanced in his first declaration, but whose discussion was delayed, and in some time to postpone. His numbers had now increased to six thousand; and he was obliged every day, for want of arms, to dismiss a great many who crowded to his standard. He entered Bridgewater, Wells, Frome; and was proclaimed in all these places; but forgetting that such desperate enterprises can only be rendered successful by the most adventurous courage, he allowed the expectations of the people to flag, without attempting any considerable undertaking.

While Monmouth, by his impudent and misplaced caution, was thus wasting time in the west, the king employed himself in making preparations against the coup. Seven regiments of British troops were called over from Holland; the army was considerably augmented; and regular forces, to the number of 3000 men, were despatched.

under the command of Feversham and Churchill, in order to check the progress of the rebels.

Monmouth, observing that no considerable men joined him, sent his forces towards Salisbury, which was projected as the city, had not taken place, and bearing that Argyle, his confederate, was already defeated and taken, sunk into such despondency, that he had once resolved to withdraw himself, and leave his unhappy friends to their fate. His followers expanded more courage than their leader, and seemed determined to adhere to him in every fortune.

The negligent disposition, made by Feversham, invited Monmouth to attack the king's forces near Sedgwater; but finding, when he met his men, in this action, showed that a natural courage and a principle of duty, even when unassisted by discipline, is able to perform. They threw the veteran forces into disorder; drove them from their ground; continued the flight till their ammunition failed them; and would at last have obtained a victory, had not the misconduct of Monmouth and the cowardice of Gray prevented it. After a combat of three hours the rebels gave way; and were followed with great slaughter. About 1500 fell in the battle and pursuit. And thus was concluded in a few weeks this enterprise, rashly undertaken, and feebly conducted.

Monmouth fled from the field of battle above twenty miles, when he was under both. He then changed clothes with a peasant in order to conceal himself. The peasant was discovered by the pursuers, who now redoubled the diligence of their search. At last, the unhappy Monmouth, finding his flight by the help of a ditch, and covered with firm: his body depressed with fatigue and hunger; his mind, by the memory of past misfortunes, by the prospect of future disasters. Human nature is unequal to such calamitous situations; much more, the tempest of a man, softened by early prosperity, and accustomed to value himself solely on military bravery. He burst into tears when seized by his enemies; and he seemed still to indulge the fond hope and desire of life. This great height, though from his own offences, and the severity of James's temper, that no mercy could be expected, he wrote him the most submissive letters, and conjured him to spare the issue of a brother, who had ever been so strongly attached to his interest.

James, finding such symptoms of depression and despondency in the unhappy prisoner, admitted him to his presence, in hopes of extracting a discovery of his accomplices: but Monmouth would not purchase life, however loved, at the price of so much infamy. Finding all efforts vain, he assumed courage from despair, and prepared himself for death, with a spirit better suited to his rank and character. This favourite of the people was attended by the king with a heart of tenderness.

He warned the executioner not to fall into the error which he had committed in beheading Russell, where it had been necessary to repeat the blow. This precaution served only to dismay the executioner. He struck a feeble blow on Monmouth, who raised his head from the block, and looked him in the face, as if reproaching him for his failure. He gently laid down his head a second time; and the executioner struck him again and again to no purpose. He then threw aside the axe, and cried out that he was incapable of finishing the bloody office. The sheriff oblig’d him to renew the attempt; and at two blows the head was severed from the body.

Thus perished, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, a nobleman, who, in less turbulent times, was well qualified to be an ornament of the court, even to be serviceable to his country. The favour of his prince, the careness of faction, and the allurements of popularity, seduced him into enterprises which exceeded his capacity. The goodwill of the people still followed him in every fortune. He was opened to their claims, flattered by them with hopes of seeing him once more at their head. They believed that the person executed was not Monmouth, but one who, having the fortune to resemble him nearly, was willing to give this proof of his extreme attachment, and to die in his stead.

This victory, obtained by the king in the commencement of his reign, would naturally, had it been managed with prudence, have tended much to increase his power and authority. But by reason of the cruelty with which it was prosecuted, and of the temerity with which it afterwards proceeded, it was a principal cause of his sudden ruin and downfall.

Such arbitrary principles had the court instilled into all its servants, that Feversham, immediately after the victory, bargained about the terms of peace, and was proceeding in his executions, when the Bishop of Bath and Wells and several prelates rushed upon him, that these unhappy men were now by law entitled to a trial, and that their execution would be deemed a real murder. This remonstrance, however, did not stop the savage nature of the King; he seized the Bishop of Bath, who had long served at Tangers, and had conspired against the government, from his intercourse with the Moors, and Kirke, an inhuman less known in European and free countries.

At his first entry into Bridgewater, he hanged nineteen prisoners, without the least inquiry into the merits of their cause. As if to make sport with death, he ordered a certain number to be executed, while he and his company should drink the king’s health, or the queen’s, by that of Chief-justice Jefferies. Observing their feet to quiver in the agonies of death, he cried, that he would give them music to their dancing, and he immediately commanded the drums to beat and the trumpets to sound. By way of precaution, he caused him, three times, to be questioned at each interval, whether he repented of his crime: but the man obstinately asserting, that, notwithstanding the past, he still would willingly engage in the King’s service, he was threatened with being hanged in chains. One story, commonly told of him, is memorable for the treachery, as well as barbarity, with which he attended it. A young maid pleaded for the life of her brother, and flung himself at Kirke’s feet, armed with all the charms which beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could bestow upon her. The tyrant was inflamed with desire, not softened into love or clemency. He promised to grant her request, provided that she, in her turn, would be equally exacting her brother’s, and, in a week’s time, call him to a place of confinement. She received this condition: but, after she had passed the night with him, the wanton savage the next morning showed her, from the window, her brother, the darling object for whom she had sacrificed her virtue, hanging on a gibbet, which he had secretly ordered to be there erected for the execution. Rage, and despair, and indignation, took possession of her mind, and deprived her for ever of her senses.

All the inhabitants of that country, innocent as well as guilty, were exposed to the ravages of this barbarian. The soldiers were let loose to live at free quarters; and his own regiment, instructed by his example, and encouraged by his exhortations, distinguished themselves in a particular manner by the commission of the most horrid acts of cruelty. The people were called his lambs; an appellation which was long remembered with horror in the west of England.

The violent Jefferies succeeded after some interval; and showed the people, that the rigours of law might equal, if not exceed, the ravages of military tyranny. This man, who was not accustomed to cruelty, had already given a specimen of his character in many trials where he presided; and he now set out with a savage joy, as to a full harvest of death and destruction. He began at Dorchester; and thirty rebels being arraigned, he exulted them, but in vain, to save him, by their free confession, the trouble of trying them: and when twenty-five were found guilty, he ordered them, as by additional punishment, of their disobedience, to be led to immediate execution.

Most of the other prisoners, terrified with this example, pleaded guilty; and no less than two hundred and ninety-two received sentence at Dorchesther. Of these, eighty were executed.

Exeter was the next stage of his cruelty: two hundred and forty-three were there tried, of whom a great number were condemned and executed. He also acted in the same manner at Totnes; and wherever a band was formed, every where incurred consternation along with him. The judges were so struck with his menaces, that they gave their verdict with precipitation; and many innocent persons, it is said, were executed with the guilty. Besides those who were butchered by the military commanders, two hundred and fifty-one are computed to have fallen by the hand of justice. The whole country was
The injustice of this sentence against Cornish was not desired to disgust the nation with the court: the continued rigour of the other executions had already impressed a universal hatred against the ministers of justice, attended with compassion for the unhappy wretch who had been seduced into this crime by mistaken principles, to bear their punishment with the spirit and zeal of martyrs. The people might have been willing on this occasion to distinguish between the king and his ministers: but care was taken to prevent this, by making it appear that what was to be done was agreeable to their master. Jeffries, on his return, was immediately, for those eminent services, created a peer; and was soon after vested with the dignity of chancellor. It is pretended, however, with some appearance of authority, that the king was displeased with these cruelties, and put a stop to them by orders, as soon as proper information of them was conveyed to him.

We must now take a view of the state of the state of affairs in Scotland; where the fate of Argyle had been decided before that of Monmouth. Immediately after the king's accession, a parliament had been summoned at Edinburgh; and all affairs were there conducted by the Duke of Queensberry the commissioner, and the Earl of Perth chancellor. The former had resolved to make an entire surrender of the liberties of his country; but was determined still to adhere to his religion: the latter entertained no scruple, and the court even encouraged both. But no courtier, even the most prostitute, could go further than the parliament itself towards a resignation of their liberties. In a vote which they called an offer of a duty, after adopting the fabulous history of a hundred and eleven Scottish monarchs, they acknowledged, that all these princes, by the primary and fundamental law of the state, had been vested with a solid and absolute authority. They declared their adherence of all principles and positions, derogatory to the king's sacred, supreme, sovereign, absolute power, of which none, they said, whether single persons, or collective bodies, can participate, but in dependence on him, and by commission from him. They promised that the whole nation, between sixteen and sixty, shall be in readiness for his majesty's service, where and as oft as it shall be his royal pleasure to require them. And they annexed the whole excuse, both of inland and foreign commodities, for ever to the crown.

All the other acts of this assembly savoured of the same spirit. They declared it treason for any person to refuse the test, if tendered by the council. To defend the obligation of the government, they extended tithes, and exempted no one from them. And in order to give effect to this, they proposed the law for the punishment of regicide, and of a plot to murder the king, with death as the penal punishment. To be present at any conventicle, was made punishable with death and confiscation of movables. Even such as refused to give testimony, either in cases of treason or nonconformity, were declared equally punishable as if guilty of the base treasons of which they were accused.

In goodhence, the sedition under-sheriff of London, who had been engaged in the most bloody and desperate part of the Rye-house conspiracy, was taken prisoner after the battle of Sedgemoor, and resolved to save his own life by an accusation of Cornish, the shift, whom he knew to be extremely obnoxious to the court. Colonel Romney joined him in the accusation; and the prosecution was so hastened, that the prisoner was tried, condemned, and executed; and the names of all the wretches appeared immediately after; and the king seemed to regret the execution of Cornish. He granted his estate to his family, and condemned the witnesses to perpetual imprisonment.
on all sides with insuperable difficulties. His arms and ammunition were seized; his provisions cut off; the Marquis of Athole pressed him on one side; Lord Charles defeated.

Murray on another; the Duke of Gordon advanced, and that assault was broken by Dunbar; then came in support to him by declarations for the covenant. No one showed either courage or inclination to join him; and his small and still decreasing army, after wandering about for a little while, was at last defeated and disquieted without an engagement.

The next opposition came from the House of Peers, which has not commonly taken the lead on these occasions; and even from the bench of bishops, where the court usually expects the greatest complaisance and submission. And Argyle having been exposed to manifest peril, conferred an additional revenue on the crown; and by rendering the king in some degree independent, contributed to increase those dangers with which they were threatened to all that the nation could do.

The next opposition came from the House of Commons, which had not been called to account for the losses they had sustained in the late expedition. A committee was appointed to consider the affairs of Scotland, and Argyle was ordered to appear before it. He had been advised by his minister to consent to the disbanding of the army, and to render his submission before the committee; but he declined, and answered that he would not appear before them.

It is probable that he had used his dispensing power without declaring it, no inquiries would have been made, and time might have reconciled the nation to this dangerous exercise of prerogative. But to invade at once their constitution, to threaten their religion, to establish a standing army, and even to require them, by their concurrence, to contribute towards all these measures, exceeded the bounds of their patience. He was therefore, the first, to display the last remnants of English spirit and generosity.

The Commons, many severe refractions were thrown out against the present measures, and the House was with seeming difficulty engaged to promulgate, in a general vote, that they would grant some supply. But instead of finishing that business, which could alone render them acceptable to the king, they proceeded to examine the dispensing power; and they voted an address to the king against it.

Before this address was presented, they resumed the consideration of the supply; and as one million two hundred thousand pounds were demanded by the court, and two hundred thousand by the House, a middle course was chosen; and seven hundred thousand, after some dispute, were at last voted. The address against the dispensing power was expressed in most respectful and submission terms; yet it was very ill received by the king, and his answer contained a flat denial, uttered with great warmth and vehemence. The Commons were so daunted with this reply, that they kept silence a long time; and when Coke, member for Derby, rose up and said, "I hope we are all Englishmen, and that we have a few hard words;" so little spirit appeared in that assembly, often so refractory and mutinous, that they sent him to the Tower for bluntly expressing a free and generous sentiment. Coke, thus imprisoned, had a day for consideration of his majesty's answer; and on their next meeting, they submissively proceeded to the consideration of the supply, and even went so far as to establish funds for paying the sum voted, in nine years and a half. The king, therefore, had in effect, almost without contest or violence, obtained a complete victory over the Commons; but he had incurred the hatred of a people who had been exposed to manifest peril, conferred an additional revenue on the crown; and by rendering the king in some degree independent, contributed to increase those dangers with which they were threatened to all that the nation could do.

The king might reasonably have presumed, that even if the Peers should so far resume courage as to make an application for dispensing with the dispensing power, the same steady answer which he had given to the Commons would make them relapse into the same timidity; and he might by that means have obtained a considerable supply, without making any concession in return. But so increased was his temper, so lofty the idea which he had entertained of his own authority, and so violent the schemes suggested by his own bigotry and that of his priests, that, without any delay, without waiting for any further provocation, he immediately proceeded to a prerogative. He continued the parliament during a year and a half by four more procrastinations; but having in vain tried, by separate applications, to break the obstinacy of the leading members, he at last dissolved that assembly. And as it was plainly impossible for him to find among his protestant subjects a set of men more devoted to royal authority, it was universally concluded, that he intended thenceforth to govern entirely without their concurrence.

Never king mounted the throne of England with greater advantages than James; nor possessed greater facility, if that were any advantage, of rendering himself and his posterity absolute; but all these fortunate circumstances tended only to aggravate his own misconduct and ruin upon him. The nation seemed disposed of themselves to resign their liberties, had he not, at the same time, made an attempt upon their religion; and he might even have succeeded in surmounting at once their liberties and religion, had he conducted his schemes with common prudence and discretion. Openly to declare to the parliament, so early in his reign, his intention to dispense with the tests, struck a universal alarm throughout the nation; infused terror into the church, which had hitherto been the chief support of monarchy; and even disgusted the army, by whose means alone he could now purpose to govern. The former horror against popery was augmented by polemical books and sermons; and in every dispute the victory seemed to be gained by the protestant divines, who were hest with more favourable ears, and who managed the controversy with more learning and eloquence. But another incident happened at this time, which mightily to exute the animosity of the nation against the catholic communion.

Leon X. having long harassed and molested the protestants, at last the states of the League had been enacting by Pope Leo's encouragement; and in some of them the popes had been declared irreconcilable; and which, during the course of near a century, had continued, without being disjoined, the Catholic and protestant. All the iniquities inseparable from persecution were exercised against those unhappy religiousists; who became obstinate in proportion to the oppressions which they suffered, and either covered under a forged conversion a more violent abhorrence of the catholic communion, or sought among foreign nations for that liberty of which they were bereaved in their native country. Above half a million of the most respectable of the nation Augustan, and exported, together with immense sums of money, those arts and manufactures which had chiefly tended to enrich that kingdom. They propagated every which was engraven against them, and revived among the protestants all that resentment against the bloody and persecuting spirit of popery, to which so many incidents in all ages had given too much occasion; as thus law, at least, imposes punishment over into England; and all men were disposed, from their representatives, to entertain the utmost horror against the projects which they apprehended to be formed by the king for the abolition of the protestant religion. When a prince of so much humanity, and of such signal prudence, as Lewis, could be engaged, by the bigotry of his religion alone, without any provocation, to embrace such singularity and impious measure, that might not be resisted, they united, from James, who was so much inferior in those virtues, and who had already been irritated by such obstinate and violent opposition! In vain did the king affect to throw the highest blame on the persecutions in France: in vain did he say that the practice of controlling and assembling the distressed hugonots. All these symptoms of toleration were regarded as insidious; opposite to the avowed principles of his sect, and belied by the severest admonitions of his father, who had exercised against the nonconformists in Scotland.

A. D. 1606. The smallest approach towards the introduction of popery, must, in the present disposition of the commons, be attended with such jealousy; much more so wide a step as that of dispensing with the tests, the sole security which the nation, being disappointed of the exclusion bill, found provided against those dreadful unities. The test was to be observed in pursuance; and having failed in bringing over the parliament, he made an attempt, with more success, for establishing his dispensing power, by a verdict of the judges. Sir Edward Hales, a new proselyte, had accepted a commission of colonel; and directions were given his coachman to prosecute him for the penalty of five hundred pounds, which the law, establishing the tests, had granted to informers. By this legal action, the king, with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, resolved to proceed according to the opinion of the judges. The crime and exercise of the dispensing power is allowed to be very ancient in England; and though it seems at first to have been copied from royal usurpations, it may plainly be traced up as high as the reign of Henry III. In the feudal governments, men were more anxious to secure their private property than to share in the public administration; and provided no innovations were attempted on their rights and possessions, the law of the land. If they were disaffected to the sovereign, penal statutes were commonly intended to arm the prince with more authority for that purpose; and being in the main calculated for promoting his influence at occasions when there seemed no danger in allowing him to dispense with their execution, in such particular cases as might require an exception or indulgence. That practice had been long recorded of the monarchs of these times, and the power of dispensing with the statutes of provence. But though the general tenor of the penal statutes was such as gave the king a superior power in their execution beyond any of his subjects; it could not but sometimes happen, in a mixed government, that the king would be disposed to enact laws, by which the regal power, in some particulars, even where private property was not immediately concerned, might be regulated and restrained. In the twenty-third of Henry VI, a law of this kind was enacted; prohibiting the execution of the said law, in a county, by the sheriff of that county; and a clause was inserted, by which the king was disabled from granting a dispensation. Plain reason might have taught, that such a law, being executed by the king himself, was rendered useless and nugatory, and deprived the king of his prerogative: but as the dispensing power still prevailed in other cases, it was soon ahd, aided by the servility of the courts of judicature, to even to overpower the statute, which the legislature had evidently intended to secure against violation. In the reign of Henry VII the case was brought to a trial before all the judges in the exchequer-chamber; and it was decreed, that notwithstanding the strict clause above mentioned, the king might dispense with the statute: he could first, it was alleged, dispense with the prohibitory clause, and then with the statute itself. This opinion of the judges, though seemingly absurd, had ever since passed for undoubted law: the king thus dispensing with the law, the property of most of the property in England had been fixed by decsions, which juryrs, returned by such sheriffs, had given in the courts of judicature. Many other dispensations of a similar kind have been produced; nor can it be shown that the dispensing power in the king's prerogative of the crown was ever unanimously affirmed; and it became established principle in English jurisprudence, that though the king could not allow of what was morally unlawful, he could permit what was only prohibited by positive statute. Even the jealous House of Commons, which extorted the petition of right from Charles I, made no scruple, by the mouth of Glenville, their manager, to allow of the dispensing power in its full extent; and in the famous trial of sheep-money, when the popular lawyer, had freely, and in the most explicit terms, made the same concession. Sir Edward Coke, the great oracle of English law, had not only concurred with the House of Commons, but had been the first to insist upon the dispensing power being exercised for the benefit of the crown. And there is nothing more hazardous in the consequences of granting dispensations in that case be ever allowed to be pleaded before a court of judicature. Every prerogative of the crown, it may be said, admits of abuse; should the king pardon all criminals, law must be totally disregarded; should it be exercised for the benefit of the crown, and not the benefit of the monarchs, it would imply that the powers were intrusted to the sovereign, and we must be content, as our ancestors were, to depend upon his prudence and discretion for the preservation of the public safety. Though this reasoning seems founded on such principles as are usually admitted by lawyers, the people had entertained such violent prepossession against the use of which James had been so much so afraid, that he was obliged, before he brought on Hales' case, to displace four of the judges, Jones, Montague, Charlton, and Nes...
vil; and even Sir Edward Herbert, the chief justice, though a man of acknowledged virtue, yet, because he here supported the pretensions of the crown, was exposed to the jeers and reproach. All the principles of this case were to be in effect the same with a repealing power; and they could not conceive that less authority was necessary to repeal than to enact any statute. If one penal law was done away, why any other must not, by the same force and by what principle could even the whole laws which define property be afterwards secured from violation? The test act had ever been conceived the great barrier of the established religion under a popular successor; as such, it had been repudiated by the nation, and granted by a king; as such, during the debates with regard to the exclusion, recommended by the chancellor. By what magic, what chicanery of law, is it now annihilated, and rendered of no validity? These questions were everywhere asked; and men, straitened by precedents and decisions of great authority, were reduced either to question the antiquity of this prerogative itself, or to assert that even the practice of near five centuries could not bestow on it sufficient authority. It was not considered, that the present difficulty or seeming absurdity had proceeded from late innovations introduced into the government. Even since the beginning of this century, the parliament had, with a laudable zeal, begun to publish and establish principles fairly derivable to law and liberty: the authority of the crown had been limited in many important particulars: and penal statutes were often calculated to secure the constitution against innovations; such as a general peace, and repress crimes and immoralities. A prerogative, however, derived from very ancient and almost uniform practice, the dispensing power, still tenanted, or was supposed to remain, with the crown; sufficient in an instant to overturn this whole fabric, and to throw down all fences of the constitution. If this prerogative, which curries on the face of it such strong symptoms of an absolute authority in the prince, had, in ancient times, sunk upon the subject, this fact only proves, that scarcely any human government, much less one erected in rude and barbarous times, is entirely consistent and uniform in all its parts. But to expect that the dispensing power could, in any degree, be rendered compatible with those accurate and regular limitations, which had of late been established, and which the people were determined to maintain, was a vain hope; and though men knew not upon what principles they could seized that, if they were to preserve their laws and constitution, there was an absolute necessity for denning, at least for abolishing it. The revolution alone, which soon succeeded, happily put an end to the notion that, in ancient times, such a power existed; for the monstrous insurrection, so visible between the ancient Gothic parts of the fabric and the recent plans of liberty, was fully corrected; and to the present day, the king and his people were finally taught to know their proper boundaries.

Whatever topics lawyers might find to defend James's dispensing power, the nation thought it dangerous, if not fatal to liberty; and his resolution of exercising it may on that account be esteemed no less alarming, than if the power had been founded on the most recent and most flagrant usurpation. It was not likely, that an authority, which had been assumed, through so many obstacles, would be long kept. The king, indeed, was a most unwise edifice was at last erected: the monstrous inconsistency, so visible between the ancient Gothic parts of the fabric and the recent plans of liberty, was fully corrected; and to the present day, the king and his people were finally taught to know their proper boundaries.1

Whatever topics lawyers might find to defend James's dispensing power, the nation thought it dangerous, if not fatal to liberty; and his resolution of exercising it may on that account be esteemed no less alarming, than if the power had been founded on the most recent and most flagrant usurpation. It was not likely, that an authority, which had been assumed, through so many obstacles, would be long kept. The king, indeed, was a most unwise edifice was at last erected: the monstrous inconsistency, so visible between the ancient Gothic parts of the fabric and the recent plans of liberty, was fully corrected; and to the present day, the king and his people were finally taught to know their proper boundaries.

Sunderland, some time after, scribbled not to gain favour at this price. Rochester, the treasurer, though the king's brother-in-law, yet, because he refused to give this instance to his court, was committed to the Tower. The trial of the matter was put in commission, and Bellas was placed at the head of it. All the courtiers were disgusted, even such as had little regard to religion. The dishonour, as well as distress, attending renegades, made most men resolve, at all hazards, to adhere to their ancient faith.

In Scotland, James's zeal for proselytism was more successful. The Earl of Murray, Perth, and two other noblemen made use of a very courtly reason for their conversion: they pretended, that the papers found in the late king's cabinet had opened their eyes, and had convinced them of the preference due to the catholic religion. Queenborough, who showed not the same compliance, fell into total disgrace, notwithstanding his former services, and the important sacrifices which he had made to the measures of the court. These merits could not even secure him of safety against the vengeance to which he stood exposed. His rival, Perth, who had been ready to sink under his superior interest, now acquired the ascendancy; and all the complaints exhibited against Lingay, or any other man, were those of jealousy and suspicion.

But it was in Ireland, chiefly, that the mask was wholly taken off, and that the licentious thoughts, as well as to posterity, of his violence, his zeal, and his measure of his zeal and his violence. The Duke of Ormond was recalled; and though the privy and Lord Granard, two protestants, still possessed the authority of justices, the whole power was lodged in the hands of Talbot, the general, soon after created Earl of Tyrconnel; a man who, from the blindness of his prejudices and fury of his temper, was transported with the most insensible ardour for the catholic cause. After the suppression of Monmouth's rebellion, he asked his successor to be appointed all the protestants, on preference of securing the public peace, and keeping their arms in a few magazines, for the use of the militia. Next, the army was new-modelled; and a great number of officers were dismissed, because it was pretended that they or their fathers had served under Cromwell and the republic. The injustice was not confined to them. Near three hundred officers more were afterwards broken, though many of them had purchased their commissions with money, and had not four or five years been reappointed, because they were protestants, were dismissed; and being stripped even of their regimentals, were turned out to starve in the streets. While these wrongs were carrying on, Claremont was a more unjustifiable act. A new edict of the king was published, under which all Catholics were to be stripped of their houses, their goods, of all their temporal possessions, and to be reduced to the condition of beggars. The whole was immediately put into execution; and the king's zeal and his violence, he possessed no credit or authority. He was even a kind of prisoner in the hands of Tyrconnel; and as he gave all opposition in his power to the precipitate measures of the catholics, he was soon after recalled, and Tyrconnel substituted in his place. The unhappy protestants now saw all the civil authority, as well as the military force, transferred into the hands of their inconvertible enemies; inflamed with benignant hatred, and stimulated by every motive, which the passion either for property, power, religion, or, was justly, the passion of mankind, could inspire. The most baseless banishments were carried on, and houses were even burnt, where there was not a suspicion of any disaffected person. In such a condition, a renewal of the ancient massacre was apprehended; and great multitudes, struck with the worst-grounded terror, deserted the kingdom, and infused into the English nation a dread of those violence, to which, after some time, they might justly, from the prevalence of the catholics, think themselves exposed.

All judicious persons of the catholic communion were disgusted with these violent measures, and could easily

JAMES II.

In the year 1680, when the king, having assumed the title and authority of absolute monarch, and the better to set the law at defiance, it was expressly inserted in their patent, that they were to exercise their jurisdiction, notwithstanding any law or statute to the contrary. The king's design to subdue the church was now sufficiently known; and had he been able to establish the authority of the nethermost court, his reign would have been a time of national disaster and infallible. A more sensible blow could not be given, both to national liberty and religion; and happily the contest could not be tried in a cause more iniquitous and unpopular than that against Archbishop Sharp and the church of England.

The prelate was cited before the commissioners. After denying the legality of the court, and claiming the privilege of all Christian bishops to be tried by the metropolitan and his suffragans, he declared in his answer, that, as he was obliged, if he had suspended Sharpe, to act in the capacity of a judge, he could not, consistent either with law or equity, pronounce sentence without a previous citation and trial: that he had by petition represented this difficulty to his majesty; and petitions for assistance had been drawn up in the council, and two letters had been written, which, coming from a superior, was equivalent to a command, and had accordingly met with the proper obedience: that he had thus, in his approbation, confirmed himself to his present duty, and that the said commissioners had not secured to his duty in any particular, he was now willing to enrage pardon, and to make reparation. All this submission, both in Sharpe and the prelate, had no effect: Sentence against the archbishop was ordered to be drawn up, and the orders were accordingly sent to the commissioners to proceed: and by a majority of votes the bishop, as well as the doctor, was suspended.

Almost the whole of this short essay consists of attempts always imprudent, often illegal, sometimes both, against whatever was most loved and revered by the nation: even such schemes of the king's as might be laudable in themselves, were some of them, under the appearance of authority, and only to aggravate the charge against him. James was become a great patron of toleration, and an enemy to all those persecuting laws which, from the influence of the church, had been enacted both against the dissenters and catholics. Not content with granting dispensations to private persons, he assumed a power of issuing a declaration of general indulgence, and of suspending at once all the penal statutes, by which a conformity was required to the laws and usages of the church: this was a strain of authority, it must be confessed, quite inconsistent with law and a limited constitution; yet it was supported by many strong precedents in the history of England. Even after the persecution by which his predecessor had endeavored, and began to be well understood, the late king had, oftener than once, and without giving much umbrage, exerted this dangerous power; he had, in 1662, suspended the execution of a law which regulated extramarian; during the Dutch wars, he had twice suspended the act of navigation; and the Commons, in 1666, being resolved, contrary to the king's judgment, to enact that iniquitous law against the importation of Irish cattle, found it necessary, in order to obviate the exercise of this prerogative, which they desired not at that time entirely to deny or abrogate, to call that importation a nuisance.

Though the several measures of the sovereign were great in civil affairs, it was still greater in ecclesiastical; and the whole despotic power of the popes was often believed, in virtue of the supremacy, to have devolved to the crown. The last parliament of Charles I., by aboliishing the power of the king and convocation to frame canons without consent of parliament, had somewhat diminished the supposed extent of the supremacy; but still very considerable remains of it, at least very important claims, remained, and were occasionally made use of by the sovereign. In 1662, Charles, pleading both the rights of A. D. 1692. his supremacy and his suspending power, had granted a general indulgence or toleration; and in 1672 he renewed the same edict; though the remonstrances

of his parliament obliged him on both occasions to retire; and in the last instance, the triumph of law over prerogative was deemed very great and memorable. In general we may remark, that where the exercise of the suspending power was agreeable and useful, the power itself was little questioned; where the exercise was弟兄 in vigour and activity to his brother, and who probably thought that his people enjoyed no liberties, but by his royal concession and indulgence.

In order to procure a better reception for his edict of toleration, the king, finding himself opposed by the church, began to pay court to the dissenters; and he imagined that, by playing one party against another, he should easily carry over both a religious policy which it much exceeded his capacity to conduct. His intentions were so obvious, that it was impossible for him ever to gain the sincere confidence and regard of the nonconformists. They knew that the genius of their religion was diametrically opposed to that of the Protestant sect of the king's affection. They were sensible, that both the violence of his temper, and the maxims of his religion, were repugnant to the principles of toleration. They had seen that, on his accession, as well as during his brother's reign, he had courted the church at their expense; and it was not till his dangerous schemes were rejected by the prelates, that he had recourse to the nonconformists. All his favours, therefore, must to every man of judgment among the sectaries, have appeared insidious: yet such was the pleasure reaped from present ease, such the animosity of the dissenters against the church, who had so long suffered at the hands of persecution, that even where extended, most of them had no principle to the king, and compliance with his measures; and could not forbear rejoicing extremely in the present depression of their adversaries.

But had the dissenters been ever so much inclined to shut their eyes with regard to the king's intentions, the manner of conducting his scheme in Scotland was sufficient to discover the secret. The king first applied to the Scottish parliament, and desired an indulgence for the Catholics alone, without comprehending the presbyterians; but that assembly, though more disposed than even the parliament of England, to sacrifice their civil liberties, resolved likewise to adhere pertinaciously to their religion; and they rejected, for the first time, the king's application. James therefore found himself obliged to exert his prerogative; and he now thought it prudent to interest a party among his subjects, in the interests of Catholics, in support of his authority. To the purposes of the harasmed and persecuted presbyterians, they heard the principles of toleration everywhere extended; and found that full permission was granted to attend conventicles; an licence, which, even during this reign, had been declared no less than a capital enormity. The king's declaration, however, of indulgence, contained clauses sufficient to depress their joy. As if popery were already prepared, he now sedulously laboured that no further use should be made of it, or render it unnecessary against any man on account of his persuasion of the protestant religion; "a promise surety of toleration given to the protestants with great precaution, and admitting a considerable degree of persecution for slight violence. It is likewise remarkable, that the king declared in express terms, that he had thought fit, by his sovereign authority,
The only proof of complaisance which James received from the pontiff, was his sending a nuncio to England, in return for the embassy. By act of parliament any communication with the Pope was made treason; yet so little remained before the king made his entrance into a public and solemn reception at Windsor. The Duke of Somerset, one of the bed-chamber, because he refused to assist at this ceremony, was dismissed from his employment. The nuncio resided openly in London during the rest of his term, and Catholic bishops were publicly consecrated in the king's chapel, and sent out, under the title of vicars apostolical, to exercise the episcopal function in their respective dioceses. Their pastoral letters, directed to their subjects, were never admitted later than the permission was given by the express allowance and permission of the king. The regular clergy of that communion appeared at court to the habits of their order; and some of them were so indiscreet as to boast, that, in a little time, they hoped to walk in procession through the capital.

While the king knocked in the most open manner all the principles and prejudices of his protestant subjects, he could not sometimes be so sensible, that he stood in need of their assistance for the execution of his design. He had himself, by virtue of his prerogative, suspended the penal laws, and dispensed with the test; but he would gladly have obtained the sanction of parliament to these acts of policy, and he knew that without its consent alone would never afford a durable security to the Catholics. He had employed, therefore, with the members of parliament many private conferences, which were then called "the conference." He proposed to them measures, and promises, to break their obstinacy in this particular. Finding all his efforts fruitless, he had dissolved the parliament, and was determined to call a new one, from which he expected more complaisance and submission. By the practice of annulling the charters, the king was become master of all the corporations, and could at pleasure change every where the whole magistracy. The church party, therefore, by whom the crown had been hated so remarkably suspected, and to whom the king was visibly owed his safety from all the efforts of his enemies, was deprived of authority; and the dissenters, those very enemies, were, first in London, and afterwards in every other corporation, substituted in their place. Not content with this violent and dangerous innovation, the king appointed certain regulators to examine the qualifications of electors; and directions were given to them to exclude all such as were not: "satisfied with the test and penal statutes." Quenched in this purpose were openly proposed in all places, in order to try the sentiments of men, and enable the king to judge of the proceedings of the future parliament. The power of the crown was at this time so great; and the revenue, managed by James's frugality and industry, was in no small degree the consequence of his prosperity; that, if he had embraced any national party, he had been insured of success, and might have carried his authority to what length he pleased. But the Catholics, to whom he had entirely devoted himself, were scarcely the hundredth part of the people. Even the protestant non-conformists, whom he so much courted, were little more than the twentieth; and what was worse, reposed no confidence in the unnatural alliance contracted with the Catholics, and in the principles of toleration, which, contrary to their usual practice in all ages, seemed at present to be adopted by that sect. The king, therefore, finding little hope of a president, they were in the utmost despair of an parliament, and proceeded still in the exercise of his illegal and arbitrary authority.

The whole power in Ireland had been committed to the crown. In Scotland, all the ministers whom the king chiefly trusted were converted to that religion. Every great office in England, civil and military, was gradually transferred from the protestants. Rochester and Clarendon, the king's brothers-in-law, though they had ever been faithful to his interests, yet that they would oppose his in anything, was very evident from their adherence to the national religion; and had been dismissed from their employments. The violent Jefferyes himself, though he had sacrificed justice and humanity to the court; yet, because he refused also to give up his religion, was declining in favour and interest. Nothing now remained but to open the door in the church and universities to the intrusion of the Catholics. It was not long before the king made the first effort; and the prelate and established church to set up protection in the principles of liberty, he at last left himself entirely without friends and adherents.

Father Francis, a Benedictine, was recommended by the king's mandate to the university of Cambridge for the degree of master of arts; and as it was usual for the university to confer that degree on persons eminent for learning, without regard to their religion; and as they had been admitted lately to the dispensation of the king, they were by the express allowance and permission of the king. The regular clergy of that communion appeared at court to the habits of their order; and some of them were so indiscreet as to boast, that, in a little time, they hoped to walk in procession through the capital.

This act of violence, of all those which were committed during the reign of James, is perhaps the most illegal and arbitrary. When the dispensing power was the most strenuously insisted on by court lawyers, it had still been allowed, that the statutes which regard private property could not legally be infringed by that prerogative. Yet in this instance it appeared, that even these were not now secure from invasion. The privileges of a college are attacked: men are illegally dispossessed of their property, for adhering to their duty, to their oaths, and to their religion: the foundations of the church are attempted to be poisoned; nor would it be long, it was concluded, ere all ecclesiastical as well as civil premonitions would be destroyed, religion, regalia, and all their dignity, virtue, and authority, basely sacrificed to the reigning superstition. Such were the general sentiments; and as the universities have an intimate connexion with the ecclesiastical establishments, and mightily interest all those who have there received their education, this arbitrary proceeding begot a universal discontent against the king's administration.

The next measure of the court was an insult still more open to the ecclesiastics, and rendered the breach between the king and that powerful body, as well as inurable. It is strange that James, when he felt, from the sentiments of his own heart, what a mighty influence religious zeal had on the people, did not, for once, so boldly attempt it, as to suspect that it might possibly have a proportionate authority over his subjects. Could he have profited by repeated experience, he would have seen instance enough of how that communion, such as, from a wise and impartial temper, he was determined, by every possible expedient, to introduce into his kingdoms.

The king published a second declaration of indulgence, almost in the same terms with the former, and he submitted an answer to it, disapproving as far as possible any new measure of the court without the advice of a parliament. This, however, was of no use to the king, for he had already established an assembly, and now found himself surrounded by a body of men, who were determined to resist him at every point.

main in a sullen and refractory silence: that it was no breach of duty in subjects, even though not called upon, to discover their sense of public measures, in which every one had so intimate a concern: that the bishops in the present case were called upon, and must either express their sentiments or refrain; and, that by petition: that it could be no sedition to deny the prerogative of suspending the laws; because there really was no such prerogative, nor even could, in a legal and limited government, that even if this prerogative were real, it had yet been frequently controverted before the whole nation, both in Westminster-Hall, and in both Houses of parliament; and no one had ever dreamed of pitting the crown against the senate: and the people, instead of making an appeal to the people, had applied in private to his majesty, and had even delivered their petition so secretly, that, except by the confession extorted from them before the council, it was found impossible to prove the authors: and that though the petition was afterwards printed and dispersed, it was not so much as attempted to be proved that they had the least knowledge of the publication.

Their arguments were convincing in themselves, and were heard with a favourable disposition by the audience. Even some of the judges, though their seats were held during pleasure, declared themselves in favour of the prisoners. The superior motive of public good was now several hours to deliberate, and kept, during so long a time, the people in the most anxious expectation. But when the wished-for verdict, not guilty, was at length given, a loud universal ejaculation, which echoed through the hall, was conveyed to the crowds without, was carried into the city, and was propagated with infinite joy throughout the kingdom.

Ever since Monmouth's rebellion, the king had, every summer, encamped his army on Hornsow-hill, that he might both improve their discipline, and by so unusual a spectacle overawe the mutinous people. A popish chapel was openly erected in the midst of the camp, and great pains were taken in vain, to bring over the soldiers to that communion. The few converts, whom the priests had made, were treated with such contempt and ignominy, as deterred every one from following the example. Even the officers, whom the king instructed the army, served rather, from the aversion borne them, to weaken his interest among them. It happened, that the very day on which the trial of the bishops was finished, James had reviewed the troops, and had r. tired into the tent of Lord Feversham, the prince, who was surprised to find him so great an uproar in the camp, attended with the most extravagant symptoms of tumultuary joy. He suddenly inquired the cause, and was told by Feversham, "It was nothing but that the army was peremptorily to declare, in favour of the bishops." "Do you call that nothing?" replied he; "but so much the worse for them."

The king was still determined to rush forward in the same course, in which he was already, by his precipitate career, so fatally advanced. Though he knew that every order of men, except a handful of catholics, were enraged at his past measures, and still more terrified with the future prospect; though he saw that the same discontent had reached the army, his sole resource during the general disturbance; yet he was incapable of changing his measures, or even reviving his violence in the prosecution of them. He struck out two of the judges, Powel and Holloway, who had appeared to favour the bishops; he issued orders to prosecute all those clergymen who had not read his declaration; that is, the whole church of England, two hundred excepted: he sent a mandate to the new fellows, whom he had obstructed on Magdalen college, to elect the new president in the room of Parker, lately deceased, one Gifford, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and titular bishop of Madaura; and he is even said to have nominated the same person to the see of Oxford. So great an infatuation is perhaps an object of compassion rather than of anger: and is really surprising in a man who, in other respects, was not wholly deficient in sense and accomplishments.

A few days before the acquittal of the bishops, an event happened, which, in the king's sentiments, much over-balanced all the mortifications received on that occasion. The queen was delivered of a son, who was baptized by the name of James. This blessing was impatiently longed for, not only by the king and queen, but by all the catholics both abroad and at home. They saw, that the king was passed middle age; and that on his death the succession must devolve to the Prince and Princess of Orange, two zealous protestants, who would soon replace every thing on ancient foundations. Vows, therefore, were offered at every shrine for a male successor: pilgrimages were undertaken, particularly one to Loreto, by the Duchess of Modena; and success was chiefly attributed to this pious journey. But in proportion as this event was agreeable to the catholics, it increased the disgust of the protestants, by depriving them of that pleasure, though somewhat distant, prospect which at present they flattered themselves. Calumny even went so far as to ascribe to the king the design of imposing on the world a supposititious child, who might be educated in his principles, and after his death support the catholic religion in his dominions. The nation almost unanimously believed him capable, from bigotry, of committing any crime; as they had seen, that, from like motives, he was guilty of every imprudence: and the affections of nature, they thought, would be easily sacrificed to the preservation of a catholic prince.

The present occasion was not the first, when that calumny had been invented. In the year 1682, the queen, then Duchess of York, had been pregnant; and rumours were abroad that she was to give birth at that time. But was it not the case to obtrude upon the nation: but, happily, the infant proved a female, and thereby spared the party all the trouble of supporting their improbable fiction.

While every motive, civil and religious, A. D. 1682, concurred to alienate from the king every rank and denomination of men, it might be expected that the throne would fall to the prince by its own weight: but such is the influence of established government; so aversive are men from beginning hazardous enterprises; that, had not an attack been made from abroad, affairs might long have remained in their present delicate situation, and James might at last have prevailed in his rash and ill-converted projects.

The Prince of Orange, ever since his marriage with the Lady Mary, had maintained a very prudent conduct; agreeably to that sound understanding with which he was so eminently endowed. He made it a maxim to concern himself little in English affairs, and never by any measure to disgust any of his subjects on account of his own interest, and at last have it respected in his turn by the French. His natural inclinations, as well as his interest, led him to employ himself with assiduous industry in the transactions on the continent, and to oppose the grandeur of the French monarch; though he was at the same time, from personal and political considerations, conceived a violent animosity. By this conduct, he gratified the prejudices of the whole English nation: but as he crossed the inclinations of many, and was sought people, by complicity with France, he had much to engage in the favour and affections of that monarch.

James on his accession found it so much his interest to live on good terms with the heir apparent, that he showed retaining the most incredible story, but it is too small, that the same calamity, when once suffered, should yet be renewed with such success.
the prince some demonstrations of friendship; and the prince, on his part, was not wanting in every instance of duty and regard towards the king. On Monmouth's invasion he immediately despatched over six regiments of British troops, which were in the Dutch service; and he ordered to the command of the king, after the fashion of the rebels. How little sooner he might approve of James's administration, he always kept a total silence on the subject, and gave no countenance to those discontents which were propagated with such industry that it was evident the whole was the application of James himself, that the prince first openly took any part in English affairs. Notwithstanding the loyal ideas which the king had entertained of his prerogative, he found that the edicts emitted from it were not to the command of the king, from which he was, therefore, of the prince to the repeal of the penal statutes and of the test was strongly solicited by the king; and in order to engage him to agree to that measure, hopes were given, that England would second him in all those enterprises which he was capable of effecting with that sum of money planned on the continent. He was at this time the centre of all the negotiations of Christendom.

He forms a league against the prince well known to the king of France.

The emperor and the King of Spain, as long against the prince well known to the king of France. The emperor and the King of Spain, as long as they were his subjects, the subjects had inflamed all the protestant nations against him, and had raised him enemies, who, in defence of their religion as well as liberty, were obstinately resolved to oppose his progress. The city of Amsterdam and other towns in the province of Holland, which had before fallen into dependence on France, being terrified with the accounts which they every moment received of the furious persecutions against the hugenots, had now determined on a new system of defence. The union was however insurmountable. The protestant princes of the empire formed a separate league at Magdeburg for the defence of their religion. The English were averse to the blind bigotry of their sovereign, and were disposed to embrace the most desperate resolutions against him. From a view of the state of Europe during this period, it appears, that Lewis, besides rallying an illustrious reign, had wantonly by this persecution raised innumerable barriers to his arms, which otherwise it had been difficult, if not impossible, to resist.

The Prince of Orange knew how to avail himself of all these advantages. By his intrigues and influence there were no means which were not wanting in every instance of duty and regard against the French monarch. Spain and Holland became parties in the alliance. The accession of Savoy was afterwards obtained. Sweden and Denmark seemed to favour the same cause. But though these numerous states composed the greatest part of Europe, the league was still deemed imperfect and unequal to its end, so long as England maintained that neutrality, in which it was under the influence of the prince.

James, though more prone to bigotry, was more sensible to his own and to national honour than his brother; and had he not been restrained by the former motives, he would have maintained with more spirit the interests and independency of his kingdoms. When a prince, therefore, appeared of effecting his religious schemes by opposing the progress of France, he was not averse to that measure; and he gave his son-in-law room to hope, that by concursing with his views in England, he might prejudice his projects which the prince was so ambitious of promoting. A more tempting offer could not be made than to concur in the project of his enterprise character; but this the prince, with the attribute of the defence, appeared to him insurmountable. The king, he observed, had incurred the hatred of his own subjects; great apprehensions were entertained of his designs: the only resource which the nation saw, was in the future succession of that house. The prince, therefore, would do no more than to promise his consent to the repeal of the penal statutes, by which the nonconformists as well as catholics were exposed to punishment; that he should determine security absolutely necessary for the established religion. The king did not remain satisfied with a single trial. There was one Stuart, a Scotch lawyer, who had been banished for pretended treasonable practices; but who, on his release, had afterwards obtained a new commission from the king. By the king's directions, Stuart wrote several letters to papal minister Fazek, with whom he had contracted an acquaintance in Holland; and besides urging all the motives for an unlimited operation, he desired that the king should, in the name, be communicated to the Prince and Princess of Orange. Fazek, during a long time, made no reply; but finding that his silence was construed into assent, he hastened to protest at those of his highnesses. He said, that it was their fixed opinion, that no man, merely because he differed from the established faith, should ever, while he remained a peaceable subject, be exposed to any punishment or even examination. That the prince and princess gave them timely consent for repealing legally all the penal statutes, as well those which had been enacted against the catholics as against the protestant nonconformists; and would concurn with the king in Holland, for their support. The test was not to be considered as a penalty inflicted on the professors of any religion, but as a security provided for the established worship. That it was no punishment on men to be treated according to the duties of the profession of their own religion, and not the public opinion of the whole nation. The military commands, indeed, were sometimes bestowed on catholics; but as they were conferred with great precaution, and still lay under the control of the magistrate, they could give no just reason for umbrage. And that their highnesses, however desirous of maligning the king, and of endeavouring, by every means, to render his reign peaceful and happy, could not agree to any measure which would expose their religion to such imminent danger. When this letter was published, as it soon was, it inspired great courage into the protestants of all denominations, and served to keep them united in their opposition to the king. But the French monarch, who was content with a simple toleration for his own religion, but was resolved that it should enjoy great credit, if not an absolute superiority, was extremely displeased, and took every occasion to express his displeasure, as well against the Prince of Orange as the United Provinces. He gave the Algerine pirates, who preyed on the Dutch, a reception in his harbours, and liberty to dispose of their prizes. He revived some complaints of the East India company with regard to the affinity of Bantams. He required the six British regiments in the Dutch service to be sent over. He began to put his navy in a formidable condition. And from all his movements, the Hollander entertained apprehensions, that he sought only an occasion and pretence for making war upon them.

Resolved to oppose his designs, he called together a Houblon, and, with other members, to organize and maintain firm in their present union against the Catholics. He knew that men of education in England were, many of them, retained in their religion more by honour than by principles; that the same was the case, when the first prophet, yet if the example were once set by some eminent persons, interest would every day make considerable conversions to a communion which was so zealously encouraged by the sovereign. Dykvelt therefore was sent over as envoy to England: and the prince gave him instructions, besides publicly recommending on the conduct of affairs both at home and abroad, to apply in his name, after a proper manner, to every sect and denomination. To the church party, he sent assurances of favour and regard, and protested, that his education in Holland had nowiseprejudiced him against episcopal government. The resolutions were exhorted not to be made and executed in a hasty spirit, for which there was much, but to wait patiently till, in the fulness of time, laws, enacted by protestants, should give them that toleration which, with so much reason, they had long demanded. Dykvelt executed his commission with such dexterity, that all orders of men cast their eyes towards Holland, and expected thence a deliverance from those dangers with which their religion and liberty were so nearly threatened.

There remained, however, some reasons, which obtained all parties in awe, and kept them from breaking out into immediate hostility. The prince, on the one hand, was afraid of hazarding by violent measures, an inheritance which the laws insured to the prince; and the English protestants, on the other, from the prospect of her success, still entertained hopes of obtaining at last a peaceable and a safe redress of all their grievances. But when a son was born to the king, both the prince and the English nation were reduced to despair, and saw no resource but in a court, and that for their children, for the future, and for the event, which James had so long made the object of his most ardent prayers, and from which he expected the firm establishment of his throne, proved the immediate cause of his death.

Zuylenstein, who had been sent over to congratulate the king on the birth of his son, brought back to the prince invitations from most of the great men in England, to assist in a conspiracy for their master. He became a champion of the liberties. The Bishop of London, the Earl of Danby, Nottingham, Devonshire, Dorset, the Duke of Norfolk, the Lords Lovelace, Delamere, Paulet, Eland, Mr. Hampden, Powle, Lester, besides many eminent citizens of London; all these persons, though of opposite parties, concurred in their applications to the prince. sums of money, raised for other purposes, were diverted by the prince to the use of this expedition. The States had given him their entire confidence; and partly from terror of the power of France, partly from distrust at some retrenchments laid on their commerce in that kingdom, were sensible how necessary success in this enterprise was to become to their domestic happiness and security. Many of the neighbouring princes regarded him as their guardian and protector; and, so far as his powers would allow, they supported the discontent; and, in all their councils and sittings, he held conferences with Constaing, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, with the Electors of Brandenburgh and Saxony, with the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and with the whole house of Luxemburg. It was agreed, the secret was to release the troops employed against England, and should protect the United Provinces during the absence of the Prince of Orange. Their forces were already on their march for that purpose: a considerable encomium of the Dutch army was formed at Nuremberg: every place was in movement; and though the roots of this conspiracy reached from one end of Europe to the other, so secret were the prince’s counsels, and so fortunate was the situation of affairs, that he could still cover his preparations under other pretexts; and little suspicion was entertained of his real intentions.

The King of France, menaced by the league of Augsburg, and seeking to strike a fatal blow against his allies; and having sought a quarrel with the emperor and the elector palatine, he had invaded Germany with a great army, and had laid siege to Philipburg. The Elector of Cologne, who was also Hobbes’s son-in-law, and who with his territories almost entirely surrounded the United Provinces, had died about this time; and the candidates for that rich succession were Prince Clement of Bavaria, supported by the house of Austria, and the Cardinal of Farsenburg, a noble gentleman of France. The Pope, who favoured the allies, was able to throw the balance between the parties, and Prince Clement was chosen; a circumstance which contributed extremely to the security of the crown and the Cardinal of Farsenburg, successor of the fittest, and who, having applied to France for succour, the neighbouring territories were full of troops; and by this means the preparations of the Dutch and their allies seemed intended in order to renew their own defence against the different enterprises of Lewis.

All the articles, however, of the prince, could not entirely conceal his real intentions from the sagacity of the French court. D’Avaux, Lewis’s envoy at the Hague, had been able, by a comparison of circumstances, to trace the purposes of the preparations in Holland; and he instantly informed his master of the discovery. Lewis conveyed the intelligence to James; and accompanied the information with an important proposal. He was willing to join a squadron of French ships to the English fleet; and to send over any number of troops, which James should judge requisite for his security. When this proposal was rejected, he again offered to raise the siege of Philipburg, to march his army into the Netherlands, and by the terror of his arms to detain the Dutch forces in their own country. This proposal met with no better reception.

James was, as yet, entirely convinced, that his son-in-law intended an invasion upon England. Fully persuaded, himself, of the sacredness of his own authority, he fancied that a like belief had made deep impression on his subjects; and so much had the news of simple truth, he thought, to repel foreign forces, and to suppress any sedition among the populace. A small number of French troops, joined to these, might tend only to breed discontent; and afford them a pretext for mutiny among the army; and he, who was well known to be able, he thought, to repel foreign forces, and to suppress any sedition among the populace. embraced the latter part of the alternative. For some time he remained speechless; but having recovered from his astonishment, he commanded them to take up their arms; adding with a sullen, discontented air, "That for the future, he would not do them the honour to apply for their approbation."

While the king was dismayed with these symptoms of general disaffection, he received a letter from the Marquis of Atholl, his most influential of the Highlanders, who informed him with certainty, that he was soon to look for a powerful invasion from Holland, and that petitioner Fagel had at length acknowledged that the Dutch had already sent all their transport forces into England. Though James could reasonably expect no other intelligence, he was astonished at the news: he grew pale, and the letter dropped from his hand: his eyes were suddenly opened, and he found himself on the brink of a frightful precipice, which his delusions had hitherto concealed from him. His ministers and counsellors, equally astonished, saw no resource but in a sudden and precipitate retraction of all those fatal measures by which he had created to himself so many enemies, foreign and domestic. He paid court to the Dutch, and the king refrains offered to enter into any alliance with them for common security; he replaced in all the counties the deputies and judges, who had been deprived of their commissions for their adherence to the test and the penal laws; he restored the charters of London, and of all the corporations: he annulled the court of ecclesiastical commission: he took off the Bishop of London's house, which the rebels had expelled presbyters and fellow-saints of Magdalen college: and he was even reduced to caress those bishops whom he had so lately persecuted and insulted. All these measures were regarded as symptoms of fear, not of repentance. The bishops, instead of promising success, or suggesting comfort, recapitulated to him all the instances of his misadministration, and advised him thenceforth to follow more humane views. And intelligence arrived of a great disaster which had befallen the Dutch fleet, it is commonly believed, that the king recalled, for some time, the concessions which he had made to Magdalen college; a bad sign of his sincerity in his other concessions. Nay, so prevalent were his unfortunate prepossessions, that amidst all his present distresses, he could not forbear, at the baptism of the young prince, appointing the Pope to be one of the godfathers.

The report, that this reprobation child was to be imposed on the nation, had been widely spread, and greedily received, before the birth of the Prince of Wales: but the king, who, without seeming to take notice of the matter, met him on Monday, and that day, from an ill-timed haughtiness, totally neglected it. He disdained, he said, to satisfy those who would deem him capable of so base and villainous an action. Finding that the columns raised ground, and had made deep impres- sion on his subjects, he was now obliged to submit to the mortifying task of ascertaining the reality of the birth. Though no particular attention had been beforehand given to insure proof, the evidence, both of the queen's pregnancy and delivery, was rendered indiscernible; and so much the more, as no argument or proof of any importance, nothing but popular rumour and surmise, could be thrown into the opposite scale.

Perceiving, the Prince of Orange's declaration was dispersed over the kingdom, and met with universal approbation. All the grievances of the nation were there enumerated: the dispensing and suspending power; the party of ecclesiastics, in the filling of all offices with catholics, and the raising of a Jesuit to be privy counsellor; the open encouragement given to popery, by building every where churches, colleges, and seminaries, for that sect; the displacing of communicants by those banished to give sentence according to orders received from court; the annulling of the charters of all the corporations, and the subjecting of elections to arbitrary will and pleasure; the treating of petitions, even the most reasonable, from persons of the highest rank, as criminal and seditious; the committing of the whole authority of Ireland, civil and military, into the hands of papists; the assuming of an absolute power over the religion and laws of Scotland, and openly exclaiming in that kingdom an obedience without reserve; and the violent pros- spectrum against the legitimacy of the Prince of Wales. in order to redress all these grievances, that he intended to come over to England with an armed force, which might protect him from the king's evil counsellors: and that his sole aim was to have a legal and free establishment of the church and liberty of the nation, as well as examine the proofs of the Prince of Wales's legitimacy. No one, he added, could entertain such hard thoughts of him as to imagine, either that he had formed any design whatever of a full and lasting settlement of religion, liberty, and property. The force which he meant to bring with him was totally disproportionate to any views of conquest; and it was absurd to suspect, that so many persons of high rank, both in church and state, would have given him so many solemn invitations for such a pernicious purpose. Though the English ministers, terrified with this enterprise, had pretended to repress some of the grievances complained of; there still remained the foundation of all grievances, upon which they could in an instant be again erected, an arbitrary and despotic power in the crown. And for this usurpation there was no possible remedy, but by a full restoration of all the rights of the subject in a free parliament.

So well concerted were the prince's measures, that, in three days, about four hundred transports were hired; the army quickly fell down the rivers and canals from Nimrod to Camber, the natural and necessary embarkation; and the prince set sail from Helvoet, of Oct.

St succoured, with a fleet of near five hundred vessels, and an army of above fourteen thousand men. The first encountered the storm, which drove him back: but his loss being soon repaired, the fleet put to sea under the command of Admiral Herbert, and made sail with a fair wind towards the west of England. The same wind dispersed the king's squadron, and enabled the Dutch to pass the straits of Dover without opposition. Both shores were covered with multitudes of people, who, besides admiring the grandeur of the spectacle, were held in anxious suspense with respect to the success of an enterprise, the most important which, during some ages, had been undertaken in Europe. The prince had a prosperous voyage, and landed his army safely in Torbay on the fifth of November, the anniversary of the gunpowder treason.

The Dutch army marched first to Exeter; and the prince's declaration was there published. That whole county was so terrified with the executions which had been already made in London, that forty thousand men joined the prince. The Bishop of Exeter in a fright fled to London, and carried to court intelligence of the invasion. As a reward of his zeal, he received the archbishopric of York, which had long been kept vacant, with an intention, as was universally believed, of bestowing it on some catholic. The first person who joined the prince was Major Burnington; and he was quickly followed by the gentry of the counties of Devon and Somerset. Sir Edward Seymour made proposals for an association, which every one signed. By degrees the Earl of Abingdon, Mr. Russell, son of the Earl of Bedford, Mr. Wharton, Godfrey, Howe, came to Exeter. All England was in a state of commotion, London took arms in Cheshire, the Earl of Danby seized York, the Earl of Bath, governor of Plymouth, declared for the prince, the Earl of Devonshire made a like declaration in the north. The nobility and gentry of Nottinghamshire embraced the same cause; and every day there appeared some effect of that universal combination into which the nation had entered against the measures of the king. Even those who took not the field against him, were able to do him service and confound his counsels. A petition for a free parliament was signed by twenty-four bishops and peers of the greatest distinction, and was presented to the king. No one thought of opposing or resisting the invader.

But the most surprising event was the capitulation, which, from the general spirit of the nation, not from any particular reason, had crept into the army. The officers seemed all disposed to prefer the interests of their country and of their religion to those principles of honour and fidelity, which are commonly esteemed the most sacred duties of men by men of that profession. Lord Colchester, son of the Earl of Rivers, was the first officer that deserted to the prince; and he was attended by a few of his troops. Lord Lovelace made a like attempt to desert, but was detained some time by the Duke of Beaufort, and taken prisoner: Lord Cornbury, son of the Earl of Clarendon, was more successful. He attempted to carry over three regiments of cavalry; and he actually brought a considerable part of them to the prince’s quarters. Several officers of distinction informed Feversham, the general, that they could not in conscience fight against the Prince of Orange.

Lord Churchill had been raised from the rank of a page, had been invested with a high command in Ireland, and had been created a peer, and had owed his whole fortune to the king’s favour: yet even he could resolve, during the present extremity, to desert his unhappy master, who had ever showed extreme confidence in him. He carne with him the Duke of Grafton, natural son of the late king, Colonel Berkeley, and some troops of dragoons.

This conduct was a signal sacrifice to public virtue of every duty in private life; and requisite, even after the most upright, disinterested, and public-spirited behaviour to render it justifiable. The king had arrived at Salisbury, the head-quarters of his army, and was received that day by a shower of stones, and sincere friend, and he was extremely shocked with this, as with many other instances of ingratitude, to which he was now exposed. There remained none in whom he could confide. As the whole army had discovered symptoms of discontent, he concluded it final of treachery; and being deserted by those whom he had most favoured and obliged, he no longer expected that others would find a similar preference in his service. During this army, his conduct, and perplexity, he embraced a sudden resolution of drawing off his army, and retreating to London: a measure which could only send more tears, and serious harm to the treacherous.

But Churchill had prepared a still more mortal blow for his distressed benefactor. His lady and he had an entire ascendancy over the family of Prince George of Denmark; and the time now appeared seasonable for overwhelming the unhappy king, who was already staggering with the violent shocks which he had received. Andover was the first stage of James’s retreat towards London; and Prince George, together with the young Duke of Ormond, Sir George Hoot, and some other persons of distinction, deserted him in the night-time, and retired to the prince’s camp. No sooner did this news reach London, than the Princess Anne, in her seeding fear of the injuries which she had exerted in company with the Bishop of London and Lady Churchill. She fled to Nottingham; where the Earl of Dorset received her with great respect, and the county of the county quickly formed a troop for her protection.

The late king, in order to gratify the nation, had intrusted the education of his nieces entirely to protestants; and as these processes were deemed the chief resource of the established religion after their father’s defection, great care had been taken to instil into them, from their earliest influence, the strongest prejudices against popery. During the violence of such popular currents as now prevailed in England, all private considerations are commonly lost in the general passion; and the more principle any person possesses, the more apt he is, on such occasions, to neglect and abandon his domestic duties. Though these causes may account for the behaviour of these nieces, they had nowise prepared the king to expect so astonishing an event.

King’s concern. He burst into tears, when the first intelligenue of it was conveyed to him. Undoubtedly he foresaw the hazard of his project, that he might extricate himself from his present misfortune, was, as an act of firmness and resolution. The Prince of Orange had with good reason embraced a coarty opinion; and he deemed it extremely difficult to find expedients for securing the nation, so long as the king kept possession of the crown. Acting, therefore, by the public motive, and with no less, we may well presume, by private ambition, he determined to use every expedient which might intimidate the king, and make him quit that throne which he himself was the first to establish, and the most unfor-

moved by any means to the exasperation of his Cloak authority; but the nearer and more intimate concern of a parent laid hold of his heart; when he found himself abandoned in his uttermost distress by a child, and a vir-tuous child, whom he had ever regarded with the most tender affection. "God help me," cried he, in the extreme of his agony, "my own children have forsaken me!" It was indeed singular, that a prince whose chief blame consisted in imprudences, and misguided principles, should be exposed, from religious antipathy, to such treatment at the hands of his own religion, or to the enemies of tyrants that have disgraced the records of history,

never met with from their friends and family.

So violent were the prejudices which at this time prevailed, that the country, as well as the court, was not averse by the favour of their esteem or recommendation. Unable to resist the torrent, he preserved not presence of mind in yielding to it; but seemed in this eminence as much depressed with adversity, as he had been before highly elated by prosperity. He was called a public enemy by many late whom were in London; and followed their advice in issuing writs for a new parliament, and in sending Halifax, Nottingham, and Godolphin, as commissioners to treat with the Prince of Orange, in behalf of royal authority which he exercised. He even heartened to imprudent counsel, by which he was prompted to desert the throne, and to gratify his enemies beyond what their fondest hopes could have promised them.

The question of the succession, and knowing how much she was the object of general hatred, was struck with the deepest terror, and began to apprehend a parliamentary impeachment, from which, she was told, the majority of the peers were not exempted. The high and mighty, counsels and above, all the prelates, were aware, that they should be the first sacrifice, and that their perpetual punishment was the smallest penalty which they must expect from national resentment. They were, therefore, desirous of carrying the king along with them; whose presence, they knew, would still be some resource and protection to them to foreign countries, and whose restoration, if it was successfully followed up, would again establish in power and authority. The general defection of the protestants made the king regard the catholics as his only subjects, on whose counsel he could rely; and the fatal catastrophe of his father afforded them a plausible reason for making him a sacrifice. The influence of circumstances was not, during his present distructions, sufficiently weighed. Even after the people were inflamed by a long civil war, the execution of Charles I.
alone could not be deemed a national deed; it was perpetrated by a fanatical army, pushed on by a daring and eschatological leader; and the whole kingdom had ever entertained, and did still entertain, a violent abhorrence against that denomination. The situation of public affairs, therefore, more resembled what it was forty years before, than the Prince of Orange, either in birth, character, fortune, or connections, could be supposed a parallel to Cromwell.

The emissaries of France, and among the rest, Barillon, the French ambassador, were busy about the king; and they had entertained a very false notion, which they instilled into him, that nothing would more certainly retard the public settlement, and beguile universal confusion, than his deserting the kingdom. The Prince of Orange had with good reason embraced a coarty opinion; and he deemed it extremely difficult to find expedients for securing the nation, so long as the king kept possession of the crown. Acting, therefore, by the public motive, and with no less, we may well presume, by private ambition, he determined to use every expedient which might intimidate the king, and make him quit that throne which he himself was the first to establish, and the most unfor-

which he proposed, implied almost a present participation of the sovereignty; and he stopped not a moment the march of his army towards London.

The news, which the king received from all quarters, served to continue the panic into which he was fallen, and which his enemies expected to improve to their advantage. Colonel Copel, deputy governor of Hull, made himself master of that important fortress; and threw into prison Lord Langdale, the governor, a catholic; together with other noblemen of the same religion. The town of Newcastle received Lord Larmes, and declared for the Prince of Orange and a free parliament. The Duke of Norfolk, lord lieutenant of the county of that name, joined forces. They entered切成乔town and rilenced its capitulation was read at Oxford by the Duke of Ormond, and received with great applause by that loyal university, who also made an offer of their plate to the prince. Every day, some person of quality or distinction, and among the rest the Duke of Somerset, went over to the enemy. A violent declaration was dispersed in the prince's name, but without his participation; in which every one was commanded to seize and punish all papists, who, contrary to law, pretended either to carry arms, or exercise any act of authority. It may not be unworthy of notice, that a merry ballad, called Lilibullero, being at this time published in derision of the papist and its adherents, was greatly depended on by the populace and was sung by all ranks of men, even by the king's army, who were strongly seized with the national spirit. This incident both discovered, and served to increase, the general discontent of the kingdom.

The contagion of mutiny and disobedience had also reached Scotland, whence the regular forces, contrary to the advice of Halkarins, the treasurer, were withdrawn, in order to receive the applications to the Duke of Argyll. The Marquis of Athole, together with Viscount Tarbat, and others, finding the opportunity favourable, began to form intrigues against Perth, the chancellor; and the presbyters and other magistrates of that city, did not shun to second them. The chancellor, apprehensive of the consequences, found it expedient to abscond; and the populace, as if that event were a signal for their insurrection, immediately rose in arms, and ruled the city. The Marquis of Athole, and all the zealous royalists, were obliged to conceal themselves; and the privy council, instead of their former submissive strains of address to the king, and violent ex post facto their fellow-subjects, now made applications to the Prince of Orange, as the restorer of law and liberty.

The king, every moment alarmed, more and more, by these proofs of a general disaffection, not daring to repose trust in those whom he had formerly exposed to more danger than himself, agitated by disdain towards ingratitude, by indignation against disloyalty, impelled by his own fears and those of others, precipitately embraced the resolution of escaping into France; and he sent off beforehand the queen and the infant prince, under the conduct of Count Laurain, an old favourite of the French monarch. He himself disappeared in the night-time, attended only by Sir Edward Hales; and made the best of his way to a ship which waited for him near the mouth of the river. As if this measure had not been the most grateful to his enemies of any that he could adopt, he had carefully concealed his intention from all the world; and none was surprised which he left the city, the court, and the kingdom, upon the discovery of this strange event. Men beheld, all of a sudden, the ruins of government thrown up by the hand which held them; and saw some who had any right, or even pretension, to take possession of them.

The more effectually to involve every thing in confusion, the king appointed not one, who should, in his absence, succeed him. The nobles were exposed to more danger than himself, agitated by disdain towards ingratitude, by indignation against disloyalty, impelled by his own fears and those of others, precipitately embraced the resolution of escaping into France; and he sent off beforehand the queen and the infant prince, under the conduct of Count Laurain, an old favourite of the French monarch. He himself disappeared in the night-time, attended only by Sir Edward Hales; and made the best of his way to a ship which waited for him near the mouth of the river. As if this measure had not been the most grateful to his enemies of any that he could adopt, he had carefully concealed his intention from all the world; and none was surprised which he left the city, the court, and the kingdom, upon the discovery of this strange event. Men beheld, all of a sudden, the ruins of government thrown up by the hand which held them; and saw some who had any right, or even pretension, to take possession of them.

But it must be considered, that his subjects had first deserted him, and entirely lost his confidence; that he might reasonably be supposed to entertain fears for his liberty, if not for his life; and that the conditions would not probably be moderate, which the nation, sensible of his insubordinate temper, enraged with the violation of their laws and the danger of their religion, and foreseeing his resentment on account of their past resistance, would, in his present circumstances, exact from him.

By this temporary dissolution of government, the populace were masters; and there was no disorder, which, during their present ferment, might not be dreaded from them. They rose in a tumult and destroyed all the massacre excuses. They even connected and rioted the Florentine envoy and Spanish ambassador, where many of the catholics had lodged their most valuable effects. Jefferes, the chancellor, who had disguised himself in order to fly the kingdom, was discovered by them, and so abused, that he died a little after. Even the army, which should have suppressed these tumults, would, it was apprehended, serve rather to increase the general disorder. Faversham had no sooner heard of the king's flight, than he disbanded the troops in the neighbourhood, and, without either disarming or paying them, let them loose to prey upon the country.

In this extremity, the bishops and peers who were in town, for the remaining authority of the state, (for the privy council, composed of the king's creatures, was totally disregarded,) thought proper to assemble, and to purpose for the preservation of the community. They chose the Marquis of Halifax, and appointed the members of the lord of all the action to the mayor and aldermen for keeping the peace of the city; they issued orders, which were readily obeyed, to the fleet, the army, and all the garrisons; and they made application to the parliament, who, it was highly applauded, and whose success they joyfully congratulated.

The prince, on his part, was not wanting to the tide of success; he, better in all things, knowing the esteem which authority which the present exiguity had put into his hands. Besides the general popularity attending his cause, a new incident made his approach to London still more grateful. In the present trepidation of the people, a rumour arose, either from chance or design, that the disband ed Irish had taken arms, and had commenced an universal massacre of the Protestants. This ridiculous belief was spread all over the kingdom in one day; and beguine every where the consternation, the deepseated distress, the deep and urgent needs, which there were not in the range which naturally succeeds to such popular panics. While everyone, from principle, interest, or animosity, turned his back on the unhappy king, who had abandoned his own cause, the unwelcome news arrived, and the king seized that he had been seized by the populace at Faversham, as he was making his escape in disguise; that he had been much abused, till he was known; but that the gentility had then interposed and protected him, though they still refused to consent to his escape. This intelligence threw all parties into confusion. The prince sent Zouch with orders, that the king should approach no nearer than Rochester; but the message came too late. He was already arrived in London, where the populace, moved by compassion for his unhappy fate, and actuated by their own levity, had received him with shouts and acclamations.

During the king's abode at Whitehall, little attention was paid to him by the nobility or any persons of distinction. They had all of them been previously disgusted on account of his blind partiality to the catholics, and they knew that they were now become criminal in his eyes by their late public application to the Prince of Orange. He himself showed not any symptom of spirit, nor discovered any intention of opposing the design of his new master, who, he had once thrown aside. His authority was now plainly expired; and as he had exercised his power, while possessed of it, with very precipitate and haughty counsels, he relinquished it by a despair equally precipitate and pusillanimous.

Nothing remained for the now ruling powers, but to deliberate how they should dispose of his person. Besides that the prince might justly be supposed to have possessed more generosity than to think of offering violence to an unhappy monarch, so nearly related to him, he knew that nothing would so effectually promote his own views as the king's returning into France, a country at all times obnoxious to the English. It was determined, therefore, to push him into that measure, which, of himself, he seemed sufficiently inclined to embrace. The king having sent Lord Faversham on a civil message to the prince, desiring a conference with him, was brought to the public sentiment, that nobleman was put in arrest, under pretence of his coming without a pass: the Dutch guards were ordered to take possession of Whitehall, where James then resided, and to displace the English; and Halifax, Shrewsbury, and Delaware brought a message from the prince, which they delivered to the king in bed after midnight, ordering him to leave his palace next morning, and to depart for Ham, a seat of the Duchess of Lauderdale's. He desired permission, which was easily granted, of returning to Chester, a town near the sea-coast. It was perceived, that the artifact had taken effect; and that the kingdom, terminated with this harsh treatment, had renewed his former resolution about the kingdom.

He lingered, however, some days at Chester, under the protection of a Dutch guard, and seemed desirous of an invitation still to keep possession of the throne. He was, however, sensible, that a stay too long in his own power, was too much to his people's loyalty, and, in confidence of their submission, had offered the greatest violence to their principles and prejudices; so had he, at last, on finding his disappointment, gone far in the other extreme, and bad himself arrested and despoiled of all sense of duty or allegiance. But observing that the church, the nobility, the city, the country, all concurred in neglecting him, and leaving him to his own counsels, he submitted to his melancholy fate; and being urged by earnest letters from the queen, he privately embarked on board a frigate which

Second escape, waited for him; and he arrived safely at Amblie, in Picardy, whence he hastened to St. Germain. Louis received him with the highest generosity, sympathy, and regard; a conduct which, more than his most signal victories, contributes to the honour of that great monarch.

The first act of the new prince, whom, if we consider his personal character rather than his public conduct, we may safely pronounce more unfortunate than criminal. He had many of those qualities which form a good citizen: even some of those which, had they been combined in one man, as well as in the millenial had served to compose a good sovereign. In domestic life, his conduct was irreproachable, and is entitled to our approbation. Severe but open in his enmities, steady in his counsels, diligent in his schemes, brave in his enterprises, faithful, sincere, and honourable in his dealings with all men; such was the character with which the Duke of York mounted the throne of England. In that high station, his frugality of public money was remarkable, his industry exemplary, his application to naval affairs successful, his encouragement of trade judicious, his jealousy of national honour laudable: what then was wanting to make him an excellent sovereign? A due regard and affection to the religion and constitution of his country. Had he been possessed of this essential quality, even his middling talents, added by so many virtues, would have rendered his reign honourable and happy. When it was wanting, every excellence which he possessed became dangerous and pernicious to his kingdoms.

The success of this prince (a virtue on which he highly valued himself) has been much questioned in those regions which he had under his rule: liberties and religion of the nation. It must be confessed, that his reign was almost one continued invasion of both; yet it is known, that, to his last breath, he persisted in asserting, that he never meant to subvert the laws, or procure more power than at first; yet he could not have been surprised, if his adherents had too fancied the state of the Roman Catholics. This question can only affect the personal character of the king, not our judgment of his public conduct. Though by a stretch of casuistry we should admit of his sincerity in these professions, the people were equally justifiable in their resistance of him. So lofty was the idea which he had entertained of his legal authority, that it left him no thought of obtaining it from his own people. His conduct, therefore, was dependent on his sovereign will and pleasure. And such was his zeal for proselytism, that whatever he might at first have intended, he plainly stopped not at toleration and equality: he confined all power, encouragement, and favour, to the catholics: converts from interest would soon have multiplied upon him: if not the greater, at least the better, part of the people, he would have flattered himself, that in a short time after his accession to the throne, a little time have thought it just, as well as pious, to bestow on them all the public establishments. Rigours and persecutions against heretics would speedily have followed; and thus liberty and the protestant religion would, in the issue, have been totally subverted; though we should not suppose that James, in the commencement of his reign, had formally fixed a plan for that purpose. And, on the whole, allowing this king to have possessed good qualities and good intentions, his conduct serves only, on that account, as a stronger proof, how dangerous it is to allow any prince, infected with the catholic superstition, to wear the crown of these kingdoms.

After the prince's escape, the courage and abilities of the Prince of Orange, seconded by surprising fortune, had effected the deliverance of this island; and with very little effusion of blood (for only one officer of the Dutch army and a few private soldiers died in that attempt); they had deposed a great prince, supported by a formidable fleet and a numerous army. Still the more difficult task remained, and what perhaps the prince regarded as not the least important: the obtaining for himself that crown which had fallen from his predecessors. Other men, enraged, entangled in the subtleties and forms of their profession, could think of no expedient, but that the prince should claim the crown by right of conquest; should immediately assume the title of sovereign; and should convene a parliament, which, being thus legally summoned by a king in possession, could ratified whatever had been transacted before they assembled. But this measure, being destructive of the principles of liberty, the only principles on which his future throne could be established, was prudently rejected by the prince, who, finding himself possessed of the goodwill of the nation, resolved to leave them entirely to their own guidance and direction. The peers and bishops, the lords and commons, the great number of men assembled, desiring him to summon a convention by circular letters; to assume, in the mean time, the management of public affairs; and to concert measures for the security of Ireland. At the same time, and arming himself with the weight of his title, he had left, in order to apologize for his late desertion, by the violence which had been put upon him. This step was a sufficient indication of their intentions with regard to that unhappy monarch.

The prince seemed still unwilling to act upon an authority which might be deemed so imperfect: he was desirous of obtaining a more express declaration of the public consent. A solemn expedition was therefore fitted out, for that purpose. All the members who had sat in the House of Commons during any parliament of Charles II. (the only parliament whose election was regarded as free,) were invited to meet; and to them were added the mayor, aldermen, and fifty of the common council. This was regarded as the most proper representative of the people that could be summoned during the present emergency. They unanimously voted the same address with the Lords: and the prince, being thus supported by all the House, which could possibly be obtained in this critical juncture, wrote circular letters to the counties and Corporation com-

enpowered sent letters to the counties and Corporation corporations of England; and his orders were universal, not only of preserving tranquillity throughout the kingdom; and the prince's administration was submitted to, as if he had succeeded in the most regular manner to the vacant throne. The fleet received the orders: the army, without murmur or opposition, allowed the royal ensign to be unfurled, and instantly supplied him with a loan of two hundred thousand pounds.
The conduct of the prince with regard to Scotland, was founded on the same prudent and moderate maxims. Finding that there were many Scotchmen of rank at that time never regarded with suspicion, and before them his intentions, and asked their advice in the present emergency. This assembly, consisting of thirty noblemen and about fourscore gentlemen, chose Duke Hamilton as a master to sympathise, whose character, was determined to pay court to the present authority. This eldest son, the Earl of Arran, professed an adherence to King James; a usual policy in Scotland, where the father and son, during civil commotions, were often preserved by the mischance of concerted schemes, and all events, the family from atander. Arran proposed to invite back the king upon conditions; but as he was vehemently opposed in this motion by Sir Patrick Hume, and seconded by anybody, the assembly made an offer to the prince of the present administration, which he willingly accepted. To anticipate a little in our narration; a convention, by circular letters from the prince, was summoned at Edinburgh on the twenty-second of March; where it was soon visible, that the interest of the malcontents would entirely prevail. The more zealous royalists, regarding this assembly as illegal, had foreborne to appear at elections; and the other party were returned for most places. This assembly was immediately seconded by a coalition of whip and tory: the former party alone had overpowered the government, and were too much enraged by the past injuries which they had suffered, to adopt a perpetual revolution. No sooner was it appointed that the purpose of the convention was discovered, the Earl of Balcarres and Viscount Dundee, leaders of the tores, withdrew from Edinburgh; and the convention having ceased a bold and decisive vote, that King James, by his mal-administration and his abuse of power, had forfeited all title to the crown, they made a tender of the royal dignity to the Prince of Orange.

The English convention was assembled; and it immediately appeared, that the House of Commons, both from the prevailing humour of the people, and from the influence of present authority, were mostly chosen from among the whig party. After thanks were unanimously given by both Houses to the Prince of Orange, for the deliverance which he had brought them, a less decisive vote than that of the Scottish convention was in the present case passed by a great majority of the Commons, and sent up to the Peers for their consideration. It was contained in these words: "That King James II. having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between the Crown and the people, and by revoking the laws and other wicked persons, violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, has abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby vacant." This vote, when carried to the upper House, met with great opposition; of which it is here necessary for us to explain the causes.

The tores and the high-church party, finding themselves once more in a lower assembly of the laws and of their religion, zealously promoted the national revolution, and had on this occasion departed from those principles of non-resistance, of which, while the king favoured them, they had formerly made such loud professions. Their present apprehensions had prevailed over their political tenets; and the unfortunate James, who had too much trusted to those general declarations, which never will be reduced to practice, found in the issue, that both parties were secretly united against him. But no sooner was the danger past, and the general fears somewhat allayed, than party prejudices resumed, in some degree, their former authority; and the tores were abashed at that victory, which their agents, during the preceding transactions, had obtained. The view of the events, therefore, to steer a middle course; and, though generally determined to oppose the king's return, they resolved not to consent to deposing him, or altering the constitution of the country. A recent coalition, with a great power was the expedition which they proposed; and a late instance in Portugal seemed to give some authority and precedent to that plan of government.

In favour of this scheme, the tores urged, that, by the uniform tenor of the English laws, the title to the crown was never ever regarded as secret, and could only be seized by a coalition, and by no mal-administration, be forfeited by the sovereign: that to dethrone a king and to elect his successor, was a practice quite unknown to the constitution, and had a tendency to render monarchies precarious; and that the sovereign, from his tender years, from lunacy, or from other natural infirmity, was incapacitated to hold the reins of government, both the laws and former practice agreed in appointing a regent, and the latter, if vested with the crown, would invest himself with the power of the administration: that the invertebrate and dangerous prejudices of King James had rend red him as unfit to sway the English sceptre, as if he had fallen into lunacy; and it was therefore natural for the people to have recourse to the same remedy: that the election of one king was a precedent for the election of another; and the government, by that means, would either degenerate into a republic, or what was worse, into a turbulent and audacious monarchy: that the case was still more dangerous, if there remained a prince, who claimed the crown by right of succession, and disputed, on so plausible a ground, the title of the present sovereign: that though the doctrine of non-resistance might hold good, a king being the absolute, yet was the belief of it very expedient; and to establish a government which should have the contrary principle for its basis, was to lay a foundation for perpetual revolutions. A question of the constitution of a regent was indeed exposed to many inconveniences; but so long as the line of succession was preserved entire, there was still a prospect of putting an end, some time or other, to the public discord, and that secret and insidious occurrence in history, especially in the English history, whereby disputed title had not, in the issue, been attend ed with much greater ills, than all those which the people had sought to shun, by departing from the lineal successor. The leaders of the whig party, on the other end, asserted, that if there were any ill in the precedent, that ill would result as much from establishing a regent, as from dethroning one king, and appointing his successor; nor would the one expedient, if wantonly and rashly embraced by the people, be less the source of public convulsions than the other: that if the laws gave no express permission to depose the sovereign, neither did they authorize resisting his authority, or separating the power from the throne: that a regent was unknown, except where the king was dethroned by reason of his tender age or his infirmities, was incapable of a will; and in that case, his will was supposed to be involved in that of the regent; that it would be the same means for an interregnum, if the commission, received from a prince, whom we ourselves acknowledged to be the lawful sovereign, and no jury would decide so contrary both to law and common sense, as to condemn such a pretended criminal: that even the prospect of being delivered from this monstrous inconvenience was, in the present situation of affairs, more distant than that of putting an end to a disputed succession: that allowing the young prince to be the legitimate heir, he had been born abroad; he would be educated in principles destructive of the constitution and established religion; and he would probably leave a son liable to the same insupportable objection; that if the whole line of the crown were consumed, the people would in time forget or neglect their claim; an advantage which could not be hoped for, while the administration was conducted in their name, and while they were still acknowledged to possess the legal title; and that a nation incapable of governing by regents or protectors, approached much nearer to a republic than one subject to monarchs, whose hereditary regular succession, as well as present authority, was fixed and appointed by the people. This question was opposed with great zeal, by the opposite parties in the House of Peers. The chief speakers among the tores were Clarendon, Rochester, and Nottingham; among the whigs, Halifax and Dunby. The question was carried by two votes, one against forty-one. All the pretates, except two, the bishops of London and Bristol, voted for a regent. The primate, a disinterested but pulilous man, kept, at a distance both from the prince's court and from parliament.
The House of Peers proceeded next to examine pieces of evidence, and to bring them up to the Commons. After a long debate, "Whether there were an original contract between king and people?" and the affirmative was carried by fifty-three against forty-six; a proof that the tones were already losing ground. The next question was,
"Whether King James had broken the original contract
and, after a slight opposition, the affirmative prevailed.
The Lords proceeded to take into consideration the word "abated," and it was carried that "abated" was more properly applied to James, having broken the original contract and "deverted" the government, the throne was thereby vacated?" This question was debated with more heat and contention than any of the former; and upon a division, the tones prevailed by clever voices, and it was carried, to omit the last article with regard to the vacancy of the throne. The vote was sent back to the Commons with these amendments.

The Earl of Danby had entertained the project of becoming the crown solely upon the Prince of Orange, and of admitting her as hereditary legal successor to King James; passing by the infant prince, as illegitimate or supposititious, His change of party in the last question gave the Lords no considerable majority in the number of voices. The Commons still insisted on their own freedom to deliberate, and sent up reasons why the Lords should be requested to depart from this amendment. The Lords were not convinced; and it was necessary to have a free conference, in order to settle this controversy. Never suredly was national debate more important, or managed by more able speakers; yet it is surprising to find the topics insisted on by both sides so frivolous; more resembling the verbal disputes of the schools, than the solid reasonings of statesmen and legislators. In public transactions of such consequence, the true motives which produce any measure are seldom arrowed. The whigs, now the ruling party, having united with the tones, in order to bring about the revolution, had so much deference for their new allies, as not to insist that the crown should be declared forfeited,
an account of the king's mal-administration; such a declaration, they thought, would imply too great a censure of the old Tory principles, and too open a preference of their own. They agreed, therefore, to combine together the king's abusing his power, and his withdrawing from the king's house by his own counsel and inclination; whether he had given a virtual, though not a verbal, consent to dethroning himself. The tones took advantage of this obvious impropriety, which had been occasioned merely by the king's averse to the Caroline succession, and the determined upon the word "deverted" as more significant and intelligible. It was retorted on them, that however that expression might be justly applied to the king's withdrawing himself, it could not, with any propriety, be extended to his violation of the fundamental laws. And thus both parties, while they warped their principles from regard to their antagonists, and from prudential considerations, lost
the praise of consistence and uniformity.

The managers for the Lords next insisted, that even allowing the king's abuse of power to be equivalent to an abdication, or, in other words, to a civil death, it could operate on no other than his voluntary resignation, or his natural death, and could only make way for the next successor. It was a maxim of English law, "that the throne was never vacant: but instantly, upon the demise of one king, was filled with his legal heir, who was entitled to all the authority of his predecessor. And however young or unfit for government the successor, however unfortunate in his situation, though he were even a captive in the hands of public enemies; yet no just reason, they thought, could be advanced, against the default of his own, he should lose a crown, to which by law he was fully entitled.

The managers for the Commons might have opposed this reasoning by many specious, and even solid, arguments.
They might have said, that the great security for allegiance, being merely opinion, any scheme of their own being adopted in which it was most probable the people acquiesce and persevere; that though, upon the natural death of a king whose administration had been agreeable *to the laws, many and great inconveniences would be endured, rather than exclude his lineal successor; yet the same might happen to any successor proscribed by his rivals, by their revolt, to dethrone a prince whose illegal means had, in every circumstance, violated the constitution:
that, in these extraordinary revolutions, the government reverted,
in some degree, to its first principles, and the community acquired a new original contracting principle; that expedients, which, on other occasions, might be deemed violent and irregular; that the recent use of one extravational remedy reconciled the people to the practice of another, and that the king's principle, quite as much as theirs, was to recur to that which had run in on its usual tenor:
and that King James, having carried abroad his son, as well withdrawn himself, had given such just provocation to the kingdom, had voluntarily involved it in such difficulties, that the interests of his family were justly sacrificed to the public settlement and tranquillity. Though these topics seem reasonale, they were entirely forborne by the whig managers; both because they implied an acknowledgment of the infant prince's legitimacy, which it was agreed to keep as a secret, and because they contained too express a condemnation of Tory principles. They were content to maintain the vote of the Commons by shifts and evasions;
and both sides parted at last without coming to any agreement.

But it was impossible for the public to remain long in the present situation. The perseverance, therefore, of the lower House in its amendments, and the desertion of some Peers to the whig party, the vote of the Commons, without any alteration, passed by a majority of fifteen in the upper House, and received the sanction of every part of the legislature which then subsisted.

It happens unluckily for those who maintain an original contract between the magistrate and people, that great revolutions of government, and new settlements of civil constitutions, are commonly conducted with such violence, humiliation, and disorder, that the public voice can scarcely ever be heard; and the opinions of the citizens are at that time less attended to than even in the common course of administration. The present transactions in England, it must be confessed, are a singular exception to this ob-ervation. The new elections had been carried on with great tranquillity and freedom: the prince had ordered the troops to depart from all the towns where the voters assembled: a tumultuary petition to the two Houses having been politely received; the action of the House of Lords delayed for his advantage, effectually to suppress it: he entered into no intrigues, either with the Whig or Legis-ators: he kept himself in a total silence, as if he had been nowise over-heard; and the people, forborne to form cabals with the leaders of parties, he dissuaded
even to bestow caresses on those whose assistance
might be useful to him. This conduct was highly merr tious, and discovered great moderation and magnanimity:
even though the prince, unfortunately, through the whole course of his life, and on every occasion, was noted for an address so cold, dry, and distant, that it was very difficult for him, on account of any interest, to soften or familiarize it.

At length the prince designed to break silence, and to express, though in a private manner, his sentiments on the present situation of affairs. He called together Halifax, Shrewsbury, Darby, and a few more; and he told them, that having been invited over to restore their liberty, he had engaged in this enterprise, and had at last happily effected his purpose. That it belonged to the parliament, now chosen and assembled, with his advice and determined measures for the public settlement; and he pretended not to interpose in their determinations. That he heard of several schemes proposed for establishing the government:
some insisted on a regent; some on majorities; others proposing the crown to be annually disputed: the only scheme
he could see, so far from forming cabals with the leaders of parties, he dissuaded
even to bestow caresses on those whose assistance
might be useful to him. This conduct was highly merr

whole line of Stuart; to maintain, that their administration was one continued encroachment on the incontestable rights of the people; is not giving due honour to that great event, which not only put a period to their hereditary succession, but made a new settlement of the whole constitution. The increased power which they had attained by either of these two plans of settlement, that it would be totally out of his power to assist them in carrying it into execution; his affairs abroad were too important to be abandoned, but such as were left were to show him so much leisure as would be requisite to introduce order into their disjointed government.

These views of the prince were seconded by the princess herself, who, as she possessed many virtues, was a most obsequious wife to a husband, who, in the judgment of the generality of her sex, would have appeared so little attractive and amiable. All considerations were neglected, when they came in competition with what she deemed her duty to the prince. When Danby and others of her Tartars wrote her an account of their schemes and proceedings, she expressed great displeasure; and even transmitted their letters to her husband, as a sacrifice to conjugal fidelity. The Prince was concerned in the same plan for the settlement of the crown, and being promised an ample revenue, was content to be postponed in the succession to the crown. And as the title of her infant brother was, in the present establishment, entirely neglected, she might, on the whole, deem herself, in point of interest, a gamer by this revolution.

Settlement of the crown. The chief parties, therefore, being agreed, the convention passed a bill, in which they settled the crown on the Prince of Orange; the sole administration to remain in the prince: the Princess of Denmark to succeed after the death of the Prince and Princess of Orange; her posterity after those of the prince, but before those of the prince by any other wife. The convention annexed to this settlement of the crown a declaration of rights, where all the points which had, of late years, been disputed between the king and people, were finally determined; and the powers of royal prerogative were more narrowly circumscribed and more exactly defined, than in any former period of the English government.

Manners, arts. Thus have we seen through the whole age of the principality of four reigns, a continual struggle maintained between the crown and the people: privilege and prerogative were ever at variance: and both parties, beside the present object of dispute, had many latent claims, which, on a favourable occasion, they produced against their adversaries. Governments too steady and uniform, as they are seldom free, so are they, in the judgment of some, attended with another sensible inconvenience: they abate the active powers of men: deprive, corrupt, injure, and genius; and produce a universal lethargy in the people. Though this opinion may be just, the fluctuation and contest, it must be allowed, of the English government were, during these reigns, much too violent both for the repose and safety of the people. Foreign affairs, at that time, were either entirely neglected, or managed to pernicious purposes: and in the domestic administration there was left a continued fever, either секрет or manifest, which they transmitted to the crown and disorders. The revolution forms a new epoch in the constitution; and was probably attended with consequences more advantageous to the people, than any thing from an exceptional administration. By deciding many important questions in favour of liberty, and still more by that great precedent of deposing one king, and establishing a new family, it gave such an ascendant to popular principles, as has put the nature of the English constitution beyond all controversy. And it may justly be affirmed, without any danger of exaggeration, that we, in this island, have ever since enjoyed, if not the best system of government, at least the most entire system of liberty, that ever has appeared in the British empire.

To decry with such violence, as is affected by some, the imposture of the popish plot, a fiction which exceeds the ordinary bounds of vulgar credulity. But however singular these events may appear, there is really nothing alto- either new in any period of modern history: and it is remarkable, that the delusion and prejudice which have been so useful in a free constitution, have usually been such as men of profanity and humour could not bring themselves either to practise or approve. The other fact, which, since the revolution, has been obliged to cultivate popularity, sometimes found itself necessary to employ like artifices.

The whig party, for a course of near seventy years, has, almost without interruption, enjoyed the whole authority of the three estates, and has obtained no less a success than was obtained by them by their coun-} five thousand men, of guards and garrisons. At the end of his reign he augmented this number to near eight thousand. James, on Monmouth's rebellion, had on foot about fifteen thousand men; and when the Prince of Orange invaded England, the army was no fewer than thirty thousand regular troops in England.

The English navy, during the greater part of Charles's reign, made a considerable figure, for number of ships, value of the men, and conduct. In 1665, in the fleet composed of eighty-three ships; besides thirty which were at that time on the stocks. On the king's restoration he found only sixty-three vessels of all sizes. During the latter part of Charles's reign, the navy fell into decay; and of the numerous vessels, the narrowness of the king's revenue; but James soon after his accession restored it to its former power and glory; and before he left the throne earned it much further. The administration of the admiralty under Pepys, is still regarded as a model for order and economy. The fleet at the revolution consisted of one hundred seventy-three vessels of all sizes; and required forty-two thousand seamen to man it. That king, when Duke of York, had been the first inventor of sails.

The ministry of Charles, during these two reigns, had not totally decayed among the young nobility. Dorset, Mulgrave, Rochester, not to mention Ossory, served on board the fleet, and were present in the most furious engagements, as well as in the most peaceful times.

The commerce and riches of England did never, during any period, increase so fast as from the restoration to the revolution. The two Dutch wars, by disturbing the trade of England, did much to retard the progress of foreign and domestic trade. But after Charles had made a separate peace with the States, his subjects enjoyed, unmolested, the trade of Europe. The only disturbance which they met with, was from a few French provinciers who infested the channel; and Charles interposed not in behalf of his subjects with sufficient spirit and vigour. The recovery or conquest of New York and the Jerseys was a considerable accession to the strength and security of the English colonies; and together with the settlement of Pennsylvania and Carolina, which was effected during that reign, extended the English empire in America. The persecutions of the dissenters, or, more properly speaking, the restrictions imposed upon them, contributed to augment and people these colonies. Dr. Davenant affirms, that the shipping of England more than doubled during these twenty-eight years. Several new manufactures were established; in iron, brass, silk, hosiery, glass, paper, glass, China, and anv other." The trade was encouraged and the manufactures increased by careful restrictions, and by the natural progress of these industries. The Duke of Buckingham introduced from Venice the manufacture of glass and crystal into England. Prince Rupert was also an encourager of useful arts and manufactures: he himself was the inventor of etching. He had some idea of etching as a means of reviving the arts of painting and sculpture. In 1663, was passed the first law for allowing the exportation of foreign coin and bullion. In 1667 was concluded the first American treaty between England and Spain: this treaty was made more general and comprehensive in 1670. The treaty proounced all right of trading with each other's colonies; and the title of England was acknowledged to all the territories in America, of which she was then possessed.

The French king, about the beginning of Charles's reign, laid some impositions on English commodities: and the English, partly displeased with this innovation, partly moved by their animosity against France, retaliated, by laying such restraints on the commerce with that kingdom as amounted to a total destruction to a proper part of our manufactures; by such restraints as were only meant to intimidate and to deter foreign powers and nations from any further measures. Lord Clarendon tells us, that in 1663, when money, in consequence of a treaty, was to be remitted to the Bishop of Munster, it was found, that the whole trade of England could not supply above 1000 pounds a-month to Frank-fort and Cologne, nor above 20,000 pounds a-month to Hamburg: these sums appear surprisingly small.

At the same time that the borougus of England were deprived of their privileges and liberties, the colonies were on the liberties were secured; and he sent over governors invested with absolute power. The arbitrary principles of that monarch seemed to be in every part of the world. The people, during these two reigns, were, in a great measure, cured of that wild fanaticism, by which they had formerly been so much agitated. Whatever new views they might acquire, it may be questioned, whether, by this change, they were, in the main, much losers in point of morals. By the example of Charles II. and the cavaliers, licentiousness and debauchery became prevalent in the nation. The pleasures of the table were much pursued. Love was treated more as an appetite than a passion. The one sex began to abuse of the national character of chastity, without being able to inspire the other with sentiment or delicacy. The abuses in the former age, arising from overstrained pretensions to purity, had much propagated the spirit of irreligion; and many of the ingenious men of this period lie under the imputation of deism. Besides wits and scholars by profession, Shaftesbury, Halifax, Buckingham, Mulgrave, Sunderland, Essex, Roches, Sidney, Temple, are supposed to have adopted these principles.

The same factions which formerly disturbed the nation, were revived, and exerted themselves in the whole universe and mutually imagined, and disturbed each other's. The great man, being in his whole deportment a model of easy and gentlemanlike behaviour, improved the politeness of the nation; as much as faction, which of all things is most destructive to that virtue, could possibly permit. His courtiers were long distinguishable in England by their obliging and agreeable manners.

Till the revolution, the liberty of the press was very imperfectly enjoyed in England, and during a very short period. The star-chamber, while that court subsisted, put effectual restraints upon printing. On the suppression of that tribunal in 1644, the long parliament, after their rupture with the king, ejected the bishops, and imposed a tax on the licensing of books; and this authority was continued during all the period of the republic and protectorate. Two years after the restoration, an act was passed reviving the republican ordinances. This act expired in 1679; but was revived in the first of King James's reign. The liberty of the press did not even commence with the revolution. It was not till 1694, that the restraints were taken off: to the great displeasure of the king and his ministers, who were, seeing no where any government, in any present or past ages, any example of such unlimited freedom, doubted much of its salutary effects, and probably thought that no books or writings would ever so much improve the general understanding of men, as to render it safe to intrust them with an indulgence so easily abused.
In 1677, the old law for burning heretics was repealed:
a prudent measure, while the nation was in continual dread of the result of the act of toleration. Amidst the thick cloud of bigotry and ignorance which overspread the nation, during the communwealth and protectionist, there were a few sedate philosophers, who, in the retirement of Oxford, cultivated their reason, and ever with a consideration for the more serious eccentricities of their discourses in physics and geometry. Wilkins a clergyman, who had married Cromwell's sister, and was afterwards Bishop of Chester, promoted these philosophicaconvulsions immediately on the restoration, these men procured a patent, and having enlarged their number, were denominated the Royal Society. But this patent was all they obtained from the king. Though Charles was a lover of the sciences, particularly chemistry and mechanics;
he amused them by his example alone, not by his bounty.
His crotchets courtiers and mistresses, by whom he was perpetually surrounded, engrossed all his expense, and left him neither money nor attention for literary merit. His contemporary, Lewis, who fell short of the king's genius and knowledge in this particular, much exceeded him in liberality. Besides pensions conferred on learned men throughout all Europe, his academies were directed by rules sanctioned by salaries, which gave great honour to his memory;
and in the eyes of all the ingenuous part of mankind, will be esteemed an atonement for many of the errors of his reign. We may be surprised the state would not be more blessed by promoting since it is certain that that bounty, so extensive, so beneficial, and so much celebrated, cost not this monarch so great a sum as is often conferred on one useless overgrown favourite or courtier.
But though the French academy of sciences was directed, encouraged, and supported by the sovereign, there arose in England some men of superior genius, who were more than sufficient to cast the balance, and who drew on themselves and on their native country the regard and attention of Europe. Besides Wilkins, Wen, Wallis, eminent mathematicians; Hooke, an accurate observer by microscopes; and Seldenham, the restorer of true physic;
there flourished during this period a Boyle and a Newton;
men who trod with caution, and therefore the more se-
ure, steps, the only road which leads to true philosophy.
Boyle improved the pneumatic engine invented by Otto Guericke, and was thereby enabled to execute several new and curious experiments on the air, as well as on other bodies: his chemistry is much admired by those who are acquainted with that art: his hydrostatics contain a greater number of facts than any other experiment in nature or another of his works; but his reasoning is still removed from that boldness and temerity which had led astray so many philosophers. Boyle was a great partisan of the mechanical philosophy; a theory which, by discovering some of the secrets of nature, and allowing us to imagine the rest, is so agreeable to the natural vanity and curiosity of men. He died in 1691, aged 65.
In Newton this island may boast of having produced the greatest and rarest genius that ever rose for the ornament and instruction of the species. Caution in admitting no principles but such as were founded on experiment;
but readiness to adopt every such principle, however new or unorthodox, utility, beyond the rest of mankind; and thence less careful to accommodate his reasonings to common apprehensions: more anxious to merit than acquire fame; he was, from these courses, long unknown to the world; but his reputation at last broke out with a lustre, which scarcely any writer, during his own life-time, had ever before attained. While Newton seemed to draw off the veil from some of the mysteries of nature, he showed at the same time the imperfetions of the mechanical philosophy, and it is evident he aimed at her ultimate secrets to that obscurity in which they ever died and ever will remain. He died in 1727, aged 85.
This age was far from being so favourable to polite literature as to the sciences. Charles, though fond of wit, though possessed himself of a considerable share of it,
though his taste in conversation seems to have been sound and just, served rather to corrupt than improve the poetry and eloquence of his time. When the theatres were open-ated at the restoration, and freedom was again given to pleasing and fine poetry; men, and even the women, were sed on these delicacies with less taste and avidity, and the most and rarest species of wit was received by the court as well as by the people. The productions referreded to proceeded Hooke, who was such a monster of extravagance and folly; so utterly destitute of all reason, or even common sense; that they would be the disgrace of English literature, had not the nation made atonement for its former admiration of them, by the total oblivion to which they are now condemned. The Duke of Buckingham's rehearsal, which exposed these wild productions, seems to be a piece of ridicule carried to excess; yet in reality the copy scarcely equals some of the absurdities which we meet with in the originals.
This severe satire, together with the good sense of the nation, corrected, after some time, the extravagances of the fashionable wit; but the productions of literature still wanted much of that correctness and delicacy which we so greatly admired in the ancients, and in the French writers, their judicious imitators. It was indeed during this period chiefly that that nation left the English behind them, in the productions of the previous century which gave them
branches of polite letters; and acquired a superiority, which the efforts of English writers, during the subsequent age, did more successfully contest with them. The arts were revived, and science in the main was so far from early as into France; and made at first more sensible ad-dances. Spenser, Shakespeare, Bacon, Jonson, were superior to their contemporaries, who flourished in that kingdom. Dryden, Pope, Walton, Etheridge, were at least equal to their contemporaries. The reign of Charles II. which some preposterously represent as our Augustan age, retarded the progress of polite literature in this island; and it was then found, that the immeasurable pompousness, indulged or rather applauded at court, was more destructive to the refined arts, than even the cant, nonse, and enthusiasm of the preceding period.

Most of the celebrated writers of this age remain monuments of genius perverted by indolence and bad taste;
and none more than Dryden, both by reason of the greatness of his talents, and the gross abuse which he made of them.
His plays, excepting a few scenes, are utterly disfigured by a vice of which he was so fond. He made several pieces, and even much of the offspring of haste and hunger: even his fables are ill-chosen tales, conveyed in an incorrect, though spiritu-ed version. Yet, amidst this great number of loose productions, he refused to produce some pieces, there are found some small pieces, his Ode to St. Cuthbert, the tale of Absalom and Ahithophel, and a few more, which discover so great genius, such richness of expression, such calm, and variety of numbers, that they leave us equally full of regret and indignation, on account of the inferiority, or rather great absurdity, of his other writings. He died in 1701, aged 69.
The very name of Rochester is offensive to modest ears;
yet does his poetry discover such energy of style and such propriety of satire, as give ground to imagine what so fine a genius, had he fallen in a more happy age, and had followed better models, was capable of producing. The ancient sagacity, the superiority above all others;
but their freedom no more resembles the leisured ness of Rochester, than the nakedness of an Indian does that of a common prostitute.
Wycherley was ambitious of the reputation of wit and libertinism: and he attained it: he was probably capable of reaching the fame of true comedy and instructive

drama. Otway had a genius finely turned to the pathetic;
but he neither observes strictly the rules of the drama, or understands them. The rules, such as they are, thereby render the comedy of wit and common sense.
By one single piece, the Duke of Buckingham did both great service to his age, and honour to himself. The Earls of Mulgrave, Dorset, and Roscommon, wrote in a good taste, but their productions are either feeble or careless. The Marquis of Halifax discovers a refined genius; and nothing but leisure and an inferior station seem wanting to have procured him eminence in literature.

Of all the considerable writers of this age, Sir William Temple is almost the only one that kept himself altogether unpolluted by that inundation of vice and licentiousness which overwhelmed the nation. The style of this author, though extremely negligent, and even infected with foreign idioms, is agreeable and interesting. That mixture of vanity which appears in his works, is rather a recommendation to them. By means of it, we enter into acquaintance with the character of the author, full of honour and humanity; and fancy that we are engaged, not in the perusal of a book, but in conversation with a companion. He died in 1698, aged 70.

Though Hudibras was published, and probably composed, during the reign of Charles II., Butler may justly, as well as Milton, be thought to belong to the foregoing period. No composition abounds so much as Hudibras in strokes of just and inimitable wit; yet are there many performances which give us greater or greater entertainment on the whole perusal. The allusions in Butler are often dark and far-fetched; and though scarcely any author was ever able to express his thoughts in so few words, he often employs too many thoughts on one subject, and thereby becomes profuse after an unusual manner. It is surprising how much erudition Butler has introduced with so good a grace into a work of pleasantry and humour. Hudibras is perhaps one of the most learned compositions that is to be found in any language. The advantage which the royal cause received from this poem, in exposing the fanaticism and false pretensions of the former parliamentary party, was prodigious. The king himself had so good a taste, as to be highly pleased with the merit of the work, and had even got a great part of it by heart; yet was he either so careless in his temper, or so little endowed with the virtue of liberality, or, more properly speaking, of gratitude, that he allowed the author, a man of virtue and probity, to live in obscurity, and die in want.

Dryden is an instance of a negligence of the same kind. His Absalom sensibly contributed to the victory which the tories obtained over the whigs, after the exclusion of parliaments; yet could not this merit, aided by his great genius, procure him an establishment which might exempt him from the necessity of writing for bread. Otway, though a professed royalist, could not even procure bread by his writings; and he had the singular fate of dying literally of hunger. These incidents throw a great stain on the memory of Charles, who had discernment, loved genius, was liberal of money, but attained not the praise of true generosity.

No. 1.

THE ANGLO-SAXON GOVERNMENT AND MANNERS.

First Saxon government.—Succession of the kings.—The Witenagemot.
The arbitrary.—The several orders of men.—Courts of justice.—Criminal law—Rules of proof.—Military force.—Public revenue.—Value of money.—Manners.

The government of the Germans, and that of all the northern nations, who established themselves on the ruins of Rome, was always extremely free; and those fierce people, accustomed to independence and accustomed to arms, were more guided by persuasion than authority, in the submission which they paid to their princes. The military despotism, which had taken place in the Roman empire, and which, previously to the irruption of those conquerors, had sunk the genius of men, and destroyed every noble principle of science and virtue, was unable to resist the vigorous efforts of a free people; and Europe, as from a new epoch, rekindled her ancient spirit, and shook off the base servitude to arbitrary will and authority under which she had so long laboured. The free constitutions then established, however impaired by the encroachments of succeeding princes, still preserve an air of independence and legal administration, which distinguish the European nations; and if that part of the globe maintain sentiments of liberty, honour, equity, and valour, superior to the rest of mankind, it owes these advantages chiefly to the seeds implanted by those generous barbarians.

First Saxon government. The Saxons, who subdued Britain, as they very well enjoyed great liberty in their own country, obstinately retained that inviolable possession in their new settlement; and they imported into this island the same principles of independence, which they had inherited from their ancestors. The chieftains (for such they were, more properly than kings or princes) who commanded them in those military expeditions, still possessed a very limited authority; and as the Saxons exterminated, rather than subdued, the ancient inhabitants, they were indeed transplanted into a new territory, but preserved unaltered all their civil and military institutions. The language was pure Saxon; even the names of places, which often remain while the tongue entirely changes, were almost all affixed by the conquerors; the manners and customs were wholly German; and the same picture of a fierce and bold liberty, which is drawn by the masterly pencil of Tacitus, will suit those founders of the English government. The king, so far from being invested with arbitrary power, was only considered as the first among the citizens; his authority depended more on his personal qualities than on his station; he was even so far on a level with the people, that a stated price was fixed for his head, and a legal fine was levied upon his murderer, which, though proportionate to his station, and superior to that paid for the life of a subject, was a sensible mark of his subordination to the community.

Succession of the kings. It is easy to imagine, that an independent people, so little restrained by law and cultivated by science, would not be very strict in maintaining a regular succession of their princes. Though they paid great regard to the royal family, and ascribed to it an undisputed superiority, they either had no rule, or none that was steadily observed, in filling the vacant throne; and present convenience, in that emergency, was more attended to than general principles. We are not, however, to suppose that the crown was considered as altogether elective; and that a regular plan was traced by the constitution for supplying, by the suffrages of the people, every vacancy made by the demise of the first magistrate. If any king left a son of an age and capacity fit for government, the young prince naturally stepped into the throne: if he was a minor, his uncle, or the next prince of the blood, was promoted to the government, and left the sceptre to his posterity: any sovereign, by taking previous measures with the leading men, had it greatly in his power to appoint his successor; all these changes, and indeed the ordinary administration of government, required the express concurrence, or at least the tacit acquiescence, of the people; but possession, however obtained, was extremely apt to secure their obedience, and the idea of any right, which was once excluded, was but feeble and imperfect. This is so much the case in all baronies, monarchies, and occurs so often in the history of the Anglo-Saxons, that we cannot consistently entertain any other notion of their government. The idea of an hereditary succession in authority is so natural to men, and is so much fortified by the usual rule in transmitting private possessions, that it must retain a great influence on every society, which does not exclude it by the refinements of a republican constitution. But as there is a material difference between government and private possessions, and every man is not as much qualified for exercising the one, as for enjoying the other, a people, who are not sensible of the general advantages attending a fixed rule, are apt to make great leaps in the succession, and frequently to pass over the person, who, had he possessed the requisite years and abilities, would have been thought entitled to the sovereignty. Thus, these monarchies are not, strictly speaking, either elective or hereditary: and though the destination of a prince may often be followed in appointing his successor, they can as little be regarded as wholly testamentary. The states by their suffrage may sometimes establish a sovereignty; but they more frequently recognise the person whom they find established: a few great men take the lead; the people, overawed and influenced, acquiesce in the government; and the reigning prince, provided he be of the royal family, passes undisputedly for the legal sovereign.

It is confessed, that our knowledge of the Anglo-Saxon history and antiquities is too imperfect to afford us means of determining, with certainty, all the prerogatives of the crown and privileges of the people, or of giving an exact delineation of that government. It is probable, also, that the constitution might be somewhat different in the different kingdoms of the heptarchy, and that it changed considerably during the course of six centuries, which elapsed from the first invasion of the Saxons till the Norman conquest. But most of these differences and changes, with their causes and effects, are unknown to us. It only appears, that at all times, and in all the kingdoms, there was a national council, called a Wittenagemot, or assembly of the wise men, (for that in the import of the term,) whose consent was requisite for enacting laws, and for ratifying the chief acts of public administration. The preambles to all the laws of Ethelbert, Ina, Alfred, Edward the Elder, Athelstan, and Edgar, tell us that there was a 'king's court' or 'law court'; even those to the laws of Canute, though a kind of conqueror, put this matter beyond controversy, and carry proofs everywhere of a limited and legal government, by the concurrence of the ecclesiastics who were the constitutional members of this Wittenagemot. It has not been determined with certainty by antiquaries. It is agreed, that the bishops and abbots were an essential part; and it is also evident, from the tenor of those ancient laws, that the Wittenagemot enacted statutes which regulated the ecclesiastical as well as civil government, and that those dangerous principles, by which the church is totally severed from the state, were hitherto unknown to the Anglo-Saxons. 4 It also appears, that the aldermen, or governors of counties, who, after the Danish times, were often called earls, 4 were admitted into this council, and gave their consent to the public statutes. But besides the prelates and aldermen, there is also mention of other persons, who were members of the Wittenagemot; but who were, is not so clearly ascertained by the laws or the history of that period. The matter would probably be of difficult discussion, even were it examined impartially; but as our modern parties have chosen to do upon this point, the question has been disputed with the greatest obstinacy, and the arguments on both sides have become, on that account, the more captious and deceitful. Our monarchical faction maintain, that those were the judges, or which learned in the law: the popular faction assert them to be representatives of the barons, or what we now call the Commons.

The expressions employed by all ancient historians, in mentioning the Wittenagemot, seem to contradict the latter supposition. The members are almost always called the \\ principes, satrape, opolmati, magneata, proceors terms which signify a supposition aristocratical and excluded from the Commons. The boroughs also, from the low state of commerce, were so small and so poor, and the inhabitants lived in such dependence on the great men, 5 that it seems nowise probable they would be admitted as a part of the nation. We have, however, no other information of what had no share in the governments established by the Franks, Burgundians, and other northern nations; and we may conclude that the Saxons, who remained longer barbarous and independent than others of the British nation, must have adhered to conferring such an extraordinary privilege on trade and industry. The military profession alone was honourable among all those conquerors: the warriors subsisted by their possessions in land: they became considerable by their influence over their vassals, retainers, tenants, and slaves: and it requires strong proof to convince us that they would admit any of a rank so much inferior as the burgesses, to share with them in the legislative authority. Tacitus indeed affirms, that, among the ancient Germans, the consent of the all the members of the community was required in every important deliberation; but he speaks not of representatives; and this ancient practice, mentioned by the Roman historian, could only have place in small tribes, where every citizen might, without inconvenience, be assembled upon any extraordinary emergency. After the principalities became extensive; after the difference of property had formed distinctions more important than those which arose from personal strength and valour, we may conclude, that the national assemblies must have been more limited in their number, and composed only of the more considerable citizens.

But though we must exclude the burgesses, or Commons, from the Wittenagemot, we may suppose, that the prelates, abbots, aldermen, and the judges or privy council. For as all these, excepting some such as were anciently appointed by the king, had there been no other legislative authority, the royal power had been in a great measure absolute, contrary to the tenor of all the historians, and to the practice of all the northern nations. We may therefore conclude, that the more considerable proprietors of land were, without any election, constituent members of the national assembly; there is reason to think that forty hides, or between four and five thousand acres, was the estate requisite for entitling the possessor to this honourable privilege. We find a passage in an ancient author, 6 by which it appears, that a person of very noble birth, even one allied to the crown, was not esteemed a princeps (the term usually employed by the ancient historians) until he had acquired a fortune of that amount. Nor need we imagine that the public council would become disorderly or confused by admitting so great a multitude. The landed property of England was probably in few hands during the Saxon times; at least during the latter part of that period; and as men had hardly any ambition to attend those public councils, there was no danger of the assembly's becoming too numerous for the dispatch of the little business which was brought before them.

It is certain, that, whatever we may determine concerning the constituent members of the Wittenagemot, in whom, with the king, the legislature resided, the Anglo-Saxon government, in the period preceding the Norman conquest, was become extremely aristocratical: the royal authority was very limited; the people, even if admitted to this assembly, were without weight and consideration. We have hints given us in historians, of the great power and riches of particular noblemen: and it could not but happen, after the abolition of the heptarchy, when the king lived at a distance from the great provinces, that the parliament, or national council, which had no share in the governments established by the Franks, Burgundians, and other northern nations; and we may conclude that the Saxons, who remained longer barbarous and independent than others of the British nation, must have adhered to conferring such an extraordinary privilege on trade and industry. The military profession alone was honourable among all those conquerors: the warriors subsisted by their possessions in land: they became considerable by their influence over their vassals, retainers, tenants, and slaves: and it requires strong proof to convince us that they would admit any of a rank so much inferior as the burgesses, to share with them in the legislative authority. * We know of one change not inconsiderable, in the Saxons constitution. The laws (p. 40, former ed.) tell us, in early times, that the persons of the king in name the dukes, earls, aldermen, and sheriffs of the counties, and the tenants on fee, were all the persons of the commons, and appointed men of none capacity in their place. Yet the laws of Edward the Confessor, § 23, expressly, that the hereditary or dukes, and the sheriffs, were chosen by the freemen; and the tenures in freehold, and the duchies in the hand of the king, and where all the freemen was allegiance to the king. It is evident, therefore, that the sheriffs were chosen by the freemen; and the tenures in freehold, and the duchies in the hand of the king, and where all the freemen was allegiance to the king.

1 If it appears to the ancient translators of the Saxons annals and laws, and was a great political, which was an assembly of all the aldermen, and the tenants in freehold, and the tenants in fee; and the prelates and abbots, which was an assembly of all the bishops, abbots, and priests; and the tenants in freehold, which was an assembly of all the freemen; and the tenants in fee, which was an assembly of all the tenants in fee. It is very evident, that the name in Latin, alderman in Saxons, and earl in Dano-Swedish, is taken from the Saxon word earl, which is equal to the Latin earl, earl, and the Italian ercole. 2 The Witenagemot at the account of the great monasteries. 3 See Speller, Gloss. In verbis Parliament. 4 The weight, or the price of an earl's honours, is there fixed at 15,000 pounds, equal in that of the baronies, whereas that of a bishop is 3 2 2 from father to son, and became in a manner hereditary in the families. The circumstances attending the invasions of the Danes would also serve much to increase the power of the principal nobility. Those free-booters made unexpected inroads on all quarters; and there was a necessity that each county should resort to its own forces, and undertake the conduct of its own nobility and its own magistrates. For the same reason that a general war, managed by the united efforts of the whole state, commonly augments the power of the crown; those private wars and inroads turned to the advantage of all the smaller men.

Among that military and turbulent people, so averse to commerce and the arts, and so little inured to industry, justice was very ill administered, and great oppression and violence seem to have prevailed. These disorders would be increased by the exorbitant power of the aristocracy; and would, in their turn, contribute to increase it. Men, not daring to rely on the guardianship of the laws, were obliged to devote themselves to the service of some chieflain, whose orders they followed, even to the disturbance of the government, or the injury of their fellow-citizens, and who afforded them, in return, protection from the insult or injustice of strangers. Hence, we find, by the extracts which Dr. Brady has given us from Domesday, that almost all the inhabitants, even of towns, had placed themselves under the chancellorship of some particular nobleman, whose patronage they purchased by certain payments, and whose protection they considered as their sovereign, more than the king himself, or even the legislature. A client, though a freeman, was supposed so much to belong to his patron, that his murder was obliged by law to pay a fine to the latter, as a compensation for his loss; in like manner as he paid a fine to the master for the murder of his slave. Men who were of a more considerable rank, but not powerful enough, each to support himself under the authority, entered into formal confederacies with each other, and composed a kind of separate community, which rendered itself formidable to all aggressors. Dr. Hickes has preserved a curious Saxon bond of this kind, which he calls a Societate, and which contains many particulars characteristic of the manners and customs of the times. All the associates are there said to be gentlemen of Cambridgeshire, and they swear before the holy relics to observe their confederacy, and to be faithful to each other; they promise to bury any of the associates who dies, in whatever place he had appointed; to contribute to his funeral charges, and to attend at his interment; and whoever is in the last business to pay a fine, as a measure of honey. When any of the associates is in danger, and calls for the assistance of his fellows, they promise, besides flying to his succour, to give information that no, if he be negligent in protecting the person exposed to danger, they engage to levy a fine of one pound upon him; if the president of the society himself be wanting in this particular, he binds himself to pay one pound; unless he has the reasonable excuse of sickness, or of duty to his superior. When any of the associates is murdered, they are to exact eight pounds from the murderer; and if he refuse to pay it, they are to prosecute him for the same at their joint expense. If any of the associates, who happens to be poor, kills a man, the society are to contribute, by a certain proportion, to pay his fine: a mark-a-piece, if the fine be 700 shillings; less if the person killed be a clown or covele; the half of that sum, again, if the murdered person be himself a clown. But where a murder kills a man, wilfully and without provocation, he must himself pay the fine. If any of the associates kill any of his fellows in a like criminal manner, besides paying the usual pecuniary satisfaction, he must pay eight pounds to the society, in addition to the fine, at which they bind themselves, under penalty of one pound, never to eat or drink with him, except in the presence of the king, bishop, or alderman. There are other regulations to protect themselves and their servants from all injuries, to revenge snubs, and to prevent their giving abusive language to each other; and the fine, which they engage to pay for this last offense, is a measure of honey.

It is not yet disputed but a confederacy of this kind must have been a great source of friendship and attachment; when men lived in perpetual danger from enemies, robbers, and oppressors, and received protection chiefly from their personal valour, and from the assistance of their friends or patrons. As armies were then more violent, connections were also more intimate, whether voluntary or derived from blood; the most remote degree of propinquity was regarded: an indelible memory of benefits was preserved: severe vengeance was taken for injuries, both from a point of honour, and as the best means of future security; and the civil union being weak, many private engagements were contracted in order to supply its place, and to procure men that safety which the laws and their own inoffensive were not afofe able to assure to them.

On the whole, notwithstanding the seeming liberty, or rather licentiousness, of the Anglo-Saxons, the great body, even of the free citizens, in those ages, really enjoyed much less true liberty, than where the execution of the laws is the most severe, and where subjects are reduced to the strictest subordination and dependence on the civil magistracy. In those times they were only the possessors of what is called that liberty. Men must guard themselves at any price against insults and injuries; and where they receive not protection from the laws and magistrates, they will seek it by submission to superiors, and by belonging in some private confederacy which acts under the direction of a powerful leader. And thus all anarchy is the immediate cause of tyranny, if not over the state, at least over many of the individuals of which it consists. Security was provided by the Saxon laws to all members of the Wittengemot, both in going and returning, except they were notorious thieves and robbers.

The German Saxons, as the other nations of that continent, were divided into three sorts of men, the noble, the free, and the slaves. This distinction they brought over with them into Britain.

The nobles were called thanes; and were of two kinds, the king's thanes and lesser thanes. The latter seem to have been dependent on the former; and to have received lands, for which they paid rent, services, or attendance in peace and war. We know of no title which raised any one to this rank, but to duty, and to the personal session of land. The former was always much regarded by all the German nations, even in their most barbarous state; and as the Saxon nobility, having little credit, could scarcely retire from their estates, and as the Commons had little trade or industry by which they could accumulate riches, these two ranks of men, even though they were not separated by positive laws, might remain long distinct, and the noble families continue many ages in opulence and splendour. There were no middle ranks of men, that could gradually mix with their superiors, and insensibly procure to themselves honour and distinction. If by any extraordinary accident a mean person acquired riches, a circumstance so singular made him known and remarked; he became the object of envy, as well as of indignation, to all the nobles; he would have great difficulty to defend what he had acquired; and he would find it impossible to get a hold of any wealth, except by courting the patronage of some great chieflain, and paying a large price for his safety.

There are two statutes among the Saxon laws which seem calculated to confound and destroy the ranks of men; that of Allodium, and that by which a merchant, who had made three long sea-voyages on his own account, was entitled to the quality of thane; and that of the same prince, by which a coelee or husbandman, who had been able to purchase five hides of land, and had a chapel, a kitchen, a hall, and a ball, was raised to the same distinction as a villein or husbandman, by which a meretricious or criminal outcome, the latter of which the law could never overcome the reigning prejudices; the distinction between noble and base blood would still be indelible; and the well-born thanes would entertain the highest regard for the peasants among the vagabonds. Though we are not informed of any of these circumstances by ancient historians, they are so much founded on the nature of things, that we may admit them as a necessary and inevitable consequence of the situation of the kingdom during those ages.

The cities appear by Domesday-book to have been at the conquest little better than villages. York itself, though it was always the second, at least the third, city in England, and was the capital of a great province, which never was thoroughly united with the rest, contained then but 1418 families. Malmsbury tells us, that the great distinction between the Anglo-Saxon nobility, and the French or Norman, was, that the latter built magnificent and stately castles; whereas the former consumed their immense fortunes in riot and hospitality, and in mean houses. We may thence infer, that the arts in general were much less adored by the Anglo-Saxons than by the French; idle servants and retainers lived about the great families; and as these, even in France, were powerful enough to disturb the execution of the laws, we may judge of the authority acquired by the aristocracy in England. When Edward the Confessor wished to remove the nobility, he was prevented from it by the rest of his barons, and the barons were removed from all parts its husaries, or housecarles and retainers, and thereby constrained his sovereign to accept of the conditions which he was pleased to impose upon him.

The lower rank of freemen were denominated coeles or householders among the Anglo-Saxons; and, where they were industrious, they were chiefly employed in husbandry: whence a coelee and a husbandman become in a manner synonymous terms. They cultivated the farms of the nobility or thanes, for which they paid rent; and they seem to have been removable at pleasure. For there is little mention of leases among the Anglo-Saxons: the pride of the nobility, together with the general ignorance of writing, must have rendered those contracts very rare, and must have kept the husbandmen in a dependent condition. The rents of farms were then chiefly paid in kind. 7

The most numerous rank by far in the community seems to have been the slaves or villains, who were the property of their lords, and were consequently incapable, themselves, of possessing any property. Dr. Brady assures us from a survey of Domesday-book, that in all the counties of England, the number of freemen or freeholders and the number of tenant families were the same, but that the thanes and noble families, who possessed the greater property, were caught by them, and that the husbandmen, and still more the serfs, who were tenants that could not be removed at pleasure, were very few in comparison. This was not the case with the German nations, as far as we can collect from the account given us by Tacitus. The perpetual wars in the Heptarchy, and the depredations of the Danes, seem to have been the cause of this great alteration with the Anglo-Saxons. Freemen taken in battle, or curtailed off in the frequent inroads, were then reduced to slavery; and became, by right of war, entirely at the disposal of their lords. Great property in the nobles, especially if joined to an irregular administration of justice, naturally favours the practice of the aristocracy, and if at all, the practice of slavery be admitted, and has become very common. The nobility not only possess the influence which always attend riches, but also the power which the laws gave them over their slaves and villains. It then becomes difficult, and almost impossible, for a private man to remain altogether free and independent.

There were two kinds of slaves among the Anglo-Saxons: household slaves, after the manner of the ancients, and personal or private retainers. These latter resembled the serfs, which are at present to be met with in Poland, Denmark, and some parts of Germany. The power of a master over his slaves was not unlimited among the Anglo-Saxons, as it was among their ancestors. If a man beat out his slave's eye, or teeth, the slave recovered his liberty: a if he killed him, he paid a fine to the king; provided the slave died within a day or the wound or the bite otherwise it passed unheated.

The selling of themselves or children to slavery was always the practice among the German nations; and was continued by the Anglo-Saxons. 8

The great lords and nobles among the Anglo-Saxons possessed a criminal jurisdiction within their territories, and could punish, without appeal, any thieves or robbers whom they caught there. This institution must have had a very contrary effect to that which was intended, and must have procured robbers a sure protection on the lands of such noblemen as did not sincerely mean to discourage crimes and violence.

But though the general strain of the Anglo-Saxon government, as we have seen, had become aristocratical, there were still considerable remains of the ancient democracy, which were not indeed sufficient to protect the lowest of the people, without the patronage of some great lord, but might give security, and even some degree of dignity, to inferior individuals. The administration of justice, in particular, by the courts of the decennary, the hundred, and the county, was well calculated to defend general liberty, and to restrain the power of the nobles, or the county courts, or sheriffs, who the freeholders were assembled twice a-year, and received appeals from the inferior courts. They there decided all causes, ecclesiastical as well as civil; and the bishop, together with the alderman or earl, presided over them. The affair was determined in a summary manner, without much pleading, formality, or delay, by a majority of voices; and the bishop and alderman had no further authority than to keep order among the freeholders, and interpose with their judgment. 9 Where justice was denied during three sessions by the hundred, and then by the county court, there lay an appeal to the king's court; but this was not practised on slight occasions. The alderman received a third of the fines levied in those courts; and as most of the punishments were then pecuniary, this prepossession formed a considerable part of the profits belonging to his office. The two-thirds also, which went to the king, made no contemptible part of the public revenue. Any freeholder was fined wholesale-sold as the freeholder of the future, if he had not been caught by the thanes, or if his family were mentioned, which, at the rate at five persons in a family, was an inconsiderable fine. 10

As the extreme ignorance of the age made deeds and writings very rare, the county or hundred court was the place where the most remarkable civil transactions were finished, in order to preserve the memory of them, and prevent all future disputes. Here testaments were promulgated, slaves manumitted, bargains of sale concluded; and sometimes, for greater security, the most considerable of these deeds were inserted in the latest leaves of the parish Bible, which thus became a kind of register too sacred to be falsified. It was not unusual to add to the deed an imprecation on all such as should be guilty of that crime. Among a people, who lived in so simple a manner as the Anglo-Saxons, the personal power had laws of greater importance than the legislative. There were few or no taxes imposed by the states; there were few statutes enacted; and the nation was less governed by laws than by customs, which admitted a great latitude of interpretation.

tion. Though it should, therefore, be allowed that the Wittgenstein was altogether composed of the principal nobility, the county courts, where all the freeholders were admitted, and which regulated all the daily occurrences of life, formed a wide basis for the government, and were ever controllable checks on the aristocracy. But there was another power still more important than either the judicial or legislative; to wit, the power of injuring or serving by immediate force and violence, for which it is difficult to obtain redress in courts of justice. In all extensive governments, the executive of the laws is feeble, this power naturally falls into the hands of the principal nobility; and the degree of it which prevents, cannot be determined so much by the public statutes, as by small incidents in history, by particular customs, and sometimes by the reason and nature of things. The highlands of Scotland have long been entituled by law to every privilege of British subjects; but it was not till very lately that the common people could in fact enjoy these privileges.

The powers of all the members of the Anglo-Saxon government are disputed among historians and antiquaries:
the extreme obscurity of the subject, even though fiction has never entered into the question, would naturally have begotten those controversies. But the great influence of the lords over their slaves and tenants, the dominion of the burghers, the total want of a middling rank of men,
the extent of the monarchy, the loose execution of the laws,
the liberty of orders and customs of the subject:
all these circumstances evince that the Anglo-Saxon government became at last extremely aristocratical; and the events, during the period immediately preceding the conquest, confirm this inference or conjecture.

Both the punishments inflicted by the Criminal Law. Anglo-Saxon courts of judicature, and the methods of proof employed in all causes, appear somewhat singular, and are very different from those which prevail at present among all civilized nations.

We must conceive that the ancient Germans were little removed from the original state of nature: the social conferences were more natural than civil; they who had chiefly in view the means of attack or defence against public enemies, not those of protection against their fellow-citizens; their possessions were so slender and so equal, that they were not exposed to great danger; and the natural bravery of the people made every man trust to himself, and to his particular friends, for his defence or vendange. This defect in the political union drew much closer the knot of particular confederacies: an insult upon one man was regarded by all his kindred and associates as a common injury: they were bound by honour as well as by a sense of common interest, to revenge his death, or any violence which he had suffered: they retaliated, not by the law, but by private vengeance; and if the murder was as murder, the murderer was obliged to pay the master of a slave or renal a sum equivalent to the loss of his slave, as a compensation.

This was called the Manhred. See Spell.

after renouncing him, receive him into their house, or give him assistance, they are liable to the king, and are involved in the feud. If the kindred of the murdered person take revenge on any but the criminal himself, after he is abandoned by his kindred, all their property is forfeited, and they are deprived of the benefits of the kindred of all his friends.

It is also ordained, that the fine for murder shall never be remitted by the king; and that no criminal shall be killed who flies to the church, or any of the king's towns; and it was also declared, that he house shall give no protection to murderers, till they have satisfied the church by their penance, and the kindred of the deceased, by making compensation. The method appointed for transacting this took his stolen coin for forty shillings, and the latter was obliged to show the tracks out of it, or pay their value. Rebellion, to whatever excess it was carried, was not capital, but might be redeemed by a sum of money.

The legislators, knowing it impossible to prevent all disorders, only imposed a higher fine on breaches of the peace commited in the king's court, or before an alderman or bishop. An alehouse too seems to have been considered as a privileged place; and any quarrels that arose there were more severely punished than elsewhere. If the manner of punishing crimes among the Anglo-Saxons appear singular, the proofs were not less so; and were also the natural result of the practice of the kindred. Whatever was considered as concerning the usual truth and sincerity of men who live in a rude and barbarous state, there is much more falsehood, and even perjury among them, than among civilized nations: virtue, which is nothing but a more enlarged and more cultivated reason, never flourishes to any degree, unless it is founded on steady principles of honour, except where a good education becomes general; and where men are taught the pernicious consequences of vice, treachery, and self-interest.

By the laws of the Anglo-Saxons, a man might be killed and his goods taken, if he had killed another, if that man was a relation of his, or had committed murder on the ground of any passion.

In the Anglo-Saxon laws, there were severe penalties for murder, and the murderer was liable to death. The method of punishing murder was by a fine, and the punishment was in proportion to the amount of the fine.

The Anglo-Saxons had a system of justice which was based on the principle of retribution. If a man was killed, the murderer was liable to death, and the estate of the deceased was forfeited. If the murderer was not caught, the estate of the deceased was taken over by the king, and the money was paid to the next of kin.

eleven compurgators. He next took two pieces of wood, one of which was marked with the sign of the cross, and wrapping both up in wool, he placed them on the altar, censing a hole in front. As soon as the cross had entered the success of the experiment, a priest, or, in his stead, some inexperienced youth, took up one of the pieces of wood, and if he happened upon that which was marked with the figure of the cross, the person was pronounced innocent; if otherwise, guilty. This practice, as it arose from superstition, was abolished by it in France. The Emperor, Lewis the Debonnaire, prohibited that method of trial, not because it was uncertain, but lest that sacred figure should be profaned, should be prostituted in common disputes and controversies.

The ordeal was another established method of trial among the Anglo-Saxons. It was practised either by boiling water or red-hot iron. The former was appropriated to the common people; the latter to the nobility. The water or iron was consecrated by many prayers, masses, fastings, and exorcisms, after which the person accused rather took up a stone sunk in the water, to a certain depth, or carried the iron to a certain distance; and his hand being wrapped up, and the covering sealed for three days, if there appeared, on examining it, no marks of burning, he was pronounced innocent; if otherwise, guilty. The water or the iron was different; if the person was thrown into consecrated water; if he swam, he was guilty; if he sunk, innocent. It is difficult for us to conceive how any innocent person could ever escape by the trial, or any guilty person be convicted by it. But this was a more usage admirably calculated for allowing every criminal to escape who had confidence enough to try it. A consecrated cake, called a corned, was produced; which if the person could swallow and digest, he was pronounced innocent.

Military force.

The feudal law, if it had place at all among the Anglo-Saxons, which is doubtful, was not certainly extended over all the landed property, and was not so close a code of liens, leases, wardship, marriage, and other burdens, which were inseparable from it in the kingdoms of the continent. As the Saxons expelled, or almost entirely destroyed, the ancient Britons, they planted themselves in this island on the same footing with their ancestors in Germany, and found no occasion for the feudal institutions, which were calculated to maintain a kind of standing army, always in readiness to supress any insurrection among the conquered people. There was no rent for passing the state in England lay equally upon all the land; and it was usual for every five hides to equip a man for the service. The trinoda necessitas, as it was called, or the burden of military service, of repairing highways and supporting bridges, was inseparable from landed property, even though it belonged to the church or monasteries, unless exempted by a particular charter. The peasants or husbandmen were provided with arms, and were obliged to take their turn in military duty. There were computed to be 243,600 hides in England; consequently the ordinary military force of the kingdom consisted of 48,720 men; though, no doubt, on extraordinary occasions, a greater number might be assembled. The king and nobility had some military tenants, who were called Sítican-men. And there were some lands annexed to the office of aldermen, and to other offices; but these probably were not extended, as were possession only, turning pleasure, as in the commencement of the feudal law in other countries of Europe.

Public revenue.

The revenue of the king seems to have consisted chiefly in his demesnes, which were large; and in the tolls and imports which he probably levied at discretion on the boroughs and seaports that lay within his demesnes. He could not alienate any part of the crown lands, even to religious uses, without the consent of the states. Danegeld was a land-tax of a shilling a hearth; for the payment of the sums exacted by the Danes, or for putting the kingdom in a posture of defence against those invaders.

The Saxons pound, as likewise that which was coined for some centuries after the conquest, was near three times the weight of our present money: there were forty-eight shillings in the pound, and five pence in a shilling; consequently a Saxon shilling was near a fifth heavier than ours, and a Saxon penny near three times as heavy. As there were sometimes in different times, compared to commodities, there are some, though not very certain, means of computation. A sheep, by the laws of Athelstan, was estimated at a shilling; that is, fifteen pence of our money. The fleece was two-thirds of the value of the whole sheep, much above its present estimation; and the reason probably was, that the Saxons, like the ancients, were little acquainted with any clothing but what was made of wool. Silk and cotton were quite unknown; linen was not much used. An ox was computed at six times the value of a sheep; a cow at four. If we suppose that the cattle in that age, from the defects in husbandry, were not so large as they are at present in England, we may think that money at that time was three times of greater value. A horse was valued at about thirty-six shillings of our money, or thirty Saxon shillings; a mare a third less. A man at three pounds. The board wages of a craftsman were three shillings a week. But the wages of a journeyman were taken together with a cow's pasture in summer, and an ox's in winter. William of Malmesbury mentions it as a remarkably high price, that William Rufus gave fifteen marks for a horse, or about thirty pounds of our present money. Between the years 993 and 1000, Edward I. brought as sale of land for about 118 shillings of present money. This was little more than a shilling an acre, which indeed appears to have been the usual price, as we may learn from other accounts. A halfpenny was sold for a very shilling of the year 966. The value of an ox in King Ethelred's time was between seven and eight shillings; a cow about six shillings. Gervas of Tilbury says, that in Henry I.'s time, bread which would suffice a hundred men for a day was rated at three shillings, or a shilling of that age; for it is thought that soon after the conquest, a pound sterling was divided into twenty shillings: a sheep was rated at a shilling, and so of other things in proportion. In Athelstan's time, the value of a pound of salt was fifteen shillings. The tenants of Shireburn were obliged, at their choice, to pay either sixpence or four hens. About 1232, the Abbot of St. Alban's, going on a journey, hired seven hand-some stout horses and a coach of building, to carry him and his household, to pay the owner 30 shillings a-piece of our present money. It is to be remarked, that in all ancient times the raising of corn, especially wheat, being a species of manufactures, that commodity always bore a higher price, compared to cattle, than it does in our times. The Story of Chronicl tells us, that in the reign of Edward the Con- fessor there was the most terrible famine ever known; insomuch that a quarter of wheat rose to sixty pence, or fifteen shillings of our present money. Consequently it was as dear as if it now cost seven pounds ten shillings. This much exceeds the great famine to the end of Queen Elizabeth; when a quarter of wheat was sold for four pounds. Money in this last period was nearly of the same value as in our time. These severe famines are a certain proof of bad husbandry.

On the whole, there are three things to be considered, wherever a sum of money is mentioned in ancient times. First, the change of demonetation, by which a third weight has been reduced to the third part of its ancient weight in silver. Secondly, the change in value by the greater plenty of money, which has reduced the same weight of silver to ten times less value compared to commodities; and consequently a pound sterling to the thritieth part of the ancient value. This is the reason people, both abroad and at home, in our times; and in the same manner that a sum, a hundred thousand pounds, for instance, is at present more difficult to levy in a small state, such as Bavaria, and can produce greater effects on such a small community, than on England. This last difference is not easy to be calculated: but allowing that England has now six times more industry, and three times more people than it had at the conquest, and for some reign after that period, we are upon that supposition to conceive, taking all circumstances together, every sum of money mentioned by historians, as if it were multiplied more than a hundred-fold above a sum of the same denomination at present.

In the Saxon times, land was divided equally among all the male children of the deceased, according to the custom of Gavelkind. The practice of entail is to be found in those times. 1 Land was chiefly of two kinds, hackland, or land held by book or charter, which was regarded as full landlordship, and not to be touched by his tenants; and folkland, or the land held by the cottiers and common people, who were removable at pleasure, and were indeed only tenants during the will of their lords.

The first attempt which we find in England to separate the ecclesiastical from the civil jurisdiction, was that of Edward, by which all disputes among the clergy were to be carried before the bishop. 2 The penances were often very severe; but as a man could bow them off with money, or make substitutes to perform them, they lay easy upon the rich. 3

Manners.

With regard to the manners of the Anglo-Saxons, we can say little; but that they were in general rude uncultivated people, ignorant of letters, unskilled in the mechanical arts, untamed to submission under law and government, addicted to intemperance, riot, and disorder. Their best quality was their military courage, which yet was not supported by discipline or conduct. Their want of fidelity to the prince, or to any trust reposed in them, appears strongly in the history of their later periods; and that want of humanity in all their actions. Even the Norman historians, notwithstanding the low state of the arts and sciences of the time, described them as barbarians, when they mention the invasion made upon them by the Duke of Normandy. 4 The conquest put the people in a situation of receiving slowly, from abroad, the improvements of art and civilization; and of correcting their rough and licentious manners.

No. II.

THE FEUDAL AND ANGLO-NORMAN GOVERNMENT AND MANNERS.

The feudal law is the chief foundation, both of the political government and of the jurisprudence established by the Normans in England. Our subject therefore requires, that we should form a just idea of this law, in order to explain the state, as well of that kingdom, as of all other kingdoms of Europe, which, during those ages, were governed by similar institutions. And though I am sensible that I must here repeat many observations and reflections which have been communicated by others; yet, as every book, agreeably to the observation of a great historian, 5 should be as complete as possible within itself, and should never refer, for any thing material, to other books, it will be necessary, in this place, to deliver a short plan of that prodigious fabric, which, for several centuries, preserved such a mixture of liberty and oppression, order and anarchy, as it never was experienced in any other age, or any other part of the world.

After the northern nations had subdued Origin of the the provinces of the Roman empire, they were obliged to establish a system of government, which might secure their conquests as well against the revolt of their numerous subjects, who remained in the provinces, as from the inroads of other tribes, who might be tempted to ravage and destroy their new acquisitions. The great change of circumstances made them here depart from those institutions which prevailed among them, while they remained in the forests of Germany; yet it was still natural for them to retain, in their present settlement, as much of their ancient customs as was compatible with their new situation.

The German governments, being more a confederacy or independent warriors, than a civil subjection, derived their principal force from many inferior and voluntary associations, which individuals formed under a particular head or chieftain, and which it became the highest point of honour to maintain with inviolable fidelity. The glory of the chief consisted in the number, the bravery, and the zealous attachment of his followers; the duty of the followers was supposed to be performed, they should accompany their chief in all wars and dangers, and that they should fight and perish by his side, and that they should esteem his renown or his favour a sufficient reward for all the services they rendered to themselves. Such a thing was nothing but a great chieftain, who was chosen from among the rest, on account of his superior valor or dignity; and who derived his power from the voluntary association or attachment of the other chieftains.

When a tribe, governed by these ideas, and actuated by these principles, subdued a large territory, they found, though it was necessary to keep themselves in a military posture, they could neither remain united in a body, nor take up their homes in one country, but they distributed their several parts and their inhabitants in various garrisons, and that their manners and institutions departed from the customary as the various situations, or even the customs, or those towns, or even the customs, or even the provinces of their former states. The devastations inseparable from such violent conquests, rendered it impracticable for them to levy taxes payable for the support of the troops; and their revenue was to be supported by the tributes paid them by the districts of the conquered country, or by the life of the camp or garrison, or by the division among them of the spoil taken by the conquest.

They seized, therefore, such a portion of the conquered lands as appeared necessary; they assigned a share for the maintenance of their principal garrisons; they distributed the rest, to the several parts of the provinces, or to those parts which had, by their military service, the most merit; and the people, who were at liberty to take up their homes wherever they pleased, and to continue at home, or to remove abroad; this was always ready, on any emergency, the interests and honour of the community. We are not to imagine, that all the conquered lands were seized by the northern conquerors; or that the whole of the land thus seized was subjected to their jurisdiction. This supposition is confuted by the history of all the nations on the continent. Even the idea given us of the German manners by the Roman historian, may be considered as little more than a factitious invention. The people of the north never had any such system of domicile, as we have described, nor ever engaged in any such operation as that which was performed for the good pleasure of their sovereign. Though the northern chieftains accepted of lands, which, being considered as a kind of military pay, might be resumed at the will of the king or general; they also took possession of estates, which, being hereditary and independent, enabled them to maintain a constant chivalric liberty, and in support of the idea of impunity thus necessarily occasioned the extension of the feudal: the kingdoms of Europe were universally divided into baronies, and these into inferior fefts: and the attachment of the vassals to their lords, which is an essential part of the German manners, was still supported by the same causes from which it at first arose; the necessity of mutual protection, and the continued intercourse, between the head of the family and the vassal.

But there was another circumstance which corroborated these feudal dependencies, and tended to connect the vassals with their superior lord by an indisissible bond of union. The northern conquerors, as well as the more early Greeks and Romans, embraced a policy, which was unavoidable to all nations that have made sudden advances in refinement; they everywhere united the civil jurisdiction with the military power. Law, in its commencement, was not an intricate science, and was more governed by maxims of equity, which seem obvious to common sense, than by numerous and subtle principles, applied to a variety of cases by profound reasonings from analogy. An officer, originally the servant of the king, was able to determine all legal controversies which could occur within the district committed to his charge; and his decisions were the most likely to meet with a prompt and ready obedience, from men who respected his person, and were accustomed to his authority. The profit arising from punishments, which were then chiefly pecuniary, was another reason for his desiring to retain the judicial power; and when his fief became hereditary, this authority, which was essential to it, was also transmitted with his posterity. The courts and other magistrates, whose power was merely official, were tempted, in imitation of the feudal lords, whom they resembled in so many particulars, to arrogate their dignities and hereditary; and in the decline of the regal power, they found no difficulty in making good their pretensions. After this manner the vast fabric of feudal subordination became quite solid and comprehensive; it formed every where an essential part of the political constitution; and the Norman and other barons, who followed the fortunes of William, were so accustomed to it that they could scarcely form an idea of any other species of civil government.

The Saxons, who conquered England, as they exterminated the ancient inhabitants, and thought themselves secured by the sea against new invaders, found it less requisite to maintain themselves in a military posture: the quantity of land which they annexed to offices seems to have been of small value; and for that reason continued the longer in its original situation, and was always possessed during pleasure by those who were intrusted with the command. These conditions were too precarious to satisfy the Norman barons, who enjoyed more independent possessions and jurisdictions in their own country; and William was obliged, in the new distribution of land, to copy the tenures, which were now become universal on the continent. England of a sudden became a feudal kingdom; and received all the advantages, and was exposed to all the inconveniences, incident to that species of civil polity.

According to the principles of the feudal law, the king was the supreme lord of the landed property: all possessors who enjoyed...

Defence of the king and kingdom. But besides these military services, which were usual, there were others imposed of a civil nature, which were more constant and durable.

The northern nations had no ideas, that any man, trained up to a succession to his barony or governance, could discharge his duties without his own consent, by the absolute will of another; or that the administration of justice was ever to be exercised by the private opinion of any one magistrate, without his consent. Such was the case of the state; and as these inquisitions might induce them to check his arbitrary and iniquitous decisions. The king, therefore, when he found it necessary to demand any service of his barons or chief tenants, beyond what was due by their tenures, was obliged to assent to the same, as an evidence of their obedience; and as these inquisitions did not oblige them to return upon him, and that others should undergo the burden in his stead. The king, on the other hand, was usually anxious, for several reasons, that the assembly of the barons should be full at every stated or casual meeting: this attendance was the chief halter of their subordination to his crown, and drew them from that independence which they were apt to affect in their own castles and mansions; and where the meeting was thin or ill attended, its determinations had less authority, and commanded not so ready an obedience from the whole community.

The case was the same with the barons in their courts, as with the king in the supreme council of the nation. It was requisite to assemble the vassals, in order to determine by their vote any question which regarded the barony; and they sat along with the chief in all trials, whether civil or criminal, which occurred within the limits of their jurisdiction. They were bound to pay suit and attendance at the courts of their lord; and as their tenure was military, and consequently honorable, they were admitted into his society, and partook of his friendship.

Thus, a kingdom was considered only as a great barony, and a baron as a small kingdom. The barons were peers to each other on national occasions; and, in some degree, companions to the king: the vassals were peers to each other in the court of barony, and companions to their baron.

But though this resemblance so far took place, the vassals, by the natural course of things, universally, in the feudal constitutions, fell into a greater subordination under the baron, than the baron himself under his sovereign; and the higher governments had a necessary and inflammatory tendency to augment the power of the nobles. The great chief, residing in his county-seat, where he was commonly allowed to fortify, lost, in a great measure, his connection or acquaintance with the prince; and added daily strength to the court at the baron's seat, as the seat of the barony. They received from him education in all military exercises: his hospitality invited them to live and enjoy society in his hall: their leisure, which was great, made them spend it in his sports; and where they partook of his country sports and amusements: they had no means of gratifying their ambition but by making a figure in his train: his favour and countenance was their greatest honor: their companionship at his table was their greatest protection, both in the controversies which occurred with other vassals, and, what was more material, in the daily ills and injuries which were committed by the neighbouring barons. During the time of general war, the sovereign, who marched at the head of his armies, and was the great protector of the state, always acquired some sway, which he might be tempted to abuse, in view of the maxims of peace and tranquility: but the loose police, incident to the feudal constitutions, maintained a perpetual, though secret hostility, between the several members of the state; and the vassals found no reserve of community against the injuries to which they were continually exposed, but by closely adhering to their chief, and falling into a submissive dependence upon him.

If the feudal government was so little favourable to the true liberty even of the baronial vassal, it was still more destructive of the independence and security of the other members of the state, or what, in a proper sense, we call the people. A great part of them were serfs, and lived in a state of absolute slavery or servitude: the other inhabitants of the country paid their rents in services, which were in a great measure arbitrary; and they could expect no redress of injuries, in a court of baron, from men who thought they had a right to oppress them. The state of the great barons was almost entirely subjected to the absolute will of their master. The languishing state of commerce kept the inhabitants poor and contemptible; and the political institutions were calculated to render that poverty perpetual. The barons and gentry, living in rustic plenty and hospitality, gave no encouragement to the arts, and had no demand for any of the more elaborate manufactures: every profession was held in contempt but that of arms: and if any merchant or manufacturer rose by industry and frugality to a degree of opulence, he found himself but the more exposed to injuries, from the envy and avowdity of the military nobles.

These concurrence causes gave the feudal governments so strong a bias towards aristocracy, that the royal authority was extremely eclipsed in all the European states; and, instead of dreading the growth of monarchical power, we might rather expect, that the community would every where crumble into so many independent baronies, and lose the political union by which they were cemented. In elective monarchies, the event was commonly answerable to this expectation; and the barons, gaining ground on every vacancy of the throne, raised themselves almost to a state of sovereignty, and sacrificed to their power both the rights of the crown and the liberties of the people. This was the case in England, where the barons had a perpetual right of consultation, which was not so easily subverted; and there were several causes which still maintained a degree of influence in the hands of the sovereign.

The greatest baron could never lose view entirely of those principles of the feudal constitution which bound him, as a vassal, to submission and fealty towards his prince; because he was every moment obliged to have recourse to those principles, in exacting fealty and submission from his own vassals. These lesser barons, finding that the annihilation of royal authority left them exposed, without protection, to the insults and injuries of more potent neighbours, naturally adhered to the crown, and promoted the execution of general and equal laws. The people had, in this case, a stronger interest to desire the grandeur of the sovereign; and the king, being the legal magistrate, who suffered by every internal convulsion or oppression, and who regarded the great nobles as his immediate rivals, assumed the salutary office of protecting and repressing the commons. Besides the prerogatives with which the law invested him, his large demesnes and numerous retainers rendered him, in one sense, the greatest baron in his kingdom; and, as such, he had a political advantage, (for his situation required these advantages,) he was commonly able to preserve his authority, and maintain his station as head of the community, and the chief fountain of law and justice, and attempt to restore it.

The first kings of the Norman race were favoured by another circumstance, which preserved them from the
The ecclesiastics of their barons. They were generally of a conquering army, which was obliged to continue in a military posture, and to maintain great subordination under their leader, in order to secure themselves from the ravages of those enemies, who despised the wealth and the properties and privileges. But though this circumstance supported the authority of William and his immediate successors, and rendered them extremely absolute, it was by no means the Norman方式进行, with a crown to recognize their vassals, tenants, and slaves. And the immense fortunes which the Conqueror had bestowed on his chief captains, served to support the independence, and make them formidable to their sovereigns.

He gave, for instance, to Hugh de Abernies, his sister's son, the whole county of Chester, which he erected into a palatinate, and rendered by his grant almost independent of the crown. Robert, Earl of Mortaigne, had 973 manors and lordships; Allan, Earl of Brittany and Richmond, 442: Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, 439; Geoffrey, Bishop of Coutances, 280: Walter Giffard, Earl of Buckingham, 107: William, Earl Warrenne, 296, besides 28 towns or hamlets in Yorkshire: Violence, 81: Roger Bigod, 123: Robert, Earl of Eu, 119: Roger Mortimer, 132, besides several hamlets: Robert de Suffolk, 150: Walter de Ely,Earl of Hereford, 46: Simon, 118: Richard de Clare, 171: Hugh de Beauchamp, 47: Baldwin de Redver, 164: Henry de Ferrars, 222: William de Percy, 119: Norman d'Arcey, 33: Sir Henry Speed, 34: William Marshal, 280. There were not, in the Conqueror's time, above sixty-six proprietors of land. Men, possessed of such princely revenues and jurisdictions, could not long be retained in the rank of subjects. The great Earl Warrenne, in a subsequent reign, when he was questioned concerning his right to the lands which he possessed, drew his sword, which he produced as his title; adding, that William the Bastard did not conquer the kingdom itself, but the barons; that he was the ancestor of the rest, were joint adventurers in the enterprise.

The supreme legislative power of England was vested in the king and great council, or what was afterwards called the parliament. It was not doubted but the archbishops, bishops, and most considerable abbots were constituent members of this council. They sat by a double title: by prescription, as having always possessed that prerogative, through the whole Saxon period, from the first establishment of Christianity; and by their right of baronage, as holding of the king in capite, by military service. These two titles of the prelates were never accurately distinguished. When the usurpations of the English kings and barons took place, such as bishops and abbots affect a separate dominion, and regard their seat in parliament as a degradation of their episcopal dignity; the king insisted, that they were byrons, and, on that account, obliged, by the general principles of the feudal law, to attend on him in his great councils. Yet there still remained some practices, which supposed their title to be derived merely from ancient possession: when a bishop was elected, he sat in parliament before the king had made him restitution of his temporalities; and during the vacancy of a see, the guardian of the spiritualities was summoned to attend along with the bishops.

The barons were another constituent part of the great council of the nation. These held immediately of the crown by a military tenure: they were the most honourable members of the state, and had a right to be consulted in all public deliberations: they were the immediate vassals of the crown, and owed as a service their attendance in the court of their supreme lord. A resolution taken without their consent was likely to be but ill executed; and no determination of any cause or controversy among them had any validity, where the vote and advice of the body did not concur. The dignity of earl or count was official and territorial, as well as hereditary; and as all the earls were also barons, they were considered as military vassals of the crown, were admitted in that capacity into the general council, and formed the most honourable and powerful branch of it.

But there was another class of the immediate military tenants of the crown, no less, or probably more, numerous than the barons, the Norman magnates, by kindred, wealth, and influence, were exempted from these, however inferior in power or property, held by a tenure which was equally honourable with that of the others. A barony was commonly composed of several knights' fees; and though the number seems not to have been exactly fixed, seldom, according to the ancient Hydes of land, where a man held the king only one or two knights' fees, he was still an immediate vassal of the crown, and as such had a right to a seat in the general councils. But as this attendance was usually esteemed a burden, and one too great for a man of slender fortune to bear constantly; it is probable, that, though he had a title, if he pleased, to be admitted, he was not obliged, by any penalty, like the barons, to pay a regular attendance. All the immediate military tenants of the crown amounted not fully to 700, when Doomsday book was framed; and as the members were well pleased, on any pretext, to excuse themselves from attendance, the number of those who could become too numerous for the despatch of public business.

So far the nature of a general council, or The Commons, of ancient parliament, is determined without any doubt. This body of the nation seems to be with regard to the Commons, or the representatives of counties and boroughs; whether they were also, in more early times, constituent parts of parliament? This question was once disputed in England with great acrimony: but such is the force of time and evidence, that they can sometimes prevail even over faction; and the question seems, by general consent and even by their own, to be at last determined against the rising party. It is agreed, that the Commons were of great part in the council of the great council, till some ages after the conquest; and that the military tenants alone of the crown composed that supreme and legislative assembly.

The vassals of a baron were by their tenure immediately dependent on him, owed attendance at his court, and paid all their duty to the king, through that dependence which their lord was obliged by his tenure to acknowledge to his sovereign and superior. Their land, comprehended in the barony, was represented in parliament by the baron himself, who was supposed, according to the fictions of the feudal law, to possess the direct property of it; and it would have been deemed incongruous to give it any other representation. They stood in the same capacity to him, that he and his forefathers did to such one who was supposed to have a barony; the latter were peers of the realm: the vassals possessed a subordinate rank within their district: the baron enjoyed a superior dignity in the great assembly: they were in some degree his companions at home: he was the baron's companion at court: and nothing can be more evidently repugnant to all feudal ideas, and to that gradual subordination, which was essential to those ancient institutions, than to imagine that the king would apply either for the advice or consent of men, who were of a rank so much inferior, and whose duty was immediately paid to the monarch, that was interposed between them and the throne. If it be reasonable to think that the vassals of a barony, though their tenure was military and noble and honourable, were ever summoned to give their opinion in national councils, much less can it be supposed, that the traders or inhabitants of boroughs, whose condition was so much inferior, would be admitted to that privilege. It appears from Doomsday, that the greatest boroughs were, at the time of the conquest, scarcely more than country villages; and that the inhabitants lived in entire dependence.
vices, that no state or should be imposed, either on land or towns, but by consent of the great council; and for more security, it enumerates the persons entitled to a seat in that assembly, the prelates and immediate tenants of the crown, without any mention of the Commons; an authority so full, certain, and explicit, that nothing but the zeal of party could ever have procured credit to any contrary hypothesis.

It was probably the example of the French barons which first emboldened the English to require greater independence. It is also clear from the communications of the Commons and the city people with the consorts of the French court, that there was an invention of Lewis the Gross, in order to free the people from slavery under the lords, and to give them protection, by means of certain privileges and a separate turning wheel. An ancient French writer has spoken of a new and wicked device, to procure liberty to slaves, and encourage them in shaking off the dominion of their masters. The famous charter, as it is called, of the Conqueror to the city of London, though granted at a time when he assumed the appearance of gentleness and lenity, is nothing but a letter of protest, and a declaration that the citizens should not be treated as slaves. By the English feudal law, the superior lord was prohibited from marrying his female ward to a burgess or a villain; so near were these two ranks esteemed to each other, and so much inferior to the nobility and gentility. Besides possessing the advantages of birth, riches, civil powers, and privileges, the nobles and gentlemen alone were armed; a circumstance which, in the ancient state, was of such importance, that nothing but the military profession was honourable, and when the loose execution of laws gave so much encouragement to open violence, and rendered it so decisive in all disputes and controversies.

The great similarity among the feudal governments of Europe is well known to every man that has any acquaintance with ancient history; and the anachronisms of all foreign countries, where the question was never embroiled, by party disputes, have allowed, that the Commons came very late to be admitted to a share in the legislative power. In Norman particular, whose constitution was most likely to be William's model in making his new fabric of English government, the states were entirely composed of the clergy and nobility; and the first incorporated boroughs or communities of that country were Roten and Falaise, which enjoyed their privileges by a grant of Philip Augustus in the year 1207. All the ancient English historians, when they mention the great council of the nation, call it an assembly of the baronage, nobility, or great men; and none of their expressions, though several hundred passages may be adduced from the national chronicles, violate the torture to a meaning, which will admit the Commons to be constituent members of that body. If in the long period of 200 years, which elapsed between the conquest and the latter end of Henry III., and which abounded in faction and dispute, it was the power and authority of the House of Commons never performed one single legislative act, so considerable as to be once mentioned by any of the numerous historians of that age, they must have been totally insignificant; and in that case, what reason can be assigned for their ever being assembled? It can be supposed, that men of so little weight or importance possessed a negative voice against the king and the barons? Every page of the subsequent histories discovers their existence, though these histories are not written with greater accuracy than the preceding ones, and indeed scarcely equal them in that particular.

king's court, to give sentence among the barons themselves. But this plan, though simple, was attended with some circumstances which, being derived from a very extensive authority assumed by the Conqueror, contributed to some influence over the royal person, and so long as the state was not disturbed by arms, reduced every order of the community to some degree of dependence and subordination.

The king himself often sat in his court, which always attracted a considerable person: he there heard causes and pronounced judgment; and though he was assisted by the advice of the other members, it is not to be imagined that a decision could easily be obtained contrary to his inclination. In his absence, the chief justice proceeded, who was the first magistrate in the state, and a kind of viceroy, on whom depended all the civil affairs of the kingdom. The other chief officers of the crown, the constable, marshall, seneschal, chamberlain, treasurer, and chancellor, were members, together with such feudal barons as thought proper to attend, and the barons of the exchequer, who at first were also feudal barons appointed by the king. This court, which was sometimes called the king's court, sometimes the court of exchequer, judged in all causes, civil and criminal, and comprehended the whole business which is now shared out among four courts, the chancery, the king's bench, the common pleas, and the exchequer.

Such an accumulation of powers was itself a great source of authority, and rendered the jurisdiction of the court formidable to all the subjects; but the turn, which justice took soon after, was to augment the royal prerogatives. William, among the other violent changes which he attempted and effected, he had introduced the Norman law into England; he had ordered all the pleadings to be in that tongue, and had interwoven, with the English jurisprudence, all the maxims and principles, which the Normans, more advanced in cultivation, and naturally litigious, were accustomed to observe in the distribution of justice. Law, it may be, was a science, which at first fell entirely into the hands of the Normans; and which, even after it was communicated to the English, required so much study and application, that the latty, in those ignorable ages, were incapable of attaining it, and it was a mystery almost solely confined to the clergy, and chiefly to the monks. The great officers of the crown, and the feudal barons, who were military men, found themselves unfit to penetrate into those obscurities; and though they were of course sent in title, the business of the court was wholly managed by the chief justices and the law barons, who were men appointed by the king, and entirely at his disposal. This natural course seemed to effect a multiplication of the court, a business which flowed into that court, and which daily augmented by the appeals from all the subordinate j udiciaries of the kingdom.

In the Saxon times, no appeal was received in the king's court, except upon the denial or delay of justice by the inferior courts; and the same practice was still observed in most of the feudal kingdoms of Europe. But the great power of the Conqueror established, at first, in England, an authority, which the monarchs in France were not able to attain till the reign of St. Lewis, who lived near two centuries after; he empowered his court to receive appeals both from the courts of barony and the county courts, and by that means brought the administration of justice ultimately into the hands of the sovereign. And lest the expense or trouble of a journey to court should discourage suitors, and make them acquiesce in the decision of the inferior judicatures, itinerant judges were afterwards established, who made their circuits throughout the kingdom, and tried all causes that were brought before them. By this expedient the courts of barony were kept in awe; and if they still preserved some of the old contests, the power the vassals might entertain, of disobliging their superior, by appealing from his jurisdiction. But the county courts were much discredited; and as the freeholders were found ignorant of the intricate principles and forms of the new law, the lawyers gradually brought all business before the king's judges, and abandoned the ancient simple and popular judicature. After this manner, the formalities of justice, which, though they appear tedious and cumbersome, are for the most part, the chief justiciary, still preserved in all the monarchical governments, proved at first by a combination of causes, very advantageous to royal authority in England. The power of the Norman kings was also Revenue of the crown, which was now made perpetual and independent of the subject. The people, without betaking themselves to arms, had no check upon the king, and no regular security for the due administration of justice. In those days, there are many instances of oppression passed unheeded; and soon after were openly pleaded as precedents, which it was unlawful to dispute or control. Princes and ministers were too ignorant to be themselves the more formidable than the hands of the judges of justice; and there was no established council or assembly which could protect the people, and, by withholding supplies, regularly and peacefully admonish the king of his duty, and the court of his dependence. The first branch of the king's stated revenue was the royal demesnes or crown lands, which were very extensive, and comprehended, beside a great number of manors, most of the chief cities of the kingdom. It was established by law, that the king could alienate no part of his domain, and that he himself, or his successor, could at any time resume such domains; but this law was never regularly observed; which, in the time of the crown somewhat more dependent. The rest of the crown lands, considered merely as so much riches, was a source of power: the influence of the king over his tenants and the inhabitants of his towns, increased this power; but the numerous branches of his revenue, besides supplying his treasury, gave, by their very essence, an authority superior to arbitrary authority, and were a support of the prerogative; as will appear from an enumeration of them.

The king was never content with the stated rents, but levied heavy fines, on the non-payment of justice, on the feudal vassals of town and country, who lived within his demesne. All bargains of sale, in order to prevent theft, being prohibited, except in boroughs and public markets, he provided for the collection of heavy duties. He seized two heathgods, one before and one behind the mast, from every vessel that imported wine. All goods paid to his customs a proportionable part of their value: passage over bridges and on rivers was loaded with tolls at pleasure; and though the boroughs by degrees bought the liberty of farming these impositions, yet the revenue profited by these bargains: new sums were often exacted for the renewal and confirmation of their charters, and the people were thus held in perpetual dependence. Such was the situation of the inhabitants within the royal demesnes. But the possessors of land, or the military tenants, though they were better protected both by law, and by the great privilege of carrying arms, were, from the nature of their tenures, much exposed to the inroads of power, and possessed not what we should esteem, in our age, a very durable security. The Conqueror ordained, that the barons should be obliged to pay nothing...

beyond their stated services, except a reasonable aid to ransom his person if he were taken in war, to make his eldest son a knight, and to marry his eldest daughter. What should, on these occasions, he deemed a reasonable aid, was not determined; and the demands of the crown were not infixed, but what it pleased, and sometimes called a seignage. The sum was, during some reigns, precarious and uncertain; it was sometimes levied without allowing the vassal the liberty of personal service; and it was an usual artifice of the king to pretend an expedition, that he might be entitled to another demand. The practice, however, of taxing land by the early Norman kings, arbitrarily, and contrary to the laws of the Conqueror, was also a general land-tax of the same nature, levied by the two first Norman kings, and abolished by the charter of Henry I. It was a shilling paid every three years by each hearth, to induce the king not to use his prerogative in debasing the coin. In short, it appears from that charter, that, though the Conqueror had granted his military tenants an immunity from all taxes and tallages, he and his son William had never thought themselves bound to observe that rule, but had levied impositions at pleasure on all the landed estates of the king. There was a land cultivated by the military tenant himself shall not be so burdened; but he reserves the power of taxing the vassals; and as it is known that Henry's charter was never observed in any one article, we may be assured that this prince and his successors retracted even this small indulgence, and levied arbitrary impositions on all the lands of all their subjects. These taxes were sometimes very heavy; since Malbury tells us, that in the reign of William Rufus, the farmers, on account of them, abandoned tillage, and a famine ensued.

The escheats were a great branch both of power and of revenue to the first monarchs. In default of posterity from the first baron, his land reverted to the crown, and continually augmented the king's possessions. The prince had indeed by law a power of alienating these escheats; but by this means he had an opportunity of establishing the fortunes of his friends and servants, and thereby enlarging his authority. Sometimes he retained them in his own hands; and they were gradually confounded with the royal demesnes, and became perpetual grants to his successors. This confusion is probably the reason why the king acquired the right of alienating his demesnes.

But besides escheats from default of heirs, those which ensue from debts, whose, or breach of duty towards the superior lord, were frequent. If the tenant being thrice summoned to attend his superior's court and do fealty, neglected or refused obedience, he forfeited all title to his land. If he denied his tenure, or refused his service, he was exposed to the same penalty. If he sold his estate without licence from his lord, or if he sold it upon any other tenure or title than that by which he himself held it, he lost all right to it. The adhering to his lord's enemies, deserting him in war, betraying his serents, deserting his wife or his near relations, or even using indecent freedoms with them, might be punished by forfeiture. The higher crimes, rapes, robbery, murder, arson, &c. were called felons, and he underwent the utmost fidelity to his lord, made him lose his fief. Even where the felon was vassal to a baron, though his immediate lord enjoyed the forfeiture, the king might retain possession of his estate during a twelvemonth, and, after the right of appealing and destroying it, unless the baron paid him a reasonable composition.

We have not here enumerated all the species of felonies, or of crimes by which forfeiture was incurred: we have said enough to prove, that the possession of feudal property was anciently somewhat precarious, and that the primary idea was never lost, of its being a kind of fee or benefice.

When a baron died, the king immediately took possession of the estate; and the heir, before he recovered his right, was obliged to take an oath to make his desire that he might be admitted to do homage for his land, and pay a composition to the king. This composition was not at first fixed by law, at least by practice: the king was often exorbitant in his demands, and kept possession of the land till they were complied with.

If the heir were a minor, the king retained the whole profit of the estate till his majority; and might grant what sum he thought proper for the education and maintenance of the young baron. This practice was also founded on the notion, that a fief was a benefice, and that, while the heir could not perform his military services, the revenue devolved to the superior, who employed another in his stead. It is obvious, that a great proportion of the landed property must, by means of this device, be continually in the hands of the prince, and that all the noble families were thereby held in perpetual dependance. When the king granted the wardship of a rich heir to any of his benefactors, he had the opportunity of enriching a favourite or minister: if he sold it, he thereby levied a considerable sum of money. Simon de Montfort paid Henry III. 10,000 marks, an immense sum in those days, for the marriage of Gilbert de Umfreynville, who was the eldest son of the king. The sum was equal to the marriage of the eldest son of the king. The same prince the sum of 20,000 marks, that he might marry Isabel, Countess of Gloucester, and possess all her lands and knights' fees. This sum would be equivalent to 300,000, perhaps 400,000, pounds in our time.

If the heir were a female, the king was entitled to offer her any husband of her rank whom he thought proper; and if she refused him, she forfeited her land. Even a male heir could not marry without the royal consent; and it was usual for men to pay large sums for the liberty of making their own choice in marriage. No man could dispose of his land, either by sale or will, without the consent of his superior. It was even sometimes the practice to require the escheat from the new proprietor: he was still kind of beneficiarius; and could not oblige his superior to accept of any vassal that was not agreeable to him.

Fines, amortisations, and oblates, as they were called, were another considerable branch of the royal power and revenue. The ancient records of the exchequer, which are still preserved, give surprising accounts of the numerous fines and amortisations levied in those days, and of the strange inventions in which they were kept. It appears that the ancient kings of England put themselves entirely on the footing of the barbarous eastern princes, whom no man must approach without a present, who sell not the good they give, and intrude themselves into every business that they may have a pretence for extracting money. Even justice was avowedly bought and sold; the king's court itself, though the supreme judicature of the kingdom, was open to none that brought not presents in the king; the bribes given for the expedition, delay, suspension, and, doubtless, for the perversion of justice, were entered in the public registers of the royal revenue, and remain as monuments of the perpetual iniquity and tyranny of the times. The business of the exchequer, for instance, the first nobility of the kingdom, were not ashamed to insert, as an article in their records, that the county of Norfolk paid a sum that they might be fairly dealt with; the borough of Yarmouth, that the king's charters, which they have for their liberties, might not be violated; Richard, son of Gilbert, for the king's helping him to recover his debt from the Jews; Serlo, son of Terlavanost, that he might be permitted to make his defence, in case he were accused of a certain homicide; Walter de Burton, for free law, if accused of wounding another; Robert de Essvat, for having an inquest to find whether Roger the Butcher, and Wace and Humphrey, accused him of robbery and theft out of envy and ill-will or not;* William Buhurst, for having an inquest to find whether he was accused of the deaths of one Godwin, out of ill-will, or for just cause.† I have selected these few instances from a great number of a like kind, which Madox had selected from a still greater number, preserved in the ancient rolls of the exchequer.#

Sometimes the party litigant offered the king a certain portion, a half, a third, a fourth, payable out of the deists, which he might have it in charge of a creditor of his, who should assist him in recovering.‡ Thelopanna de Westland agreed to pay the half of 212 marks, that she might recover that sum against James de Fuchleston;§ Solomon, the Jew, engaged to pay 4 marks and 21 d. of every seven marks recovered against Hugh de la Hosc;‖ Nicholas Morel promised to pay 300 marks, that the Earl of Flanders might be distrained to pay him 343 pounds, which the Earl had taken from him; and these sixty pounds were to be paid out of the first money that Nicholas should recover from the earl.

As the king assumed the entire power over trade, he was to be paid for a permission to exercise commerce or industry of any kind.¶ Hugh Ossel paid 400 marks for liberty to trade in England;‖ Nigel de Havene gave fifty marks for the partnership in merchandize which he had with Gervase de Lanton:|| the men of Worcester paid 100 shilings, and William bought land of the liberty of selling and buying dyel cloth, as formerly:§ several other towns paid for a like liberty. The commerce indeed of the kingdom was so much under the control of the king, that he erected guilds, and monopolies, wherever he pleased; and levied sums on these exclusive privileges.||

There were no profits so small as to be below the king's attention. Henry, son of Arthur, gave ten dogs, to have a recognition against the Countess of Cornwall for one kind of land; Roger de Columbus gave twenty marks, and twenty shillings and twenty shillings for an inquest to find, whether Gilbert, son of Aulre, gave to Roger 200 muttins to obtain his confirmation for certain lands, or whether Roger took the land by violence.†† Roger Fitz-Peter, the chief justiceary, gave two good Norwegian hawks, that Walter le Madine might have leave to export a hundredweight of cheese out of the king's dominions

It is really amusing to remark the strange business out of which the king sometimes interfered, and never without a present: the wife of Hugh de Neville gave the king 200 hens, that she might lie with her husband one night; and she brought with her two hones, who answered each for a hundred hens. It is probable that her husband was a prisoner, which debared her from having access to him. The Abbot of Rofford paid ten marks for leave to erect a lych-gate upon his land in Wellingham, in order to secure his wood there from being stolen:‖ Hugh, Archdeacon of Wells, gave one tun of wine for leave to carry 600 sumns of corn without which he would: Peter de Perrams gave twenty marks for leave to sail fishes, as Peter Cheverler used to do.||

It was usual to pay high fines, in order to gain the king's good-will, or mitigate his anger. In the reign of Henry II. Gilbert, the son of Fergus, fines in 919 pounds 8 shillings to obtain that prince's favour, William de Chataignes, a thousand marks, that he would remit his displeasure. In the reign of Henry III. the city of London fines in no less a sum than 20,000 pounds on the same account:* The king's protection and good offices of every kind were bought and sold. Robert Grislet paid twenty marks of silver, that the king would help him against the Earl of Mortagne, in a certain plea:* Robert de Cundet gave thirty marks of silver that the king would bring him to an accord with the Bishop of Lincoln:* Ralph de Brecham gave a haunch, that the king would give him land; and it was a very frequent reason for payments: John, son of Ordar, gave a Norwegian hawk, to have the king's request to the King of Norway to let him have his brother Godard's chattels:‖ Richard de Neville gave twenty palfreys to obtain that he might recover his chattels in his lands, which the king took for a husband:‖ Roger Fitz-Walter gave three good palfreys to have the king's letter to Roger Bertram's mother, that she should marry him:‖ Elang, the dean, paid 100 and 20 marks, that he should recover his old land out of fief:‖ the Bishop of Winchester gave one tun of good wine for his not putting the king in mind to give a gable to the Counties of Albemarle:‖ Robert de Vaux gave five of the best palfreys, that the king would hold his tongue about Henry Pinel's wife.†† There are, in the records of exchequer, many other singular instances of a like nature. It will, however, be just to remark, that the same ridiculous practices and dangerous abuses prevailed in Normandy, and probably in all the other states of Europe:§ England was not, in this respect, more barbarous than its neighbours.

These notorious practices of the Norman kings were so well known, that on the death of Hugh Bigod, in the reign of Henry II. the best and most just of these princes, the eldest son and the widow of this noleanor came to court, and strongly, but ineffectually, attempting large presents to the king, each of them to acquire possession of that rich inheritance, the king was so equitable as to order the cause to be tried by the great council! But in the mean time, he seized all the money and treasure of the deceased. Peter of Bious, in the reign of the emperor, provost of Reggio, practised a pathetic description of the vanity of justice, and the oppressions of the poor, under the reign of Henry: and he scruples not to complain to the king himself of these oppressions. Nor did the kings refrain from doing the same to the government of worse princes. The articles of inquiry concerning the conduct of sheriffs, which Henry promulgated in 1170, show the great power, as well as the licentiousness, of the officers.

Amencorments or fines for crimes and trespasses were another considerable branch of the royal revenue. Most crimes were atoned for by money; the fines imposed were not limited by any rate or statute; and frequently occasioned the total ruin of the person, even for the slightest trespasses The forest-laws, particularly, were a great source of oppression. The king possessed sixty-eight forests, which were celebrated as deer parks, in different parts of England; and, considering the extreme passion of the English and Normans for hunting, these were so many snares laid for the people, by which they were allure into trespasses, and brought within the reach of arbitrary and rigorous laws, which the king had thought proper to exact by his own authority.

But the most barefaced acts of tyranny and oppression were practised against the Jews, who were entirely out of the protection of law, were extremely odious from the bigotry of the people, and were abandoned to the immeasurable rapacity of the king and his ministers. Besides many other indignities, to which they were continually exposed, I apprehend that they were once all thrown into prison, and the sum of 66,000 marks exacted for their liberty at... another time, Isaac the Jew paid alone 5100 marks; 2. Brun, 3000 marks; 3. Jurnet, 2000; Bennett, 500: at all these, La- cercia, widow of David, the Jew of Oxford, was required to pay 6600 marks; and she was delivered over to six of the richest and most distinguished Jews in England; and by concluding with her several sentences of high rank and power, he could throw the state into con- vulsions. And, on the whole, though the royal authority was confined within bounds, and often within very narrow lines, yet the check imposed was so strong, and frequently the source of great disorders; nor was it derived from the liberty of the people, but from the military power of many petty tyrants, who were equally dangerous to the prince, and oppressive to the subject.

The power of the church was another ram- part against royal authority; but this defence was also the cause of many mischiefs and inconveniences. The dignified clergy, perhaps, were not so prone to immediate violence as the barons; but as they pretended to a total independence on the state, and could always cover themselves with the appearances of religion, they proved, in one respect, an obstruction to the settlement of the kingdom, and to the regular execution of the laws. The policy of the Conqueror was in this particular liable to some exception. He augmented the stupendous veneration for Rome, to which that age was so much inclined; and he did not even take the trouble to make a union of the clergy with the secular clergy of the state. The bishops and abbots, both in England and in France, were generally brought up under the influence of the Roman See; and the clergy, by the practice of some very great and cruel tyrants, were suggested with a disposition to regard the church as a separate power, and to become the protectors of the oppressed, the defenders of the weak, and the avengers of wrongs.

The right of primogeniture was introduced, with the feudal law and institutions, which is hurtful, by producing and maintaining an unequal division of private property; but is advantageous, in another respect, by accustoming the people to a preference in favour of the eldest son, who was the only person beneficent to them, by the alliance of his name, and the properties of his family, and by the subordination of his authority, without process of law, to imprisonment, banishment, and the deprivation of their kingdom.

A great baron, in ancient times, considered himself as a king in his own country, as sovereign of all the land, by courts and dependencies more zeloously attached to him than the ministers of state and the great officers were commonly to their sovereign. He often maintained in his court the parade of royalty, by establishing a justiciary, armed officers, marshals, chamberlains, seneschals, and chamberlains, and assigning to each of these officers a separate province and command. He was usually very audacious in exercising his jurisdiction; and took such delight in that image of sovereignty, that it was found necessary to restrain his activity, and prohibit him by law from holding courts too frequently. It is not to be doubted, but the example, set by him, the prince, of a mercenary and sedate exiles, who were a great power in the state, and their salaries, and bad offices, his justice and injustice, were equally put to sale. He had the power, with the king's consent, to exact tithes even from the free citizens who lived within his barony; and as his necessities made him rapacious, his authority was usually found to be more oppressive and tyrannical than that of the sovereign. He was ever engaged in baronial wars for personal or his neighbours, and often gave protection to all desperate adventurers and criminals, who could be useful in serving his violent purposes. He was able alone, in times of tranquillity, to obstruct the execution of justice within his barony, and to combine with a very few discontented barons of high rank and power, he could throw the state into con- vulsions. And, on the whole, though the royal authority was confined within bounds, and often within very narrow lines, yet the check imposed was so strong, and frequently the source of great disorders; nor was it derived from the liberty of the people, but from the military power of many petty tyrants, who were equally dangerous to the prince, and oppressive to the subject.

ment. The credulity of the age grafted on this stock the notion of giants, enchanters, dragons, spells, and a thousand wonders, which still multiplied during the times of the Crusades; when men, returning from so great a distance, used the liberty of imposing every fiction on their believing audience. These ideas of chivalry infected the writings, conversation, and behaviour of men, during some ages; and even after they were, in a great measure, banished by the general increase, they left modern gaudlery, and the point of honour, which still maintain their influence, and are the genuine offspring of those ancient affections.

The concession of the Great Charter, or rather its full establishment, (for there was a considerable interval of time between the one and the other,) gave rise, by degrees, to a new species of government, and introduced some order and justice into the administration. The ensuing scenes of our history are therefore somewhat different from the preceding. Yet the Great Charter contained no establishment of new courts, magistrates, or senates, nor abolition of the old. It introduced no new distribution of the powers of the commonwealth, and no innovation in the political or public law of the kingdom. It only guarded, and that merely by verbal clauses, against such tyrannical practices as are incompatible with civilized government, and, if they became too frequent, are incompatible with all government. The barbarous license of the kings, and perhaps of the nobles, was thenceforth somewhat more restrained: men acquired some more security for their properties and their liberties: and government approached a little nearer to that end for which it was originally instituted, the distribution of justice, and the equal protection of the citizens. Acts of violence and iniquity in the crown, which before were only deemed injurious to individuals, and were of no considerable proportion in the number, power, and dignity of the persons affected by them, were now regarded, in some degree, as public injuries, and as infringements of a charter, called the Great Charter, which had established general securities. And thus the establishment of the Great Charter, without seeming anywise to innovate in the distribution of political power, became a kind of epoch in the constitution.

No. III.

The party among us who have distinguished themselves by their adhering to liberty and a popular government, have long indulged those prejudices against the succeeding race of princes, by bestowing unbounded panegyrics on the virtue and wisdom of Elizabeth. They have been so extremely ignorant of the transactions of this reign, as to extol her for a period, which, of all others, she was the least possessed of; a tender regard for the constitution, and a concern for the liberties and privileges of her people. But as it is scarcely possible for the prepossessions of party to throw a veil much longer over facts so palpable and undeniable, there is danger lest the public should run into the opposite extreme, and should entertain an antipathy to the memory of a princess who exercised the royal authority in a manner so contrary to all the ideas which we at present entertain of a legal constitution. But Elizabeth only supported the prerogatives transmitted to her by her predecessors; she believed that her subjects were entitled to no more liberty than their ancestors had enjoyed: she found that they entirely acquiesced in her arbitrary administration:

1 In all legal sense combinis, it was part of the champion's oath, that he carried not about him any birth, spell, or enchantment, by which he might prove himself a conjurer. Greg. Jard. in Vir. Illust. vol. i. p. 343.

2 By the ancient constitution, it was meant that which prevailed before theTAUNCE of Simonides, a so-called poet, in his attack on the government, where, though the king did have perhaps less liberty than under the Tudors, yet the king had also less authority; the power of the baron was a great check upon him, and exercised with great tyranny over him. For the position of the barons is in every case protected, that before the establishment of the charters, when neither the people nor the barons had any regular privileges; and the power of the government, during the reign of an able prince, was almost wholly in the king. The English constitution, like all political combinations, has its defects. Greg. Jard. in Vir. Illust. vol. i. p. 343.

Civil policy, which being compared with the flourishing and rectitude of the preceding times, appears to have been a period of reactionary and considerate person, in the behavior of despotism of repression. suffered to decline, either on the left, or on the right hand, from the drawn line limited by authority, and by her laws and injunctions.

But the law went beyond even these two courts in a prompt, and arbitrary, and violent method of decision. Whenever there was any insurrection or public disorder, the crown employed martial law; and it was, during that time, exercised not only over the soldiers, but over the whole people. If one might be punished as a rebel, or an aider and abettor of rebellion, whom the provost-martial, or lieutenant of a county, or their deputies, pleased to suspect. Lord Bacon says, that the trial at common law, granted to the Lord of Essex and his fellow-conspirators, was a favour; for that the case would have borne and required the severity of martial law. We have seen instances of its being employed by Queen Mary in defence of orthodoxy. There remains a letter of Queen Elizabeth's to the Earl of Sussex, after the suppression of the northern rebellion, in which she sharply reproves him because she had not heard of his having executed any criminals by martial law; though it is probable that near eight hundred persons suffered, one way or other, on account of the slight insurrection. But the kings of England did not always limit the exercise of this law to times of civil war and disorder. In 1552, when there was no rebellion or insurrection, there was an opinion that there was a necessity of martial law; and empowered the commissioners to execute it, as should be thought by their directions most necessary. Queen Elizabeth too was not sparing in the use of this law. In 1573, one Peter Barchet, a puritan, being persuaded that it was meritorious to kill such as opposed the truth of the gospel, ran into the streets, and wounded Hawkins, the famous sea-captain, whom he took for Hatton, the queen's favourite. The queen was so incensed, that she ordered him to be punished instantly by martial law; but upon the remonstrance of some prudent counsellors, who told her that this law was usually confined to turbulent times, she recalled her order, and delivered over Barchet to a court of common law; but she continued not always so reserved in executing this authority. There remains a proclamation of hers, in which she orders martial law to be used against all such as import bulbs, or even forbidden books and pamphlets, from abroad; and prohibits the questioning of the lieutenants, or their deputies, for their arbitrary punishment of such offenders, any law or statute to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. We have another act of hers still more extraordinary. The streets of London were much infested with idle vagabonds and riotous persons. The lord mayor had endeavoured to repress this disorder; the star-chamber had exerted its antitrust powers; and both these courts, to the queen, finding those remedies insufficient, employed martial law, and gave Sir Thomas Wilford a commission of provost-martial: "Granting him authority, and commanding him, upon significant, given by the justices of peace in London or the neighbouring counties, of such offenders not worthy to be speedily executed by martial law, to attact and take the same persons, and in the presence of the said justices, according to justice of martial law, to execute them upon the gallows or gibbet openly, or near to such place where the said rebellious and scourrigible offenders shall be found to have committed the said great offences."

I suppose it would be difficult to produce an instance of such direct authority in any place nearer than Muscovy. The patent of high constable, granted to Earl Rivers, by Edward IV., proves the nature of the office. The powers are unlimited, perpetual, and remain in force during peace as well as during war and rebellion. The parliament in Edward the VI.'s reign, acknowledged the jurisdiction of the constable and martial's court to be part of the law of the land.

The star-chamber, and high commission, and court-martial, though arbitrary jurisdictions, had still some pretence of a trial, at least of a sentence; but there was a grievous punishment very generally inflicted in that age, without any other authority than the warrant of a secretary of state, or of the president of the court, and the sentence in any jail, and during any time, that the ministers should think proper. In suspicious times, all the jails were full of prisoners of state; and these unhappy victims of public jealousy were sometimes thrown into dungeons, and loaded with chains, and cast into the cold, and cruel manner, without their being able to obtain any remedy from law.

This practice was an indirect way of employing torture: but the rack itself, though not admitted in the lord chancellor's execution of justice, was frequently used, upon any suspicion, by authority of a warrant from a secretary, or the privy council. Even the council in the marches of Wales was empowered, by their very commission, to make use of torture whenever they thought proper. There cannot be a stronger proof how lightly the rack was employed, than the following story told by Lord Bacon. We shall give it in his own words: "The queen was mighty incensed against Hayware, on account of a book he dedicated to Lord Essex, being a story of the first year of Henry IV.; thinking it a seditious prelude, to put into the people's heads boldness and faction. She said, she had been guilty of nothing in it, since she could not find any places in it, that might be drawn within the case of treason. Whereeto I answered, For treason, sure I found none; but for felony very many; and when her justice hastily asked, How many? I told her, she had committed very apparent theft: for he had taken most of the sentences of Cornelius Tacitus, and translated them into English, and put them into his text. And another time, when the queen could not be persuaded that it was his writing whose name was to it, but that it had some more mischievous author, and said, with great indignation, that she would have him racked, to produce his author; I replied, Nay, madam, he is a doctor, never rack his person, but rack his books, and put them into your hands, and help of books, and be enquired to continue the story where it breaketh off, and I will undertake, by collating the histories, to judge whether he was the author or no." Thus, had it not been for Bacon's humanity, or rather his wit, this author, a man of letters, had been put to the rack, for a most innocent performance. His real offence was, his dedicating a book to that munificent patron of the arts, the Earl of Essex, at a time when this nobleman lay under her majesty's displeasure.

The queen's menace, of trying and punishing Hayware for treason, could easily have been executed, let this book have been ever so innocent. And if the authors hung over the people, no one must have acquitted a man, if the court was resolved to have him condemned. The practice, also, of not confronting witnesses with the prisoner, gave the crown lawyers all imaginable advantage against him. And, indeed, there scarcely occurs an instance, during all these reigns, that the sovereign or the ministers were ever disappointed in the issue of a prosecution. Tupid jurys, and judges who held their offices during pleasure, never failed to second all the views of the crown. And as the practice was anciently common, of fining, imprisoning, or otherwise punishing the judges, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding a verdict contrary to the direction of these dependent judges; it is obvious that juries were then no manner of security to the liberty of the subject.

The power of pressing, both for sea and land service, and obliging any person to accept of any office, however mean or unfit for him, was another prerogative totally incompatible with freedom. Osborne gives the following account of Elizabeth's method of employing this prerogative. In case she found any likely to interrupt her occasions," says he, she did seasonably prevent him, by a chargeable employment abroad, or putting him upon some service at home, which she knew beast grateful to the people; contrary to a false maxim, since practised with far worse success, by such princes as thought it beter to husband their force off enemies than reward friend.

The practice with Elizabeth, on the other hand, was to imply the immediate successors of Elizabeth, proceeded partly from the extreme difficulty of their situation, partly from the greater lenity of their disposition. The power of pressing, as little as any other, was in her hands, in all respects,
by men of inferior rank; and officers often exacted money for freeing persons from the service.
The government of England, during that age, however difficult in particular respects, bore a less resemblance to that of Turkey at present: the sovereign possessed every power, except that of imposing taxes;
and in both countries this limitation, unsupported by other privileges, appears rather prejudicial to the people.
In Turkey, it obliges the sultan to permit the exortion of the bashaws and governors of provinces, from whom he awards squires presents, or takes forfeitures; in En-land, it engaged the queen to erect monopolies, and grant permissions for exclusive trade; an invention, that grew out of the difficulties of the reign of Elizabeth, as well as of her precedcessors. She often exacted loans from her people; an arbitrary and unequal kind of imposition, and which individuals felt severely: for though the money had been regularly paid, which was seldom the case, it lay in the people's hands without interest, which was a sensible loss to the persons from whom the money was borrowed.

The queen in her distress could, however, request the Lord Burleigh, by levying a general loan on the people, equivalent to a subsidy, a scheme which would have laid the burden more equally, but which was, in different words, a taxatin imposed without consent of parliament. It is remarkable, that the scheme thus proposed, without any visible necessity, by that wise minister, is the very same which Henry VIII. executed, and which Charles I., engrossed by ill usage from his parliament, and reduced to the greatest difficulties in his reign, turned to. In fact, to the great discon-
tenation of the nation.

The demand of benevolence was another invention of that age for taxing the people. This practice was so little conformable to the laws, that the people offered the queen a bounty, which she was generously refused, as having no occasion at that time for money. Queen Mary also, by an order of council, incurred the utmost in some branches; and her sister imitated the example. There was a species of ship money imposed at the time of the Spanish invasion: the several ports were required to equip a certain number of vessels at their own charge; and such was the acrancy of the people for the public defence, that some of the ports, particularly London, sent double the number demanded
of them. When any levies were made for Ireland, France, or the Low Countries, the crown obliged the counties to equip them in some branches, and her sister sent them to the sea-ports at their own charge. New-year's gifts were at that time expected from the nobility, and from the more considerable gentry.

The queen's pre-emption were also methods of taxation, unequal, arbitrary, and oppressive. The whole kingdom sensibly felt the burden of those impositions;
and it was regarded as a great privilege conferred on Oxford and Cambridge, to prohibit the purveyors from taking any monopolies within five miles of these universities.

The queen victualled her navy by means of this prerogative, during the first years of her reign.

Warship was the most regular and legal of all these impositions by prerogative; yet was it a great bulge of levying and oppression to all the commerce of the kingdom, not only to the subject itself, but also to the trade of the kingdom.

When an estate devoted to a female, the sovereign obliged her to marry any one he pleased: whether the heir were male or female, the crown ensured the whole profit of the estate during the minority. The giving of a warship was a usual method of releasing a royal ward before his majority.

The inventions were endless which arbitrary power might employ for the extorting of money, while the people imagined that their property was secured by the crown's being deemed an absolute, and not a revenue, power for favoring particular

APPENDIX.

The queen’s prohibition of the prophesying, or the assemblies, instituted for fanatical prayers and conferences, which, by exposing them all to the utmost extent of her prerogative. Any number of persons could not meet together in order to read the Scriptures, and confer about religion, though in ever so orthodox a manner, without her permission.

There were many other branches of prerogative incompatible with an exact or regular enjoyment of liberty. None of the nobility could marry without permission from the sovereign. The queen detained the Earl of Essex’s commission, because he privately married the Earl of Essex’s cousin. No man could travel without the consent of the prince. Sir William Evers underwent a severe persecution because he had presumed to pay a private visit to the King of Scots. The sovereign even assumed a supreme and uncontrolled authority over all foreign trade; and neither allowed any person to enter or depart the kingdom, nor any commodity to be imported or exported without his consent.

The parliament, in the thirteenth of the queen, praised her for not imitating the practice usual among her predecessors, of stopping the course of justice by particular warrants. There could not possibly be a greater abuse, more unjust, more illiberal, than the practice of refraining from it was very laudable. But she was by no means constant in this reserve. There remain in the public records some warrants of hers, for exempting particular persons from all lawsuits and prosecutions; and these warrants, she says, she grants from her royal prerogative, which she will not allow to be disputed.

It was very usual in Queen Elizabeth’s reign, and probably in all the preceding reigns, for noblemen or privy-counsellors to commit to prison any one who had happened to displease them, by suing for his just debts; and the unhappy person, though he gained his cause in the courts of justice, was commonly obliged to relinquish his property in order to obtain his liberty. Some likewise, who had been delivered from prison by the judges, were again committed to custody in secret places, without any possibility of obtaining relief; and even the officers and servants of the courts of law were punished for executing the writs in favour of these persons. Nay, it was usual to send for people by pursuivants, a kind of harpies, who then attended the orders of the council and high commission; and they were brought up to London, and constrained by impediments and fines, to come and appear in the court; but also to pay the pursuivants great sums of money.

The judges, in the 34th of the queen, complain to her majesty of the frequency of this practice. It is probable that the force of his majesty’s name was stronger than the reign of Elizabeth; since the parliament, who presented the petition of right, found no later instances of it. And even these very judges of Elizabeth, who thus protect the people against the tyranny of the great, expressly allow, that a person committed by special command of the queen is not bailable.

It is easy to imagine that in such a government no justice could by course of law be obtained of the sovereign, unless he were willing to allow it. In the naval expedition undertaken by Raleigh and Frobisher against the Spaniards in the year 1592, a very rich carack was taken, worth two hundred thousand pounds. The queen’s share in the adventure was only a tenth, but as the prize was so great, and exceeded so much the expectation of all the adventurers, she determined not to rest contented with her share. Raleigh humbly and earnestly begged her to accept of a hundred thousand pounds in lieu of all demands, or rather of all the merchants, by which the proprietors were willing to make her, of eighty thousand pounds, was the greatest that prince ever received from a subject.

But it is no wonder the queen in her administration should pay so little regard to liberty; while the practicability in enacting laws was entirely negligible of it. The persecuting statutes which they passed against papists and puritans are extremely contrary to the genius of freedom; and there is no more室ness to the clergy and bigots, accustomed the people to the most disgraceful subjection. Their conferring an unlimited supremacy on the queen, or, what is worse, acknowledging her inherent right to it, was another proof of their voluntary servitude.

The law of the 33d of her reign, making seditionous words against the queen’s capital, is also a very tyrannical statute; and a use no less tyrannical was sometimes made of it.

The case of Udall, a puritanical clergyman, seems singular even in those arbitral times. This man had published a book called a Demonstration of Discipline, in which he inveighed against the government of bishops; and though he had carefully endeavoured to conceal his name, he was thrown into prison upon suspicion, and brought to a trial for this offence. It was pretended, that the bishops were part of the queen’s political body; and to speak against them was really to attack her, and was therefore felony by a statute. This was not the only iniquity to which Udall was exposed. The judges went the very way to determine any thing but the fact, whether Udall had written the book or not, without examining his intention or the import of the words. In order to prove the fact, the crown lawyers made a new question: they: only read the testimony of two persons absent, one of whom said, that Udall had told him he was the author; another, that a friended had said so.

They would not allow Usall to produce an exculpatory evidence; which they said was never to be permitted against the crown. And they tended him an oath, by which he was required to depose, that he was not the author of the book; and his refusal to make that deposition was employed as the strongest proof of his guilt. It was almost needless to add, that notwithstanding these multiplied iniquities, a verdict of death was given by the jury against Udall: for, as the queen was extremely bent upon his prosecution, it was impossible he could escape. He died in prison before execution of the sentence.

The case of Penry, was, if possible, still harder. This man was a zealous puritan, or rather a Brownist, a small sect which afterwards increased, and received the name of Independents. He had written against the hierarchy several tracts, such as Martin Marprelate, Theses Martiniana, and other compositions, full of low scribbling and petulant satire. After concealing himself for some years, he was seized; and, as the matter was a big one, he was required to stand in the court, to answer for his libels. He came, and produced in his pocket, the very book which was suspected of the, and the prosecution. It was also imputed to him, by the Lord-keeper, Puckering, that in some of these papers, he had only acknowledged her majesty’s royal power to establish laws, ecclesiastical and civil; but had avoided the usual terms of making, enacting, enforcing, and ordaining laws: which, it is implied, says the lord-keeper, “a most absolute authority.” Penry, for these offences, was convicted and executed.

Thus we have seen that the most absolute authority of the sovereign, to make use of the lord-keeper’s expediency, was established on about twenty branches of prerogative, which are now abolished, and which were, every one of them, totally incompatible with the liberty of the subject. But what assured more effectually the slavery of the people, than even these branches of prerogative, was the established principles of the times, which attributed to the prince such an unlimited and indefeasible power as was supposed to be the origin of all law, and could be circumscribed by none, the government was quite a despotism, and all the clergy, and which they were enjoined to read every Sunday in all the churches, inculeate every where a blind and unlimited passive obedience to the prince, which, on no account, and under no pretense, it is ever lawful for subjects in the smallest article to depart from or infringe.

Much noise has been made because some court chaplains during the succeeding reigns were permitted to preach such a doctrine as that there is a difference between these sermons, and discourses published by authority, avowed by the prince and council, and promulgated to the whole nation.3 So thoroughly were these principles imbibed by the people, during the reigns of Elizabeth and her predecessors, that opposition to them was regarded as the most flagrant sedition, and was not even rewarded by that public praise and approbation which can alone support port men under such dangers and difficulties as attend them in this realm of tyrannical authority. It was only during the next generation that the noble principles of liberty took root, and spreading themselves under the shelter of parliamantal absurdities, became fashionable among the people.

It is worth remarking, that the advantage usually ascribed to absolute monarchy, a greater regularity of government, and a more strict execution of the laws, did not attend the former English government, though in many respects it fell under that denomination. A demonstration of this truth is contained in a judicious paper which is preserved by Sturte,4 and which was written by an eminent justice of peace of Somersetshire, in the year 1580. He said in the outset of the quarrel: When the authority of that princess may be supposed to be fully corroborated by time, and her maxims of government improved by long practice. This paper contains an account of which they were several in the country at Somerset. The author says, that forty persons there had been executed in a year for robberies, thefts, and other felonies; thirty-five burnt in the hand, thirty-seven whipped, one hundred and eighty-three discharged: that those who were discharged were most wickeded and desperate persons, who never would come to any good, because they would not work, and none would take them into service: that, notwithstanding this great number of indentures, the rate of laborers in the fields continued to be not brought to a trial; the greater number escaped censure, either from the superior cunning of the felons, the remissness of the magistrates, or the foolish lenity of the people: that the rapines committed by the infinite number of wicked, wandering, idle people, were intolerable to the poor countrymen, and obliged them to keep a perpetual watch over their sheepfolds, their pastures, their woods, and all their other belongings. And England were in no better condition than Somersetsshire; and many of them were even in a worse; that there was at least three or four hundred able-bodied vagabonds in every county who-lived by theft and rapine; and who, sometimes by such strange and unforeseen ways that though the innocent people were not the sufferers, still their property of that kind were assembled, they would be able, if reduced to good subjection, to give the greatest enemy her majesty a strong battle: and that the magistrates themselves were intimidated from executing the laws upon them; and there were instances of justices of peace, who, after giving sentence against rogues, had interposed to stop the execution of their own sentence, on account of the danger which hung over them, from the confederates of the felons.

In the year 1575, the queen complained in parliament of the bad execution of the laws; and threatened, that if the magistrates were not for the future more vigilant, she would intrust authority to indigent and needy persons, who would find an interest in a more exact administration of justice.5 It appears that she was as good as her word. For in the year 1601 there were great complaints made in parliament, that there was too great a difference between these sermons, and discourses published by authority, avowed by the prince and council, and promulgated to the whole nation. So thoroughly were these principles imbibed by the people, during the reign of Elizabeth and her predecessors, that opposition to them was regarded as the most flagrant sedition, and was not even rewarded by that public praise and approbation which can alone support port men under such dangers and difficulties as attend them in this realm of tyrannical authority. It was only during the next generation that the noble principles of liberty took root, and spreading themselves under the shelter of parliamantal absurdities, became fashionable among the people. We shall close the present appendix with a brief account of the revenues, the military force, the commerce, the arts, and the learning of England during this period.

Queen Elizabeth's economy was remarkable; and in some instances seemed to border on the absurd. The smallest expense, if it could possibly be spared, appeared considerable in her eyes; and even the charge of an express during the most delicate transactions was not below her notice.6 She was also attentive to every profit; and embraced opportunities of gain which many appeared to despise. The French ambassador, for instance, the see of Ely vacant nineteen years, in order to retain the revenue;7 and it was usual with her, when she promoted a bishop, to take the opportunity of pilgaging the see of some of its monks.8 But that in reality there was little or no avarice in the queen's temper, appears from this circumstance, that she never amassed any treasure; and even refused subsidies from the parliament when she had no present occasion for them. Yet we must not conclude, from this circumstance, that her economy proceeded from a tender concern for her people: she loaded them with monopolies and exclusive patents, which are much more oppressive than the most heavy taxes levied in an equal and regular manner. The real source of her frugal conduct was derived from her desire of independence, and her care to preserve her wealth, which could have been endangered had she reduced herself to the necessity of having frequent recourse to parliamentary supplies. In consequence of this motive, the queen, though engaged in successions and necessary wars, thought it more expedient to make a continual dissipation of the royal demesnes, than demand the most moderate supplies from the Commons. As she lived unmarried, and had no posterity, she was confirmed in her prudent economy. Long after the deaths of her successors, who, by reason of this policy, joined to other circumstances, found themselves, on a sudden, reduced to the most extreme indigence.

The splendor of a court was, during this age, a great part of the public charge; and as Elizabeth was a single woman, and expensive in no kind of magnificence, except clothes, this circumstance enabled her to perform great things by her narrow revenue. She is said to have paid four millions of debts, left on the crown by her father, brother, and sister; an incredible sum for that age.1 The States, at the time of her death, owed her about eight hundred thousand pounds; and the King of France, four hundred and fifty thousand.2 Though this prince was extremely frugal, and, after the peace of Verrins, was continually amusing treasure, the queen never could, by the most pressing importunities, prevail on him to make payment of those sums which she had so generously advanced him. Surviving his generous promise, to the sum of twelve thousand crowns, and another of fifty thousand, were all she could obtain by the strongest representations she could make of the difficulties to which the rebellion in Ireland had reduced her.3 The queen expended on the wars with Spain, between the years 1589 and 1593, the sum of one million three hundred thousand pounds, besides the pittance of a double subsidy, amounting to two hundred and eighty thousand pounds granted her parliament.4 In the year 1599, she spent six hundred thousand pounds in six months, on the service of Ireland.5 Sir Robert Cecil, affirmed, that in ten years Ireland cost her three millions four hundred thousand pounds.6 She gave the Earl of Essex a present of thirty thousand pounds, upon his departure for the government of that kingdom.7 Lord Burleigh computed, that the value of the gifts conferred on that favourite amounted to three hundred thousand pounds; a sum which, though probably exaggerated, is a proof of her strong affection towards him.8 It was a common saying during this reign, The queen pays bountifully, though she rewards sparingly.9

In the year 1599, the queen raised the customs from fourteen thousand pounds a-year to fifty thousand, and obliged Sir Thomas Smythe, who had farmed them, to refund to some of his former profits. This increase of the revenue was owing to the suggestions of one Caermerthen; and was opposed by Burleigh, Leicester, and Walsingham: but the queen's perseverance overcame all their opposition. The great undertakings which she executed with so narrow a revenue, and with such small supplies, prove the mighty effects of wisdom and economy. She received from the parliament, during the course of her whole reign, only twenty subsidies and first patent to the East Indin company: the stock of that company was seventy-two thousand pounds; and they fitted out four ships, under the command of James Lancaster, for the prosecution of trade. The adventure was unsuccessful; and the ships returning with a rich cargo, encouraged the company to continue the commerce.

I own that this last sum allows a great deal more likely. The whole revenue of Queen Elizabeth, for the year 1601, was computed by Sir John Harington, who lived from 1575 to 1641, in his book, vol. i. 76. 77. 89.

The communication with Muscovy had been opened in Queen Elizabeth's time, by the dispatch of the passage of Archangel: but the commerce to that country did not begin to be carried on to a great extent till about the year 1565. The queen obtained from the czar an exclusive privilege for five years, by which the English merchants were fitted with the sole trade of Muscovy and she entered into a personal as well as national alliance with him. This czar was named John Basildon, a furious tyrant, who, continually suspecting the revolt of his subjects, stipulated to have a safe retreat and protection in England. In order the better to insure this resource, he was purposed to marry an English woman; and the queen intended to have sent him Lady Anne Hastings, daughter of the Earl of Huntingdon: but when the lady was informed of the barbarous manners of the country, she wisely declined purchasing an empire at the expense of her ease and safety. 1

The English, encouraged by the privileges which they had obtained from Basildon, ventured further into the countries than any Europeans had formerly done. They transported their goods along the river Dvina, in boats made of one entire tree, which they towed and rowed up the river as far as Valoga. They carried commodities seven days' journey by land to Yerselau, and then down the Volga to Astrakan. At Astrakan they built ships, crossed the Caspian sea, and distributed their manufactures into Ferra. But this bold attempt met with such disappointments as to make it appear to them what disadvantage and danger mankind are in, when it was otherwise considered. 2

After the death of John Basildon, his son Theodore renounced the privilege which the English enjoyed for a monopoly of the Russian trade: when the queen remonstrated against this innovation, he told her ministers, that privileges must carry an indifferend hand, as well between their subjects as between foreigners; and not convert trade, which by the laws of nations ought to be common to all, into a monopoly for the private gain of a few. So much just notions of commerce were entertained by this barbarian than appear in the conduct of the renowned Queen Elizabeth! Theodore, however, continued some privileges to the English, on account of the then having the discoveries of the commerce between Europe and his country.

The trade to Turkey commenced about the year 1583; and that commerce was immediately confined to a company by Queen Elizabeth. Before that time the Grand Sultan of Turkey had been dependent on England to be a dependent province of France; 3 but, having heard of the queen's power and reputation, he gave a good reception to the English, and even granted them larger privileges than he had granted to the French.

The merchants of the Hanse-towns complained loudly, in the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, of the treatment which they had received in the reigns of Edward and Mary. She prudently replied, that as she would not innovate any thing, she would still protect them in their immunities and privileges of which she found them possessed. This answer not contenting them, their commerce was soon after suspended for a time, to the great advantage of the English merchants, who tried what they could themselves effect for promoting their commerce. They took the whole trade into their own hands; and, their returns proving successful, they divided themselves into staplers and merchant-adventurers, the former residing constantly at one place, and the latter trying their fortunes in other towns and states abroad with cloth and other manufactures. This success so enraged the Hanse-towns, that they tried all the methods to oblige the English merchants to return, and obtained sixty of their ships, which had been seized in the river Tagus with contraband goods of the Spaniards. These ships the queen intended to have restored, as desiring to have compromised all differences with those trading states; but when she was informed that many were in a very bad condition, a time was assigned to her at her desire, for the making up of the same; 4 by the practice of the merchants, who carried on their trade in foreign bottoms, 5 yet, before the year 1640, that number of seamen was tried in England.

The navy was increased to its full extent, so that it could appear considerable, when we reflect that only on the number of vessels, which were forty-two: but when we consider that none of these ships carried above forty guns, that for the most part there were but two ships of a thousand tons; and twenty-three below five hundred, some of fifty, and some even of twenty tons; and that the whole number of guns belonging to the fleet, were never more than seventy-four, 6 we must entertain a contemptible idea of the English navy, compared to the force which it has now attained. 7 In the year 1588, there were not above five vessels fitted out by the noblemen and sea-ports which exceeded two hundred tons.

In the year 1599, an alarm was given of an invasion by the Spaniards; and the queen equipped a fleet and levied an army in a fortnight to oppose them. Nothing gave the foreigners more just cause of the power of England than this sudden armament.

In the year 1573, all the militia in the kingdom were computed at a hundred and eighty-two thousand; and in the year 1595, of one hundred and forty thousand. A distribution was made in the year 1595, of one hundred and forty thousand, besides those which Wales could supply. 8 These arms were formidable by their numbers; but their discipline and experience were not proportionate. Small bodies from Dunkirk and Newport frequently ran over and plundered the east coast: so unfit was the militia, as it was express only the taking of exorbitant and illegal interest.

An act, passed in 1571, violently condemns all usury; but permits ten per cent. interest to be paid. Henry IV. of France reduced it to six per cent. to meet the great advance of France above England in commerce.

Dr. Howel says,1 that Queen Elizabeth, in the third of her reign, was presented with a pair of black silk stockings, by her silk woman, and never wore cloth hose any more. The author of the present state of England says, that about 1577, pocket watches were first brought into England from Germany. They are thought to have been invented at Nuremberg. About 1580, the importation of these convenient instruments of novel and curious fashion was so much increased, that the queen, on public occasions, rode behind her chamberlain.

Cromwell says, that in 1581, Randolph, so much employed by the queen in foreign enterprises, possessed the office of postmaster-general of England. It appears, therefore, that posts were then established; though from Charles 1's regulations in 1635, it would seem that few posthouses were erected before that time.

In a remonstrance of the Hanne-town to the diet of the empire in 1592, it is affirmed that England exported annually about 200,000 pieces of cloth.2 This number seems to be much exaggerated.

In the fifth of this reign was enacted the first law for the relief of the poor.

A judicious author of that age confirms the vulgar observation, that the kingdom was depopulating from the increase of enclosures and decay of tillage; and he ascribes the reason very justly to the restraints put on the exportation of corn; while full liberty was allowed to export all the produce of pasturage, such as wood, hides, leather, tallow, &c. These prohibitions of exportation were derived from the prerogative, and were very injudicious.

The queen, once, on the commencement of her reign, had tried a contrary practice, and with good success. From the same author we learn, that the companies, then held to be of the last century, concerning the high prices of every thing.3 There seems, indeed, to have been two periods in which prices rose remarkably in England, namely, that in Queen Elizabeth's reign, when they are computed to have doubled; and that in the present age.

Between the two there seems to have been a stagnation. It would appear that industry, during that intermediate period, increased as fast as gold and silver, and kept commodities nearly at a par with money.

There were two attempts made in this reign to settle colonies in America; one by Sir Humphry Gilbert in Newfoundland, another by Sir Walter Raleigh in Virginia: but neither of these colonies had proved successful. All those noble settlements were made in the following reigns. The current specie of the kingdom in the end of this reign is computed at four millions.4

The Earl of Leicester desired Sir Francis Walsingham, then ambassador in France, to provide him with a new master in that country, to whom he promises a hundred pounds a-year, beside maintaining himself and servant, and a couple of horses. "I know," says the Earl, "that such a man as I want may receive higher wages in France; but let him consider, that a shilling in England goes as far as two shillings in France."5 It is known that every thing was much changed since that time.

The nobility in this age still supported, in some degree, the ancient magnificence in their hospitality, and in the numbers of their retainers; and the queen found it prudent to retrench, by proclamation, their expenses in this last particular. The expense of hospitality she somewhat encouraged by the frequent visits she paid her nobility, and the sumptuous feasts which she received from them.6

The Earl of Leicester gave her an entertainment in Kenilworth castle, which was extraordinary for expense and munificence other particulars. We are told that three hundred and sixty-five long造假s of beer were drunk at it. The Earl had fortified this castle at great expense; and it contained arms for ten thousand men. The Earl of Leicester had a family consisting of two hundred and forty servants. Some remarks it as a singular proof of beneficence in this nobleman, that he was contented with his rent from his tenants, and exacted not any extraordinary revenues, to purchase the great pietas of the sovereign (what was almost unavoidable) he had very generally countenanced the nobility in tyrannizing over the people. Burleigh, though he was frugal, and had no paternal estate, kept a family consisting of a hundred servants. He had a standing table for gentlemen, and two other tables for persons of meaner condition, which were always served alike, whether he were in town or in the country. About his person he had people of great distinction, inasmuch that he could reckon up twenty gentlemen retainers, who had each a thousand pounds a-year; and as many among his ordinary servants, who were worth from a thousand pounds to three, five, ten, and twenty thousand pounds. It is to be remarked, that though the revenues of the crown were at that time very small, the ministers and courtiers sometimes found means, by employing the boundless prerogative, to acquire greater fortunes than it is possible for them to present to amass, from their salary, and from the management of their employments.

Burleigh entertained the queen several times in his country house, where she remained three, four, or five weeks at a time. Each visit cost him two or three thousand pounds. The quantity of silver plate possessed by this nobleman is surprising: no less than fourteen or fifteen thousand pounds' weight; which, besides the fashion, would be above forty-two thousand pounds sttering in value. Yet Burleigh left only four thousand pounds a-year in land, and 14,000 pounds in money; and as land was then commonly sold at ten years' purchase, his plate was nearly equal to all the rest of his fortune. It appears that the little wealth which was then put upon the fashion of the plate, which probably was but rude: the weight was chiefly considered.

But, though there were preserved great remains of the ancient customs, the nobility were by degrees acquiring a taste for elegant luxury; and many edifices in particular which had been built by them, next, large, and sumptuous, to the great ornament of the kingdom, says Camden; but to the no less decay of the glorious hospitality of the nation. It is of some concern to remark, that the cost of expense of this sort has been so great as this turn of expense promoted arts and industry; while the ancient hospitality was the source of vice, disorder, sedition, and idleness.

The external species of luxury, that of apparel began much to increase during this age; and the queen thought proper to restrain it by proclamation. Her example was very little conformable to her edicts. As no woman was ever more conceited of her beauty, or more desirous of making impression on the hearts of beholders, no one ever went to a greater extravagance in apparel, or studied more the variety and richness of her dresses. She appeared almost every day in different habit; and tried all the several modes by which she hoped to render herself agreeable. She was also so fond of her clothes, that she never could part with any of them; and at her death she had in her wardrobe all the different habits, to the number of three thousand, which she had ever worn in her lifetime.

The renunciation of the ancient hospitality, and the diminution of retainers, were favourable to the prerogative of the sovereign; and, by disabling the great noblemen from resistance, promoted the execution of the laws, and the maintenance of the courts of justice. There were many peculiar causes in the situation and character of Henry VII. which augmented the authority of the crown: most of these causes concurred in succeeding princes; but the particular acquisition of the supremacy, a most important article of prerogative: but the manners of the age were a general cause which operated during this whole period, and which continually tended to diminish the riches, and still more the power of the aristocracy, so formidable to the crown. The habits of luxury dissipated the immense fortunes of the ancient barons; and as the new methods of expense gave subsistence to mechanics and merchants, who lived in an independent manner on the fruits of their own industry, a nobleman, instead of that unlimited descendant which he was wont to assume over those who were maintained at his board, or subsisted by salaries conferred on them, retained only that moderate influence which customers have over tradesmen, and which can never be dangerous to civil government. The landed proprietors also, having a greater demand for money than for men, endeavoured to turn their lands to the best advantage, and more regard was paid to increasing their fields, or joining many small farms into a few large ones, disposed those useless hands which formerly were always at their call in every attempt to subvert the government, or oppose a neighbouring baron. By all these means the cities increased; the middle rank of men began to be rich and powerful; the prince, who in effect was the same with the law, was implicitly obeyed; and though the further progress of the same cause brought about a new plan of liberty, founded on the privileges of the Commons, yet in the interval between the fall of the nobles and the rise of this order, the sovereign took advantage of the present situation, and assumed an authority almost absolute.

Whatever may be commonly imagined, from the authority of Lord Bacon, and from that of Harrington, and later authors, the laws of Henry VII. contributed very little towards the great revolution which happened about this period in the English constitution. The practice of breaking entails by a fire and recovery had been introduced in the preceding reign; and this prize only gave rise to another dissipation of the wealth and substance of some abusers which attended it. But the settled authority which he acquired to the crown, enabled the sovereign to encroach on the separate jurisdictions of the barons, and produced a more general reliance on the public force of the laws. The counties palatine underwent the same fate as the feudal powers; and by a statute of Henry VIII. the jurisdiction of these counties was annexed to the crown, and all writs were ordained to run in the king's name. But the change of manners was the chief cause of the secret revolution of government, and substituted the power of the barons. There appear still in this reign some remains of the ancient slavery of the poor and peasants, but none of freemen.

Learning, on its revival, was held in high estimation by the English princes and nobles; and it was not yet prostituted by being too commonly to be given to each legatee, and appoints a goldsmith to see it weighed out to them, without making any distinction of the pieces. 1 Page 647.

2 Harrington says, 'The greatest part was in building the citels and good towns of the country; only of thirty shillings a year.' It is surprising to keep out the wind. Cotton, this rude brick building might dispel the nazaries in Queen Mary's dark to wonder; but, although they saw that large door was used in many of those noblest cottages, much more the commoner sort of men, that they might in a large house have a place to keep out the wind. The author, in his chief work, has the most exact and minute account of the state of the English church in his time, and must have had an extensive field for his labours. The bishopric of Bruges, which he knew, was of the two dioceses which were commonly impartial, either French, rel. or. French. Even thus a la.
mon, even the great deemed it an object of ambition to tain a character for literature. The four successive sovereigns, Henry, Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth, may, on one occasion, standing all the usual habits of authors, Queen Catherine Parr translated a book: Lady Jane Gray, considering her age, and her sex, and her station, may be regarded as a prodigy of literature. Sir Thomas Smith was raised from being a professor in Cambridge,
first to be ambassador to France, then secretary of state.
The despatches of those times, and among others those of Burleigh himself, are frequently interlarded with quotations from the Greek and Latin classics. Even the laws of our land are derive knowledge: Lady Burleigh, Lady Bacon, and their two sisters, were mistresses of the ancient as well as modern languages; and placed more pride in their erudition than in their rank and quality.

Queen Elizabeth wrote and translated several books;
and she was familiarly acquainted with the Greek as well as Latin tongues. It is pretended that she made an extensive study in Greek to the university of Cambridge, who had addressed her in that language. It is certain that she answered in Latin without premeditation, and in a very spirited manner, to the Polish ambassador, who had been wanting in respect to a minister of her court. She was so moved about her hearters, and said, "God’s death
my lords!" (for she was much addicted to swearing). "I have been forced this day to scour up my old Latin, that hath long lain rusting." 5 Elizabeth, even after she was queen, and when it was much more prudent to demonstrate an author; and, next to her desire of ambition for beauty, this seems to have been the chief object of her vanity. She translated Boethius of the Consolation of Philosophy; in order, as she pretended, to allay her grief for Henry IV’s change of religion. As far as we can judge from Elizathet’s compositions, we may pronouuce, that notwithstanding her application and her excellent parts, her taste in literature was but indifferent; she was much inferior to her niece in this particular, who was himself so perfected model of eloquence.

Unhappily for literature, at least for the learned of this age, the queen’s vanity lay more in shining by her own learning, than in encouraging men of genius by her liberality. Spenser himself, the finest English writer of his age, was long neglected; and after the death of Sir Philip Sidney, his patron, was allowed to die almost for want. This poet contains great beauties, a sweet and harmonious versification, easy elocution, a fine imagination. Yet does the perusal of his work become so tedious, that one never finishes it from the mere pleasure which it affords: it soon becomes a kind of task-reading; and its effects soon wears out, and end to the end of his long performance.
This effect, of which every one is conscious, is usually ascribed to the change of manners: but man-ers have more changed since Homer’s age; and yet that poet now remains all the favourite of every reader of taste and judgment. Homer copied true natural manners, which, however rough or uncultivated, will always form an agreeable and interesting picture: but the pencil of the Engish poet was employed in drawing the affections, and concepts, and powers of choleric, which appear ridiculous
as soon as they lose the recommendation of the mode.
The tediousness of continued allegory, and that too seldom strict or ingenious, has also contributed to render the Forty Poets peculiarly tiresome; not to mention the too great frequency of its descriptions, and the laegour of its stanzas.

Upon the whole, Spenser maintains his place

5. The following are the words of Roger Ascham, the queen’s preceptor:

"Is it your pleasure, I will speak to you, all you young gentlemen of England, that have not the least knowledge of the Latin tongue, and know not what it is to be?” Point out six of the best given gentlesmen, and recommend yourselves to one of these men, and pray, that God spare not so much time, haste not so many hours darkly, severely, of-fendously, but turn your learning and studies to good and honest use, and the knowledge of Christ’s true religion, count this the great-lest it excel, and never mistake what different sort of things these are, but not with the knowledge of men’s affairs. This is the best sort of learning: it will contribute to your advantage in the world, and give you the power of beholding the excellency of Christ’s true religion. This is the best sort of

The reign of James I.

I. The Reign of James I.

It may not be improper, at this period, to make a pause;
and to take a survey of the state of the kingdom with regard to government, manners, finances, arms, trade, learning. Where a just notion is not formed of these particulars, history can be little instructive, and often will not be intelligible.

We may safely pronounce, that the English government, at the accession of the Scottish monarch, was in a state of great decay, and Little strength present; the prerogative less limited, the liberties of the subject less accurately defined and secured. Without mentioning other particulars, the courts alone of high commission and star-chamber were sufficient to lay the whole kingdom at the mercy of the prince.

The court of high commission had been erected by Elizabeth, in consequence of an act of parliament, passed in the beginning of her reign; by this act, it was thought proper, during the progress of religion, to arm the sovereign with full powers, in order to discourage and suppress opposition. All appeals from the inferior ecclesiastical courts were carried before the high commission;
and, of consequence, the whole life and doctrine of the clergy lay directly under its inspection. Every breach of the act of uniformity, every refusal of the ceremonies, was cognizable in this court; and during the reign of Elizaabeth, had been punished by deprivation, by fine, confiscation, and imprisonment. James contented himself with the gentleman penalty of deprivation; nor was that punishment inflicted with rigour on every offender. Archiship Spotswood tells us, that he was informed by Bancroft, the archbishop, several years after the king’s accession, that more than forty-five clergymen had then been deprived.
All the catholics too were liable to be punished by this court, if they exercised any act of their religion, or sent abroad
their children or other relations, to receive that education which they could not procure them in their own country.
Popish priests were thrown into prison, and might be deferred over to the law, which punished them with death;
though that severity had been sparingly exercised by Elizabeth, and never almost by James. In a word, that liberty of conscience, which we so highly and so justly value at present, was totally suppressed; and no exercise of any religion, but the established, was permitted throughout the kingdom. Any word or writing, which tended thereby heresy or schism, was punishable by the high commissioners, or any three of them: they alone were

1. The history of the house of Stuart was written and published by the author before the history of the house of Tudor. Hence it happens, that some passages, particularly in the present Appendix, may be to reference of what was formerly delivered in the reign of Elizabeth.
This is not the worse for that objection, as it has cancelled some few passages for the foregoing chapters.
judges what expressions had that tendency: they proceeded not by information, but upon rumour, suspicion, or according to their discretion: they administered an oath, but disclosed the partaker before the hour was bound to answer any question which should be propounded to him. Who ever refused this oath, though he pleaded ever so justly, that he might thereby be brought to accuse himself, or his dearest friend, was punishable by imprisonment; and, in after times, by his execution. He who resistance, and his ofplaces, was erected in the kingdom. Full discretionary powers were bestowed with regard to the inquiry, trial, sentence, and penalty inflicted; excepting only that corporal punishment was not inflicted, but the guilt was made a matter of appeal to the court which created the court, not by the act of parliament which empowered him. By reason of the uncertain limits which separate ecclesiastical from civil causes, all accusations of adultery and incest were tried by the court of high commission; and every complaint of wives against their husbands was there examined and discussed. On like pretences, every cause which regarded conscience, that is, every cause, could have been brought under their jurisdiction.

But there was a sufficient reason, why the king would not be solicitous to stretch the jurisdiction of this court: the star-chamber possessed the same authority in civil matters as they did in such circumstances, as equally arbitrary and unlimited. The origin of this court was derived from the most remote antiquity; it though it is pretended, that its power had first been carried to the greatest height by Henry VII. In all times, however, it is considered that the absolute authority, no time was ever exercised by any law or statute.

We have had already, or shall have sufficient occasion, during the course of this history, to mention the dispensing power, the power of imprisoning, of accusing laws 4 and benevolence, of pressuring and quartering soldiers, of altering the customs, of erecting monopolies. These breaches of the constitutional liberty of the people, and of the principle of all free government, must, at least, be acknowledged dangerous to freedom in a monarchical constitution, where an eternal jealousy must be preserved against the sovereign, and no discretionary powers must ever be ministered to him, by which the property or personal liberty of any subject can be affected. The kings of England, however, had almost constantly exercised these powers; and if, on any occasion, the prince had been obliged to submit to laws enacted against him, since however, in practice, studied these laws, and returned to the same arbitrary administration. During almost three centuries before the accession of James, the regal authority, in all these particulars, had never once been called in question. We may add, however, that the practice of the crown in general, which prevailed during that age, were so favourable to monarchy, that they bestowed on it an authority almost absolute and unlimited, sacred and indefeasible.

The measures of Henry VIII. were more violent; their sessions so short, compared to the vacations; that, when their eyes were turned upwards in search of sovereign power, the prince alone was apt to strike them as the only parliamentary institution, invested with the whole majesty and authority of the state. The great compliance too of parliaments during so long a period, had extremely degraded and obscured those assemblies; and as all instances of opposition to prerogative must have been drawn from a posture of weakness; and those popular assemblies were supposed to form only the ornament of the fabric, without being in any degree essential to its being and existence. The prerogative of the crown was represented by an extent of power over the external and internal essentials of the schools which no time or force could alter. The sanction of religion was by divines called in aid; and the Monarch of heavens was supposed to be interested in the government, and those popular assemblies was supposed to form only the ornament of the fabric, without being in any degree essential to its being and existence. which began to be promulgated by the puritanical party.

In consequence of these excited ideas of knotty authority, the event which now preceded, was by many supposed to possess an inexhaustible fund of latent powers which might be exerted on every emergency. In every government, necessity, when real, supersedes all laws and levels all limitations; but in the reign of James, James had incurred blame on account of his edicts, it is only because he too frequently issued them at a time when they began to be less regarded, than he was not assumed or extended to an unusual degree that exercise of authority. Of his maxims in a parallel case, the following is a pretty remarkable instance.

Queen Elizabeth had appointed commissioners for the inspection of prisons, and had bestowed on them full discretion, to adjudge all infringements between preachers and their creditors to compound debts, and to give liberty to such debtors as they found honest and unsovereign. From the uncertain and undefined nature of the English constitution, doubts sprang up in many, that this commission was contrary to law; and it was represented in that light to James. He forbore therefore renewing the commission till the fifteenth of his reign; when complaints rose so high, with regard to the abuses practised in prisons, that James thought proper to dissolve it, and to appoint new commissioners invested with the same discretionary powers which Elizabeth had formerly conferred.

Upon the whole, we must conceive that monarchy, on the accession of the house of Stuart, was possessed of a very extensive authority: an authority, in the judgment of all, not exactly limited; in the judgment of some, not limited. But, at the same time, this authority was for ever repressed by the great parliamentary influence by ancient precedent and example. It was not supported either by money or by force of arms. And, for this reason, we need not wonder that the princes of that line were so extremely jealous of their prerogatives; being sensible that when those claims were ravished from them, they possessed no influence by which they could maintain their dignity, or support the laws. By the changes which have since been introduced, the liberty and independence of individuals has been rendered more complete, and national security; that of the public more uncertain and precarious. And it seems a necessary, though perhaps a melancholy, truth, that in every government, the magistrature must either partake the constitution of the society, or be excluded and abandoned in its whole, or part of its discretionary powers, in order to execute the laws and support his own authority.

Ecclesiastical
We have had occasion to remark, in so great a government, that many instances, the bigotry which prevailed in that age, that we can look for no toleration among the different sects. Two Anans, under the title of heretics, were punished by fire during this period; and no one reign since the Reformation had been free from like barbarities. Stowe says, that these Anans were offered their pardon at the stake, if they would merit it by a recantation. A madman who called himself the Holy Ghost, was, without any indulgence for his frenzy, condemned to the same punishment. The government punished the twenty principal men, a full, entire, unqualified liberty; that of the public more uncertain and precarious. And it seems a necessary, though perhaps a melancholy, truth, that in every government, the magistrature must either partake the constitution of the society, or be excluded and abandoned in its whole, or part of its discretionary powers, in order to execute the laws and support his own authority.

The liberty of the press was incompatible with such maxims and such principles of government as then prevailed, and was therefore quite unknown in that age. Besides employing the two terrible courts of star-chamber and high commission, whose powers were unlimited, Queen Elizabeth exerted her authority by restraints upon the press. She passed a decree in her court of star-chamber, that is, by her own will and pleasure, forbidding any book to be printed in any place but in London, Oxford, and Cambridge; and another, in which she prohibited, under severe penalties, the publishing of any book or pamphlet against the form or meaning of any restraint or ordinance, contained in any act of parliament, or in any statute, or in any injunction made or set forth by her majesty or her privy-council, or against the true sense or meaning of any letters patent, commissions, or prohibitions under the great seal of England. James extended the same penalties to the importing of such books from abroad.

And to render these edicts more effectual, he afterwards inflicted the printing of any book without a licence from the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of London, or the vice-chancellor of one of the universities, or of some person appointed by them.

In consequence of the systems of modern theology, we may observe, that the doctrine of absolute decrees has ever been intimately connected with the enthusiastic spirit; as that doctrine affords the highest subject of contemplation, and security to the supposed elect, and exalts them by infinite degrees above the rest of mankind. All the first reformers adopted these principles; and the Jansenists too, a fanatical sect in France, not to mention the Mahometans in Asia, have ever embraced them. Several establishments were subjected to episcopal jurisdiction, their enthusiastic genius gradually decayed, and men had leisure to perceive the absurdity of supposing God to punish by infinite torments what he himself from all eternity had unchangeably decreed. The king, though at this time his Calvinistic education had riveted him in the doctrine of absolute decrees, yet, being a zealous partisan of episcopacy, was insensibly engaged, towards the end of his reign, to favour the milder theology of Arminius. Even in so great a doctor, the genus of the religion prevailed over its speculative tenets; and with him the whole clergy gradually dropped the more rigid principles of absolute repudiation and unconditional decrees; but he was at first influenced; but being drowned in the fury of factions and civil wars which ensued, the scholastic arguments made an insignificant figure amidst those violent disputes about civil and ecclesiastical power which the nation was agitated. And at the restoration, the church, though she still retained her old subscriptions and articles of faith, was found to have totally changed her speculative doctrines, and to have embraced tenets more suitable to the genius of her discipline and worship, without its being possible to assign the precise period in which the alteration was produced.

It may be worth observing, that James, from his great degree of reverence of the monarchical divinity, erected a college at Chelsea for the entertainment of twenty persons, who should be entirely employed in refuting the papists and puritans. All the efforts of the great Bacon could not procure an establishment for the cultivation of natural philosophy: even to this day, no society has been instituted for the polishing and fixing of our language. The only encouragement which the sovereign in England has ever given to any thing that has the appearance of science, was this short-lived establishment of James; an institution quite superfluous, considering the unhappy propension which at that time so universally possessed the nation for polemical theologians.

Manners.

The manners of the nation were agreeable to the monarchical government which prevailed; and contained not that strange mixture which at present distinguishes England from all other countries. Such violent extremes were then unknown of industry, delicacy, frugality and profusion, civility and rusticity, fanaticism and scepticism. Candour, sincerity, modesty, are the only qualities which the English of that age possessed in common with the present.

High pride of family then prevailed; and it was by a dignity and statefulness of behaviour, that the gentry and nobility distinguished themselves from the common people. Great riches acquired by commerce were more rare, and had not yet been able to confound the rich and poor, and render money the chief foundation of distinction. Much ceremony took place in the common intercourse of life, and little familiarity was indulged by the great. The advantages which result from opulence are so solid and real, that those who are possessed of them need not dread the near approaches of their inferiors. The distinctions of birth and title being more empty and imaginary, soon vanish upon finer approaches and acquaintance.

The expenses of the greater part of the nobility are now, and show, a numerous retinue, rather than in convenience and true pleasure. The Earl of Nottingham, in his embassy to Spain, was attended by 500 persons. The Earl of Hertford, in that to Brussels, carried 300 gentlemen along with him. Lord Bacon has remarked, that the English nobility in his time maintained a larger retinue of servants than the nobility of any other nation, except, perhaps, the Polonians.

Civil honours, which now hold the first place, were at that time subordinate to the military. The young gentry and nobility, and sometimes of distinguishing themselves in arms. The fury of duels, too, prevailed more than at any time before or since. This was the turn that the romantic chivalry, for which the nation was formerly so renowned, had lately taken.

Liberty of commerce between the sexes was indulged; but without any licentiousness of manners. The court was very little an exception to this observation. James had rather entertained an aversion and contempt for the females, nor were those young couriers, of whom he was so fond, able to break through the established manners of the nation.

The first sedan-chair seen in England was in this reign, and was used by the Duke of Buckingham to give great indignation of the people, who exclaimed, that he was employing his fellow-creatures to do the service of beasts. The country life prevails at present in England beyond any cultivated nation of Europe; but it was then much more general. All the fine arts, all the sciences, all the arts of pleasures, and social commerce, was just beginning to produce an inclination for the softer and more civilized life of the city. James discouraged, as much as possible, such alterations in this respect, and repeated to his ministers, "the country gentlemen, to go from London to their country seats. And sometimes he would say thus to them: Gentlemen, at London, you are like ships in a sea, which show like nothing; but in your country villages you are like ships in a river, which look like great things." He was not content with reproof and exhortation. As Queen Elizabeth had perceived with regret the increase of the London, and had restrained all public proclamation; James, who found that these edicts were not exactly obeyed, frequently renewed them; though a strict execution seems still to have been wanting. He also issued reiterated proclamations in imitation of his predecessor; containing severe menaces against the gentry who lived in town. This policy is contrary to that which has ever been practised by all princes who studied the increase of their authority. To allure the nobility to court, to engage them in expensive pleasures or employments, and to dissipate their fortune; to increase their subjection to ministers by attendance; to weaken their authority in the provinces by absence; these have been the common arts of arbitrary government. But James was so far from having laid no plan for extending his power, had not money to support a splendid court, or dowry on a numerous retinue of gentry and nobility. He thought, too, that by their living together, they became more sensible of their own strength, and were apt to indulge too curious researches into matters of government. To remedy the present evil, he was desirous of dispersing them into their country-seats; where, he hoped, they would bear a more submissive reverence to his authority, and receive less support from each other. But the contrary effect soon followed. The riches amassed during their residence at home rendered them independent. The influence acquired by them in the several ranks of the kingdom would not be led by the court: they could not be driven: and thus the system of the English government received a total and a sudden alteration in the course of less than forty years.

The first rise of commerce and the arts had contributed, in preceding reigns, to scatter those immense fortunes of the barons which rendered them so formidable both to king and people. The further progress of these advantages began during the reign of Henry VIII., and the new land; and by both events, the gentry, or that rank which composed the House of Commons, enlarged their power and authority. The early improvements in luxury were seized by the greater nobles, whose fortunes placing them above frugality, or even calculation, were soon dissipated in expensive pleasures. These improvements reached, at last, all men of property; and those of slender fortunes, with some particular care. The state, rising, not only to that of a rank immediately above them, reduced themselves to poverty. Their lands, coming to sale, swelled the estates of those who possessed riches sufficient for the fashionable expenses; but these were not exempted from some care and attention to their domestic economy.

The gentry, also, of that age, were engaged in no expense, except that of country hospitality. No taxes were levied, no wars waged, no attendance at court expected, no banquets necessary to regain credit. The human nature ever reach happiness, the condition of the English gentry, under so mild and benign a prince, might merit that appellation.

The account of the king's revenue, as it stood in 1617, is thus stated: 1. Of crown lands, 80,000 pounds a-year; by customs and new impositions, near 190,000; by woads, and other various branches of revenue, besides purveyances, 180,000. The whole amounting to 450,000. The king's ordinary disbursements, by the same account, are said to exceed this sum thirty-six thousand pounds. 2 All the extraordinary sums which James had raised by subsidies, loans, sale of lands, and other extraordinary means, was two millions two hundred thousand pounds: of which the sale of lands afforded seven hundred thousand, and the revenue of the extraordinaire, and the extraordinary disbursements of the king amounted to two millions; besides above four hundred thousand pounds given in presents. Upon the whole, a sufficient reason appears, partly from secondary causes, partly for want of a rigid economy, why the king, even early in his reign, was deeply involved in debt, and found great difficulty to support the government.

Farmers, not commissioners, levied the customs. It seems, indeed, requisite, that the former method should always be tried before the latter, though a preferable one. When men's own interest is concerned, they fall upon a hundred expedients to prevent frauds in the mercantile; and these the public may afterwards imitate, in establishing proper rules for its officers.

The customs were supposed to amount to five per cent. of the value, and were levied upon exports as well as imports. Nay, the imposition upon exports, by Jamaica additions, is said to amount, in some few instances, to twenty-five per cent. Thus practice, so hurtful to industry, prevails still in France, Spain, and most countries of Europe. The customs, in 1604, yielded 127,000 pounds a-year. 3 They rose to 190,000 towards the end of the reign.

Interest, during this reign, was at ten per cent. till 1624, when it was reduced to eight. This high interest is an indication of the great profits and small progress of commerce.

The extraordinary supplies granted by parliament during this whole reign, amounted not to more than 530,000 pounds; which divided among twenty-one years, makes 30,000 pounds a-year. I do not include those supplies, amounting to 300,000 pounds, which were given to the king by his last parliament. These were paid in to their own commissioners; and the expenses of the Spanish war were much more than sufficient to exhaust them. The distressed family of the Palatine was a great burden on James, during part of his reign. The king, it is pretended, possessed not frugality proportioned to the extreme narrowness of his revenue. Splendid equipages, however, he did not affect, nor costly furniture, nor a luxurious table, nor prodigious mistresses. His buildings, too, were not sumptuous; though the Banqueting-house must not be forgotten, as a monument which does honour to his reign. Hunting was his chief amusement, the cheapest pleasure in which a king can indulge himself. His expenses were the effects of liberality, rather than of luxury.

One day, it is said, while he was standing amidst some of his courtiers, who were all employed in comparing the sums of a rank immediately above them, reduced themselves to poverty. Their lands, coming to sale, swelled the estates of those who possessed riches sufficient for the fashionable expenses; but these were not exempted from some care and attention to their domestic economy.

tended to have an eye to ancient estimations, were not bound to observe any such rule; but might rate anew any person, according to his present income. When rents fell, or land was sold off; the stock of every person, which represented these losses, and obtained a diminution of his subsist, but where rents rose, or new lands were purchased, he kept his own secret, and paid no more than for himself. The advantage, therefore, of every change, was taken against the crown; and the crown could obtain the advantage of none. And to make the matter worse, the alterations which happened in property during this age, were generally more favourable to the owners than to the crown. The stock of the greater, or twenty-pound men, went continually to decay; and when their estates were swallowed up by a greater, the new purchaser increased not his subsist. So loose, indeed, is the whole method of rating subsidies, that the wonder is not how the tax should continually diminish; but how it yielded no revenue at all. It became at last so unequal and uncertain, that the parliament was obliged to change it into a land tax. The price of corn during this reign, and that of the other necessaries of life, was no lower, or was rather higher, than at present. By a proclamation of James, establishing public magazines, whenever wheat fell below thirty-two shillings a quarter, the royal officers, or commissioners were empowered to purchase corn for the magazines.

These prices, then, are to be regarded as low; though they would rather pass for high by our present estimation. The usual boreal of the poor in the middle of this century was a forty-pounder, and some of twenty-pounders; the best would, in the greater part of James's reign, was at thirty-three shillings a yard. At present it is not above two-thirds of that value; though it is to be presumed, that our exports in wooden goods are somewhat increased. The finer manufactures, too, by the progress of arts and industry, have rather diminished in price, notwithstanding the great increase of money. In Shakespeare, the hostess tells Falstaff, that the shirts she bought him were holland at eightpence a yard; a high price, even in our day. Examining what is not probable, that the best holland at that time was equal in goodness to the best that can now be purchased. In like manner, a yard of velvet, about the middle of Elizabeth's reign, was valued at two and twenty shillings. It appears from Dr. Birch's Life of Prince Henry, that that prince, by contract with his butcher, paid, near a great a-pound, throughout the year, for all the beef and mutton used in his family. Besides we must consider, that the general turn of that age, which no laws could prevent, was the converting of all land into pasture; a certain proof that the latter was found more profitable, and consequently that all butcher's meat, as well as that of other kind of beast, was then of better quality. These Acts have a regulation of the market, with regard to poultry and some other articles, very early in Charles I.'s reign, and the prices are high. A turker-cock four shillings and sixpence, and a pheasant-cock six, a pheasant-hen five, a partridge one shilling, a goose two, a capon two and sixpence, a pigeon one and sixpence, a rabbit eight-pence, a dray of pigeons six shillings.

We must consider that London at present is more than three times more populous than it was at that time: a circumstance which much increases the price of poultry, and of every thing that can conveniently be brought from a distance; not to mention that these regulations by statute are always calculated to this end. The number of hens continually increased, the market prices. The contractors for victualing the navy were allowed by government eight-pence a day for the diet of each man when in harbour, seven-halfpence when at sea, which would suffice at present. The chief difference in expense between that age and the present consists in the imaginary wants of men, which have since extremely multiplied. These are the principal reasons why James's revenue would go further than the same money in our time; though the difference is not near so great, as was supposed.

The public was entirely free from the danger and expense of a standing army. While James was vying his divine viceroyalty, and banishing his brother's court, he possessed not so much as a single regiment of guards to maintain his extensive claims; a sufficient proof that he sincerely believed his pretensions to be well grounded, and a strong presumption that they would be lasting. And, though his ability was not equal to the undertaking, he made no plausible arguments. The militia of England, amounting to 160,000 men, was the sole defence of the kingdom. It is pretended that they were kept in good order during this reign. The city of London procured officers who had served abroad, and who taught the trained bands their exercise in Artillery-garden; a practice which had been discontinued since 1588. All the counties of England, in emulation of the capital, were fond of showing a well-ordered and well-appointed militia. It appeared that the natural propensity of men towards military shows and exercises will go far, with a little attention in the sovereign, towards exciting and supporting that spirit in any nation.

The property of the Italian bankrupts, or undersell, was divided among their creditors. The debts were settled above this time, so that it was expected by their creditors, more than they could in any other way. The debtors, besides this, were at this time in a better situation, for the publick credit was much higher than at present. This is the reason why the French nation is in a better situation at present than it was at the time of Louis the Fourteenth; and the French nation has a higher credit than it had in the late reign.

The disorder of Ireland obliged James to keep up some forces there, and put him to great expense. The common pay of a private man in the infantry was eightpence a day, and in the horse, a shilling a day. The army was composed of men fit for war, and the private men, we may observe, were drawn from a better rank than at present, and approaching nearer to that of the officers.

In the year 1583 there was a general review made of all the men in England capable of bearing arms; and these were found to amount to 1,172,000 men, according to Raleigh. It is impossible to warrant the exactness of this computation; or, rather, we may fairly presume it to be somewhat inaccurate. But if it approached near the truth, England has probably, since that time, increased in population. The growth of London, in riches and trade, as well as in numbers, is much greater than at present. From 1600 it doubled every forty years; and consequently, in 1680, it contained four times as many inhabitants as at the beginning of the century. It has never been the centre of all the trade in the kingdom; and almost the only town that affords society and amusement. The affection which the English bear to a country life makes the provincial towns be little frequented by the gentry. Nothing but the allurements of the capital, which is favoured by the residence of the king, and by having the seat of government, and of all the courts of justice, can prevail over their passion for their rural villas.

London at this time was almost entirely built of wood, and in every house, was certainly a very ugly chimney. The Earl of Arundel first introduced the general practice of brick buildings.

The navy of England was esteemed formidable in Elizabeth's time, yet it consisted only of thirty-three ships, besides pinnaces. And the largest of these would not equal our fourth rates at present. Raleigh advises never to build a ship of war above 600 tons. James was not negligent of the navy. In five years preceding 1623, he built ten new ships, and expended fifty thousand pounds a-year on the fleet, beside the value of thirty-six thousand pounds in timber, which he annually gave from the sea. The Last ship that had ever come from the English docks was built during this reign. She was only 1400 tons, and carried sixty-four guns. The merchant ships, in cases of necessity, were instantly converted into ships of war. The king affirmed to the parliament, that the navy had never before been in so good a condition.

Every session of parliament during this reign was occupied with complaints concerning the decay of trade, and the growth of poverty; such violent prosperity have men to complain of the present times, and to entertain discontent against their fortune and condition. The king himself was deceived by these popular complaints, and was at a loss to account for the total want of money, which he heard so much exaggerated. It may, however, be affirmed, that during no preceding period of English history, was there a more sensible increase than during the reign of this monarch, of all the advantages which distinguish a flourishing people. Not only the peace which he maintained was favourable to industry and commerce: his turn of mind inclined him to promote the low prices of wool. In its finery, all additions to it must have been the more evident to every eye, which was not blinded by melancholy prejucides.

A account which seems judicious and accurate, it appears that all the seamen employed in the merchant service amounted to 10,000 men, which probably exceeds not the fifth part of their present number. Sir Thomas Overbury says, that the Dutch possessed three times more shipping than the English, but that their vessels were of inferior burden to those of the latter. Sir William Monson computed the English naval power to be little or nothing inferior to the Dutch, which is surely an exaggeration. The Dutch, this time exceeded England with 600 ships; England to Holland with sixty only.

Manufactures. A catalogue of the manufactures, for which the English were then eminent, would appear very considerable, in comparison of those of silk among them at present. Almost all the more elaborate and curious arts were only cultivated abroad, particularly in Italy, Holland, and the Netherlands. Ship-building, and the founding of iron cannon, were the most useful and most successful, yet the Dutch had been more fortunate in that respect than the English; for they had to possess alone the secret of the latter, and great complaints were made every parliament against the exportation of English ordnance.

The commerce of the kingdom consisted in woollen goods. Wool, however, was allowed to be exported, till the nineteenth of the king. Its exportation was then forbidden by proclamation, though that edict was never strictly executed. Most of the cloth was exported raw, and was dyed and dressed by the Dutch; who gained, it is pretended, 700,000 pounds a-year by this manufacture. A proclamation issued by the king against exporting cloth in that condition, had succeeded so well during one year, by the refusal of the Dutch to buy the dressed cloth, that great murmurs arose against it; and this measure was retracted by the king, and complained of by the nation, as if it had been the most impolitic in the world. It seems, indeed, to have been premature.

On Raleigh's account, in his Discoveries of the First Invention of Ships, page 255, is this blank, and there is no room for any figures or years, and was mortenswerd twelve or seventeen. He probably reckoned some to be, premium, which Cooke called doupes. i victory over forces much superior. During the following years, the Dutch company was guilty of great injuries towards the English, in expelling many of their factors, and destroying them and their plantations. Captain Joseph Stins, who had been with the English to the island of Angostura, and the Dutch escaped. Some time after one rich ship was taken by Vice-admiral Merwin; and it was stipulated by the Dutch to pay 70,000 pounds to the English company, in consideration of the losses which that company had sustained from the depredations of the enemy, as well as of reprisals, nor the sense of that friendship which subsisted between England and the States, could restrain the avidity of the Dutch company, or render them equitable in their proceedings towards their allies. Impatient to have the sole possession of the spice trade, which the English then shared with them, they assumed a jurisdiction over a factory of the latter in the island of Amboyna; and on very unprovable and even absent pretences, seized all their factors with their families, and put them to death with the most inhuman tortures. This dismal news arrived in England at the time when James, by the prejudices of his subjects, and the intrigues of his enemies, was constitute

The exports of England from Christmas 1612 to Christmas 1613, are computed at 2,487,435 pounds; the imports at 2,141,151; so that the balance in favour of England amounted to 346,284. But, in the course of the same year, they were 2,320,436 pounds against the export, 2,019,315; which makes a balance of 298,497 pounds against England. The cause of this balances, from 1599 to 1619, amounted to 4,779,314 pounds 13 shillings and 4 pence: a proof that the balance in the main was considerably in favour of the kingdom. As the annual imports and exports together rose to near five millions, and the customs never yielded so much as 200,000 pounds a-year, of which tonnage made a part, it appears that the new rates affixed by James did not, on the whole, amount to one shilling in the pound, and consequently were still inferior to the intention of the original grant of parliament. The East India company usually carried out a third of their cargo in commodities. The trade to Turkey was one of the most important in the nation; and it appeared that copper half-pence and farthings begun to be coined in this reign. Traders had commonly carried on their retail business chiefly by means of ledger tokens. The small silver pennies was soon lost, and at this time was no where to be found. Colonies. What chiefly renders the reign of James memorable, is the commencement of the English colonies in America; colonies established on the eastern coast that has been known in any age or nation. The Spaniards, being the first discoverers of the New World, immediately took possession of the precious mines which they found there; and, by the allurement of great riches, they were tempted to populate their own country, as well as that which they conquered; and added the vice of sloth to those of avidity and barbarity, which had attended their adventurers in those renowned enterprises. That fine coast was entirely neglected, which reaches from St. Augustin to Cape Breton, and which lies in all the temperate climates, is watered by noble rivers, and offers a fertile soil, but nothing more, to the industrious nation. People grown accustomed to industry and independent, who at home increased neither wealth nor populousness, the colonies which were planted along that tract have promoted the navigation, encouraged the industry, and even perhaps multiplied the inhabitants of their mother-country. The spirit of independence, which was reviving in England, here alone forth in its full lustre, and received new accession from the company's character of those who, being discontented with the established church and monarchy, had sought for freedom amidst those savage deserts. Queen Elizabeth had done little more than given a name to the colonies of Virginia; and after the planting of a feeble colony, which quickly decayed, that country was entirely abandoned. But when peace put an end to the military enterprises against Spain, and left ambitious spirits of hopes of making any larger and rapid advances towards honour and fortune, the nation began to send the pacific intentions of its monarch, and to seek a surer, though slower, expedient, for acquiring riches and glory. In 1606, Newport carried over a colony, and began a settlement, which the company, erected by patent for that purpose in London and Bristol, took care to supply with yearly receipts of provisions, utensils, and new inhabitants. About 1609, Argall discovered a more direct and shorter passage to Virginia, and left the tract of the ancient navigators, who had first directed their course southwards to the tropic, sailed westward by means of the trade-winds, and then turned northward, till they reached the English settlements. With the assistance of the supplies of Thomas Gates and Sir George Somers were embarked for Virginia. Somers's ship, meeting with a tempest, was driven into the Bermudas, and laid the foundation of a settlement in that island. Lord Delawar afterwards undertook the English settlements, but notwithstanding all his care, seconded by supplies from James, and by money raised from the first lottery ever known in the kingdom, such difficulties attended the settlement of these colonies, that in 1614 there were not alive more than 400 men, of all that had been sent thither. After supplying themselves with provisions more immediately necessary for the support of life, the new planters began the cultivating of tobacco. James, notwithstanding his intimacy with that drug, which he affirmed to be pernicious to men's morals as well as their health, gave them permission to enter it in England; and he inhibited by proclamation all importation of it from Spain. By degrees new colonies were established in that continent, and gave new names to the places where they settled, leaving that of Virginia to the province first planted. The island of Barbadoes was also planted to this reign. Speculative reasons, during that age, raised many objections to the planting of those remote colonies; and foresaw that, after drauing their mother-country of inhabitants, they would soon shake off her yoke, and erect an independent government in America; but time has shown that the vice was greatly gained by the nation. Generous undertakings, were more just and solid. A mild government and great naval force have preserved, and may still preserve during some time, the dominion of England over her colonies. And under the wise and judicious navigation reaped from these establishments, that more than a fourth of the English shipping is at present computed to be employed in carrying on the traffic with the American settlements. Agriculture was anciently very imperfect in England. The sudden transition, so often mentioned by historians, from the lowest to the highest price of grain, and the prodigious inequality of its value in different years, are sufficient proofs of the produce depended entirely on the seasons, and that art had as yet done nothing to oppose against the injuries of the heavens. During this reign considerable improvements were made, as in most arts, in this, the most beneficial of any. A numerous catalogue might be formed of books and pamphlets treating of husbandry, which were written about this time. The nation, however, was still dependent on foreigners for daily bread; and though various and industrious and independent branch of its commerce, noteworthy its probable increase of people, there was in that period a regular importation from the Baltic, as well as from France; and if it ever stopped, the bad consequences were sensibly felt by the nation. Sir Walter Raleigh, in his Observations, computes, that two millions went out at one time for corn. It was not till the fifth of Elizabeth, that the exportation of corn exceeded the importation. If we turn our eyes to this present age, we see the farmer and the burthened husbandman, and every one who has a farm, laboring to get a subsistence, that agriculture, from that thimble, received new life and vigour.

The endeavours of James, or, more properly speaking, those of the nation, for promoting trade, were attended with greater success for the encouragement of learning. Though the age was by no means destitute of eminent writers, a very bad taste in general prevailed during that period; and the monarch himself was not a little inferiour in it.

Learning On the origin of letters among the Greeks, and arts. the genius of poets and orators, as might naturally be expected, was distinguished by an amiable simplicity, which, whatever rudeness may sometimes attend it, is so fitted to express the genuine movements of nature and passion, that the compositions possessed of it must ever appear valuable to the discerning part of mankind. The glaring figures of discourse, the pointed allusion, the unnatural conceit, the jangle of words; such false ornaments were not employed by early writers; not because they were rejected, but because they scarcely ever occurred to them. An easy unforced strain of sentiment runs through their pages; we can mark the true taste, and it may be observed, that amidst the most elegant simplicity of thought and expression, one is sometimes surprised to meet with a poor concert, which had presented itself insouciant for the moment, which the author had not acquired critical observation enough to condemn.a A bad taste seizes with aridity these frivolous beauties, and even perhaps a good taste, ere surfeited by them: they multiply every day more and more in the fashionable company. This want of a good sense are neglected: laboured ornaments studied and admired: and a total degeneracy of style and language prepares the way for barbarism and ignorance. Hence the Asatan manner was found to depart so much from the simplicity of his countrymen which is observable in many of the Roman writers, from which Cicero himself is not wholly exempted, and which so much prevails in Ovid, Seneca, Lucan, Martial, and the Plinys.

On the revival of letters, when the judgment of the public is yet raw and unformed, this false glitter catches the eye, and leaves no room, either in eloquence or poetry, for the dummone beauties of solid sense and lively passion. This degenerate genius is then diametrically opposite to that which prevails on the continent of Europe. Be it observed, this is evident, even the most celebrated, have not reached the proper simplicity of thought and composition; and in Petrarch, Tasso, Guarini, frivolous witticisms and forcible figures of speech are so frequent, in the practice of which letters were cultivated in Italy, was so short as scarcely to allow leisure for correcting this adulterated relish.

The more early French writers are liable to the same reproach. Voiture, Balzac, even Corneille, have too much affected those ambitious ornaments, of which the Italians in general, and the least pure of the ancients, supplied them with so many models. And it was not till late, that observation and reflection gave rise to a more natural turn of thought and composition among that elegant people. A like character may be extended to the first English writers; such as flourished during the reigns of Elizabeth and James, and even till long afterwards. Learning, on its revival in this island, was attired in the same unnatural garb which it wore at the time of its decay among the Greeks and Romans. And, what may be regarded as a misfortune, the English writers were possessed of great genius before they were endowed with any degree of taste, and by that means gave a kind of sanction to those forced turns and sentiments which they so much affected. Their defects in this respect would be the better understood and appreciated, if we attend to how much vigour of mind, that we admire the innovation which produced them, as much as we blame the want of judgment which gave them admittance. To enter into an exact criticism of the writers of that age would exceed our present purpose. A short character of the most eminent, delivered with the same freedom which history exercises on all, might not be without instruction, especially on the subject of those periodical prepossessions, which prevails, will perhaps render the former liberty not the least perilous for an author. If Shakspeare be considered as a Man, born in a rude age, and lowest manner, they may, but he ought to be regarded as a prodigy: if represented as a Poet, capable of furnishing a proper entertainment to a refined or intelligent audience, we must abate much of this eulogy. In his compositions, we see many errors, that may be pardoned; but, as absurdities, should so frequently disfigure the animated and passionate scenes intermixed with them; and at the same time, we perhaps admire the more those beauties, on account of their being surrounded with such deformities. A striking peculiarity of sentiment, adapted to a single character, he frequently bits, as it were, by inspiration; but a reasonable propriety of thought he cannot for any time uphold. Nervous and picturesque expressions as well as descriptions abound in him; but it is in vain we look either for purity or simplicity of diction. His total ignorance of all theatrical art and conduct, however material a defect; yet, as it affects the spectator, rather than the reader, that is the point, that is the thing we have to observe. Which often prevails in his productions, and which gives way only by intervals to the irradiations of genius. A great and fertile genius he certainly possessed, and one enshrined equally with the most ancient; but, to be cited as a proof, how dangerous it is to rely on these advantages alone for attaining an excellence in the finer arts. And there may even remain a suspicion that we overrate, if possible, the greatness of his genius; that mankind, as bodies often appear more gigantic, on account of their being disproportionately formed. He died in 1616, aged 53 years.

Jonson possessed all the learning which was wanting to Shakspeare, and supplied all the genius of which the other was possessed. Both of them were equally deficient in taste and elegance, in harmony and correctness. A servile copyist of the ancients, Jonson translated into bad English the beautiful passages of the Greek and Roman authors, without accommodating them to the manners of his age and country. His merit has been totally eclipsed by that of Shakspeare, whose rude genius prevailed over the rude art of his contemporary. The English theatre has ever been a support of the national genius; and the Italian character; and thence it has proceeded, that the nation has undergone, from all its neighbours, the reproach of barbarism, from which its valuable productions, in some of which he has otherwise been much concerned. Jonson had a pension of a hundred marks from the king, which Charles afterwards augmented to a hundred pounds. He died in 1637, aged 63.

Farefax has translated Tasso with an elegance and ease, and at the same time with an exactness, which for that age are surprising. Each line in the original is faithfully rendered by a correspondent line in the translation. Harrington's translation of Ariosto is not likewise without its merit. It is to be regretted, that these poets should have imitated the Italians in their stanza, which has a prolixity and uniformity in it that dispels in long performances. They had otherwise, as well as Spenser, who went before them, contributed much to the polishing and refining of English versification.

In Donne's satires, when carefully inspected, there appear some flashes of wit and ingenuity; but these are totally suffocated and buried, by the hardest and most uncouth expression that is any where to be met with. If the poetry of the English was so rude and imperfect during that age, we may reasonably expect that their prose also was so. Sermo was a great and constant objection. Though the latter appears the more easy, as it is the more natural method of composition, it has ever, in practice, been found the more rare aud difficult; and there scarcely is an instance, in any language, that it has reached a degree of perfection before the refinement of poetical numbers and expression. English prose, during the reign of James, was written with little regard to the rules of grammar, and with a total disregard to the elegance and harmony of the period. Stuffed with Latin sentences and quotations, it likewise imitated those inversions which, however forcible and graceful in language, are entirely contrary to the idiom of the English. I shall, indeed, venture to affirm, that whatever uncouth phrases and expressions occur in old books, they were chiefly owing to the uninformed taste of the author; and that the language spoken in the courts of Elizabeth and James was very little different from that which we meet with at present in good company. Of this opinion, the little seraps of speeches which are found in the parliamentary journals, and which carry an air so opposite to the laboured orations, seem to be a sufficient proof; and there want not productions of that age, which, being written by men who were not authors by profession, retain a very natural manner, and may give us some ideas of the language which prevailed among men of the world. I shall particularly mention Sir John Davis's Discov'ery, Throgmorton's, Essex's, and Neh'ma's Letters. In a more early period, Cavendish's Life of Cardinal Wolsey, the pieces that remain of Bishop Lord and Anne Boloney's letter to the king, differ little or nothing from the language of our time.

The great glory of literature in this island, during the reign of James, was Lord Bacon. Most of his performances were composed in Latin; and neither the elegance of that, nor of his native tongue. If we consider the variety of talents displayed by this man; as a public speaker, a man of business, a wit, a courtier, a companion, an author, a philosopher; he is justly the object of great admiration. If we consider him merely as an author and philosopher, the light in which we view him at present, though very estimable, he was yet inferior in his contemporary Galileo, perhaps even to Kepler. Bacon pointed out at a distance the road to true philosophy: Galileo both pointed it out to others, and made himself considerable advances in it. The Englishman was ignorant of it: the Florentine, entered the science, excelled in it, and was the first that applied it, together with experiment, to natural philosophy. The former rejected, with the most positive disdain, the system of Copernicus: the latter fortified it with new proofs, derived both from reason and the senses. Bacon's style is strong and rigid: his wit, though often brilliant, is also often unnatural and far-fetched; and he seems to be the original of those pointed similes and long-sung allegories which so much distinguish the English authors: Galileo is a lively and agreeable, though somewhat a prolix, writer. But Italy, not united in any single government, and perhaps satisfied with that literary glory which it has possessed both in ancient and modern times, has too much neglected the renown which it has acquired by giving birth to so great a man. That national spirit which prevails among the English, and which forms their great happiness, is the cause why they bestow on all their eminent writers, and on Bacon among the rest, such praises and acclamations as may often appear partial and excessive. He died in 1626, in the 60th year of his age.

If the reader of Raleigh's History can have the patience to read the Jeddo learning which compose the half of the volume, he will find, when he comes to the Greek and Roman story, that his pains are not unwarranted. Raleigh is the best model of that ancient style which some writers would attempt to revive at present. He was beheaded in 1618, aged 66 years.

Camden's History of Queen Elizabeth may be esteemed good composition, both for style and matter. It is written with simplicity of expression, very rare in that age, and with a regard to truth. It would not, perhaps, be too much to affirm, that it is among the best historical productions which have yet been composed by any Englishman. It is well known that the English have not much excelled in that kind of literature. He died in 1623, aged 73 years.

We shall mention the king himself, at the end of these English writers; because that is his place, when considered as an author. It will not be denied, that the mediocrity of James's talents in literature, joined to the great change in national taste, is one cause of that contempt under which his memory labours, and which is often carried by party writers to a great extreme. It is remarkable, how different from ours were the sentiments of the ancients with regard to learning. Of the first twenty Roman emperors, counting from Caesar to Severus, above the half were authors; and though few of them seem to have been eminent in that profession, it is always remarked to their praise, that by their example, they encouraged literature. Not to mention Germanicus, and his daughter Agrippina, persons so nearly allied to the throne, the greater part of the classic writers, whose works remain, were men of the highest quality. As every human advantage is attended with inconveniences, the change of men's ideas in this particular may probably be ascribed to the invention of printing; which gives a false andgrown idea, that even men of slender fortunes can have access to them.

That James was but a middling writer may be allowed: that he was a contemplative one, can by no means be admitted. Whoever will read his Bishonl Doron, particularly the twelfth and thirteenth, or his Simia, will see a poet of the first order, who was the possessor of a more lively and agreeable, than their usual, and which may not be extended to the famous Naper; and even to Newton, at a time when learning was much more advanced than during the reign of James? From the grossness of its superstitious, we may infer the ignorance of an age; but never should pronounce concerning the folly of an individual, from his admitting popular errors, consecrated by the appearance of religion.

Such a superiority do the pursuits of literature possess above every other occupation, that even he who attains a little of it, and is a meddler in his occupation, thinks he can do more than he does. Everyone who has read the History of Basseton Barchester, will be convinced that even men of great talent, will scarce be produced in that age; and that J. Henry Saville, in the preamble of that deed by which he annexed a salary to the mathematical and astronomical professors in Oxford, says, that geometry was almost totally abandoned and unknown in England. The best learning of that age was the study of the ancients. Casaubon, eminent for this species of knowledge, was invited over from France by James, and encouraged by a pension of 3000l. a-year, as well as by church preferments. To divide the growth of all true knowledge. The

HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

FROM THE REVOLUTION, TO THE DEATH OF GEORGE THE SECOND.

DESIGNED AS A CONTINUATION OF MR. HUME'S HISTORY.

BY T. SMOLLETT, M. D.

WITH THE AUTHOR'S LAST CORRECTIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS.
The purchasers of D. Hume's History of England having been long desirous of a continuation; the proprietor of Dr. Smollett's History (being in possession of a copy with the author's last corrections) has been induced to reprint that work from the Revolution, where Hume's History ends, to the death of George II. in the year 1760.

To make this work more acceptable, the Sections and other divisions are given in a manner correspondent with those observed by Hume; so that any gentleman possessed of the latter may take up his History at the Revolution, where Hume breaks off, and find a regular connexion in this complete History given by Smollett.

In the latter part only of this work has the present Editor found it necessary to make any alterations. The war before the last had its source in America, and thereby drew forth our settlements there into consequence. This, with the loss of most of those settlements since to Great Britain, had brought with it so many changes, that what was found politics and good sense then, is now totally deranged: even facts themselves are become changed, and the very state of the two countries has undergone a metamorphosis which was impossible to be foreseen by the shrewdest politician. To assist the views of so eminent a writer as Smollett, as well as to gratify the expectations of the judicious reader, a few, very few, alterations have been made on those heads. To have proceeded further would have been a kind of sacrilege, and no less a fraud upon the original author, than upon the public.

A. D. 1689.

§ 1. The constitution of England had now assumed a new aspect. The maxim of hereditary, indefeasible right was at length renounced by a free parliament. The power of the crown was acknowledged to flow from no other fountain than that of a contract with the people. Alleviation and protection were declared reciprocal ties depending upon each other. The representatives of the nation made a regular claim of rights in behalf of their constituents; and William III. ascended the throne in consequence of an express capitulation with the people. Yet, on this occasion, the zeal of the parliament towards their deliverer seems to have overshot their attachment to their own liberty and privileges; or at least they neglected the fairest opportunities that ever occurred to retrace those prerogatives of the crown to which they imputed all the late and former calamities of the kingdom. Their new monarch retained the old regal power over parliaments in its full extent. He could and did with arbitrary advice, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve them at his pleasure. He was enabled to influence elections, and oppress corporations. He possessed the right of choosing his own council; of nominating all the great officers of the state, and of the household of the army, the navy, and the church. He reserved the absolute command of the militia; so that he remained master of all the instruments and engines of corruption and violence, without any other restraint than his own moderation, and prudent regard to the claim of rights, and principle of resistance, on which the revolution was founded. In a word, the settlement was finished with some precipitation, before the plan had been properly digested and matured; and this will be the case in every establishment formed upon a sudden emergency in the face of opposition. It was observed, that the king, who was made by the people, had it in his power to rule without them; to govern juris divisa, though he was created juris hominum; and that, though the change proceeded from a republican spirit, the settlement was built upon tyrannical maxims; for the execution of his government continued still independent of his commission, while his own person remained sacred and inviolable. The Prince of Orange had been invited to England by a coalition of parties, united by a common sense of danger; but this tie was no sooner broken than they flew avizier, and each resumed its original bias. Their mutual jealousy and rancour revived, and was heated by dispute into intemperate zeal and enthusiasm. Those who at first acted from principles of patriotism were insensibly warmed into partisans; and King William soon found himself at the head of a faction. As he had been a Calvinist, and always expressed an abhorrence of spiritual persecution, the presbyterians, and other protestant dissenters, considered him as their peculiar protector, and entered into his interests with the most zealous fervour and assiduity. For the same reasons, the friends of the church became jealous of his proceedings, and employed all their influence, first in opposing his elevation to the throne, and afterwards in thwarting his measures. Their party was espoused by all the friends of the lusitian succession; by the Roman Catholics; by those who were personally attached to the late king; and by such as were disgusted by the conduct and personal deportment of William since his arrival in England. They observed, that, contrary to his declaration, he bad plainly aspired to the crown; and treated his father-in-law with insolence and rigour; that his army contained a number of foreign papists, almost equal to that of the English Roman Catholics whom James had employed; that the reports so industriously circulated about the birth of the Prince of Wales, the treaty with France for enlisting England, and the murder of the Earl of Essex, reports countenanced by the Prince of Orange, now appeared to be without foundation; that the Dutch troops remained in London, while the English forces were distributed in remote quarters; that the prince declared the first should be kept about his person, and the latter time, Mr. Hampden, in the lower House, put the question, Whether a king; elected by the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons assembled at Westminster, coming to and consulting with the said Lords and Commons, did not make as complete a parliament, and legislative power and authority, as the Earl of Arundel knew a new election to be made by writ? Many members affirmed that the king’s writ was as necessary as his presence to the being of a legal parliament, and, as the convention was defective in this respect, with regard to parliamentary authority by any management whatsoever. The whigs replied, That the essence of a parliament consisted in the meeting and co-operation of the king, Lords, and Commons; and that it was not material whether they were constituted with the consent of the people or not. This assertion was supported by examples deduced from the History of England; they observed, that a new election would be attended with great trouble, expense, and loss of time; and that such delay might prove fatal to the protestant interest in Ireland, as well as to the allies on the continent. In the midst of this debate, the bill was brought down from the Lords, and being read, a committee was appointed to make some amendments with respect to that bill. The Commons sent it back to the upper House, and it immediately received the royal assent. By this act the Lords and Commons, assembled at Westminster, were declared the two Houses of parliament to all intents and purposes: it declared all four pieces of the other ordinances, to which the royal assent should be given before the next prorogation, should be understood and adjudged in law to begin on the thirteenth day of February; that the members, instead of the Debates of the House, should be present, and that the delinquents of the crown, ship, and state, should take the new oath incorporated in this act, under the ancient penalties; and, that the present parliament should be dissolved in the usual manner. Immediately after this transaction, a warrant debriefed them in the House of Commons about the revenue, which the courtier offered them as due with the crown upon William, at least during the life of James; for which term the greater part of it had been granted. The members in the opposition affirmed, that these grants were vacated with the throne; and at length it was voted, That the revenue had expired. Then a motion was made, That a revenue should be settled on the king and queen; and the House resolved it should be taken into consideration. While they deliberated on this affair, they received a message from his majesty, importing that the late king had set sail from Brest with an armament to invade Ireland. They forthwith resolved to assist his majesty with their lives and fortunes; they voted a temporary aid of four hundred thousand pounds, to be levied by monthly assessments; and both Houses waited on the king to signify this resolution. But this unanimity did not take place till several Lords spiritual as well as secular, were sent for, to assure the king of their submission and adherence to the House of Commons, and to the new proceedings of the crown. The joining prelates were Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; Turner, Bishop of Ely; Lake, of Chester; Ken, of Bath and Wells; White, of Peterborough; Lloyd, of Norwich; Thomas, of Worcester; and Frampton, of Gloucester. The temporal peers who refused the oath were the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Clarendon, Lichfield, Exeter, Yarmouth, and Stafford; the Lords Griffin and Siawell. Five of the bishops withdrew themselves from the House at one time; but, before they retired, one of the number moved for a bill of toleration, and another of comprehension, by which moderate dissenters might be reconciled to the church, and admitted into ecclesiastical benefices. Such bills were actually prepared and presented by the Earl of Nottingham, who received the thanks of the House for the pains he had taken. From this period, the party adverse to the government of William were distinguished by the appellation of Nonjurors. They rejected the notion of a king de facto, as well as all other distinctions and limitations; and declared for the absolute power, and divine hereditary redefeasible right, of sovereigns.

§ IV. This faction had already begun to practise against the new government. The king having received some intimation of their designs from intercepted letters, ordered the Earl of Arundel to watch the gentlemen of the Scottish nation, to be apprehended and sent prisoners to the Tower. Then he informed the two Houses of the step he had taken, and even craved their advice in such an emergency. They had, however, which had compelled him to trespass upon the law of England. The Lords thanked him for the care he took of their liberties, and desired he would secure all disturbers of the peace; but the Commons empowered him by a bill to dispense with the habeas corpus act till the seventeenth day of April next ensuing. This was a stretch of confidence in the crown which had not been made in favour of the late king, even while Argyle and Monmouth were in open rebellion. A spirit of discontent had by this time diffused itself through the army, and become so formidable to the court, that the king resolved to detain the Dutch troops in England, and send over to Holland in their room, such regiments as were most untimely wanted. Of these the Scottish regiment of Dunbarton, commanded by Mareschal Schomburg, mutined on its march to Ipswich, seized the military chest, disarmed the officers who opposed their design, declared for King James, and marched towards Scotland. The Lords and Commons, being informed of this revolt, ordered General Goeckel to pursue them with three regiments of Dutch dragoons, and the mutineers surrendered at discretion. As it was the opinion that the nation, which had not yet submitted in form to the new government, the king did not think proper to punish them as rebels, but ordered them to proceed for Holland, according to his first intention. Though this measure was a just punishment, and strong impression upon the ministry, who were divided among themselves, and wavering in their principles. However, they seized this opportunity to bring in a bill for punishing mutiny and desertion, which in a little time passed both Houses, and received the royal assent.

§ V. The coronation-oath being altered and explained, that ceremony was performed on the eleventh day of April, the Bishop of London officiating, at the king’s desire, in the room of the metropolitan, who was a minister; and next day the Commons, in a body, waited on the king and queen at Whitehall, with an address of congratulation. William, with a view to canalize the affection of his new subjects, and check the progress of clamour and discontent, summoned, in May, the instrumentality of his council, who, on the promise of constitutional government, and the preservation of the Protestant religion, was afterwards abolished. He was gratified with an address of thanks, couched in the warmest expressions of duty, gratitude, and affection, declaring they would take such measures in support of his crown, as would convince the world that he reigned in the hearts of his people.

§ VI. He had, in his answer to the former address, assured them of his constant regard to the rights and prosperity of the nation: he had explained the exhausted state of the Dutch; expressed the zeal of that republic for the interest of Britain, as well as the maintenance of the Protestant religion; and expressed his hope that the English parliament would not only repay the sums they had expended in his expedition, but likewise further support them to the utmost of their ability against the common enemies of their liberties and religion. He had observed that a considerable army and fleet would be necessary for the reduction of Ireland, and the protection of Britain; and he desired they would settle the revenue in such a manner, as that it might be collected without difficulty, and the Protestant religion as by law established; and will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the parsonages and chaplaincies committed by law unto the clergy, the right of free election of their respective successors, as by law, or custom, or any other competent authority whatsoever shall be appointed, as by law, or custom, or any other competent authority whatsoever shall be appointed, to the end that all the clergy of this realm, within and without the said parishes and chaplaincies, may be elected, and hold their offices and benefices by the free will and consent of the several parochial and chaplainyal constituents, as by law, or custom, or any other competent authority whatsoever shall be appointed.
cult and dispute. The sum total of the money expended by the States General in William's expedition amounted to seven millions of guilders, and the Commons granted six hundred thousand pounds for the discharge of this debt, incurred for the preservation of their rights and religion. Their success was decisive in the raising and equipping of a two-and-twenty thousand men, as well as for equipping a numerous fleet: but, they provided for no more than half a year's subsistence of the troops, hoping the reduction of Ireland might be concluded in six months. The weakness of frugality the king considered as a mark of his diligence and of his administration. The whigs were resolved to supply him gradually, but he might be the more dependent and the more attached: but he was not at all pleased with their preception.

§ VII. William was naturally biased to Calvinism, and averse to persecution. Whatever promises he had made, and whatever sentiments of respect he had entertained for the church of England, he scorned now in a great measure alienated from it, by the opposition he had met with from its members, particularly from the bishops, who had thwarted his measures. By abstaining themselves from parliament, and refusing the oath, they had plainly disowned his title, and renounced his government. He, therefore resolved to mortify the church, and gratify his own friends at the same time, by removing the obstacles against conformity, that the magistrates should be capable of enjoying and exercising civil employments. When he gave his assent to the bill for suspending the habeas corpus act, he recommended the establishment of a new oath in lieu of those of allegiance and abjuration: he expected they would leave room for the admission of all his protestant subjects who should be found qualified for the service; he said, such a conjunction would unite them more firmly among themselves, and strengthen them against their common adversaries. In consequence of this hint, a clause was inserted in the bill for abrogating the old and appointing the new oaths, by which the sacramental test was declared unnecessary in offices in remuneration of enjoying any office or employment. It was, however, rejected by a great majority in the House of Lords. Another clause for the same purpose, though in different terms, was proposed by the king's direction, and met with the same fate, though in both cases several noblemen entered a protest against the resolution of the House. These fruitless efforts, in favour of dissenters, augmented the prejudice of the churchmen against King William, who was determined to compound for this offense by confiscating the clergy from the oaths, provided the dissenters might be exempted from the sacramental test; but this was deemed the chief bulwark of the church, and therefore the king declined it. The king of Lords moved, that instead of inserting a clause, obliging the clergy to take the oaths, the king should be empowered to tender them; and, in case of their refusal, they should incur the penalty, because deprivation, or the apprehensions of it, might make them desperate, and excite them to form designs against the government. This argument had no weight with the Commons, who thought it was indispensably necessary to exact the oaths of the clergy, as their example influenced the kingdom in general, and the youth of the nation were formed under their instruction. After a long and warm debate, all the mitigation that could be obtained, was a clause empowering the king to indulge any twelve clergymen, deprived by virtue of this act, with a third part of their benefices during pleasure. Thus the ancient oaths of allegiance and supremacy were abrogated: the declaration of non-resistance in the act of uniformity was repealed: the new oath of allegiance was reduced to its primitive simplicity, and the coronation-oath rendered more explicit. The clergy were enjoined to take the new oaths before the first day of August, on pain of being suspended from their office for six months, and to be deprived, in case they should not take them before the expiration of this term. They generally complied, though with such reservations and distinctions as were not much for the honour of their sincerity.

§ VIII. The king, though biased in his design against the sacramental test, resolved to induce the dissenters with a toleration; and a bill for this purpose being prepared by the Earl of Nottingham, was, after some debate, passed into a law, under the title of An Act for exempting their majesties' protestant subjects dissenting from the church of England from the penalties of certain laws. It was enacted that the king was to have power to extend to those dissenters who should take the oaths to the present government, and subscribe the declaration of the thirtieth year of the reign of Charles II., provided they should have subscribed in the instrument of that year, and with the doors shut; That nothing should be construed to exempt them from the payment of tithes, or other parochial duties; That, in case of being chosen into the offices of constables, or other such-warrant officers, they should be allowed to take the oaths annexed to such offices, they should be allowed to execute the employment by deputy; That the preachers and teachers in congregations of dissenting protestants, who should take the oaths, subscribe the declaration, together with all the articles of religion, except the thirty-fourth and the two succeeding articles, and part of the twentieth, should be exempted from the penalties decreed against nonconformists, as well as from serving upon juries, or acting in parish offices, and all officers of the peace were empowered to require such dissenters to subscribe the declaration, and take the oaths; and in case of refusal, to commit them to prison, without bail or mainprize. The most stringent dissenters, and even to Quakers, on their solemn promise, before God, to be faithful to the king and queen, and their assenting by profession and assurance to those articles which the others ratified upon oath. They were likewise required to profess their belief in the Trinity and the Holy Scripture. The greatest part of the dissenters subsidized by the pope were unlearned in their doctrine. Even the papists felt the benign influence of William's moderation in spiritual matters. He rejected proposals of some zealots, who expostulated to him to enact severe laws against popish recusants. Such a measure, he observed, would alienate all the pAPISTS from Europe from the interests of England, and might produce a new catholic league, which would render the war a religious quarrel; besides, he thought it was not necessary to press the protestants of Germany and Hungary, while he himself should persecute the catholics of England. He therefore resolved to treat them with lenity; and though they were not comprehended in the act, they enjoyed the benefit of the toleration.

§ IX. We have observed, that, in consequence of the motion made by the bishops when they withdrew from parliament, a bill was brought into the House of Lords for making an act of toleration, which was extremely agreeable to the king, who had the scheme of comprehension very much at heart. In the progress of the bill, a warm debate arose about the posture of kneeling at the sacrament; and during it there were attempts to introduce into the bill new designs against dissenters. Another, not less violent, ensued upon the subsequent question, "Whether there should be an addition of laity in the commission to be given by the king to the bishops and other clergy of the church of England; and for preparing such a reformation of ecclesiastical affairs as might be the means of healing divisions, and correcting whatever might be erroneous or defective in the constitution." A great number of the temporal Lords insisted warmly on this addition, and when it was rejected, four peers entered a formal protest. Bishop Burnet was a warm stickler for the exclusion of the laity; and, in all probability, manifested this warmth in hopes of ingratiating himself with his brethren, among whom his character was very far from being popular. But the merit of this sacrifice was destroyed by the arguments he had used for dispensing with the posture of kneeling at the sacrament; and by his proposing in another proviso of the bill, that the subscribers, instead of expressing assent and consent, should only submit, with a promise of conformity.

§ X. The bill was with difficulty passed in the House of Lords; but the Commons treated it with neglect. By this time, a great number of nonconformists, who had retired from parliament, were returned, with a view to thwart the administration, though they could not prevent the settlement. Instead of proceeding with the bill, they presented an address to the king, praying an gracious declaration, and repeated assurances, that he would maintain the church of England as by law established; a church whose doctrine and practice had evinced its loyalty beyond all contradiction. They likewise hungrily besought his majesty to issue writs for calling a convocation of the clergy to meet, to whom they would submit all according to the ancient usage of parliaments; and they declared they would forthwith take into consideration proper methods for giving ease to Protestant dissenters. Though the king was displeased at this address, in which they also accused the sheriffs, and occasionally even the civil answer, by the mouth of the Earl of Nottingham, professing his regard for the church of England, which should always be his peculiar care, recommending the dissenters to their proper government, and supporting a commission to be given, such as soon as such a measure should be convenient. This message produced no effect in favour of the bill, which lay neglected on the table. Those who moved for it, had no other view than that of displaying their moderation; and now they excited their friends to oppose it with all their interest. Others were afraid of expounding it, lest they should be stigmatized as enemies to the church; and a great number of the most eminent presbyterians were averse to a scheme of comprehension, which would have diminished their strength, and weakened the importance of the party. Being, therefore, violently opposed on one hand, and but faintly supported on the other, no wonder it miscarried. They occasionally use the instrumentality of the committee of design, that it was next session revived in another form, though with no better success.

§ XI. The next object that engrossed the attention of the king, was his old friend and the first support of the government. Huberto there had been no distinction of what was allotted for the king's use, and what was assigned for the service of the public; so that the sovereign was entirely master of the whole supply. At the revenue in the late reigns had been often embellished and misapplied, it was now resolved that a certain sum should be set apart for the maintenance of the king's household, and the support of his dignity; and that the rest of the public money should be employed under the inspection of parliament. Accordingly, since this period, the Commons have appropriated the yearly supplies to certain specified services; and an account of the application has been constantly submitted to both Houses at the next session. At this juncture, the prevailing party, or the whigs, determined that the revenue should be granted from year to year, or at least for a small term of years; that the king might find himself dependent upon the parliament, and with his great fortune was to be regulated by the administration. In pursuance of this maxim, when the revenue fell under consideration, they, on pretence of charges and accusations which they had not so far been able to substantiate, made the annual grant a provisional act for one year only. The civil list was settled at six hundred thousand pounds, chargeable with the appointments of the queen dowager, the Prince and Princess of Denmark, the judges, and Mareschal Schomberg, to whom the parliament had already granted one hundred thousand pounds, in consideration of his important services to the nation. The Commons also voted, that a constant revenue of twelve hundred thousand pounds should be established for the support of the crown in time of peace.

§ XII. The king took umbrage at these restrictions laid upon the application of the public money, which were the most salutary fruits of the revolution. He considered them as affronts offered by which he was distinguished from his predecessors; and thought them an ungrateful return for the services he had done the nation. The tories perceived his disgust, and did not fail to foment his jealousy against their adversaries, which was confirmed by a fresh effort of the whigs, in relation to a militia. A bill was brought into the House, for regulating it in such a manner as would have rendered it in a great measure independent both of the king and the lords-levyutenant of counties, in which by the channel of the commons he suffered to be neglected on the table; but the attempt confirmed the suspicion of the king, who began to think himself in danger of being enslaved by a republican provision of that nature. The king then made profers of service to his majesty: but complained at the same time, that as they were in danger of being prosecuted for their lives and fortunes, they could not, without an act of indemnity, exert themselves in favour of the crown, lest they should incur a persecution from their implacable enemies.

§ XIII. These remonstrances made such impression on the king, that he sent a message to the House by Mr. Hambden, recommending a bill of indemnity as the most effectual means for putting an end to all controversies, which arose from discourses and occasional letters, it might be prepared with all convenient expedition, and with such exceptions only as should seem necessary for the vindicating of public justice, the safety of him and his government, and the happiness of the nation. An address of thanks to his majesty was unanimously voted. Nevertheless, his design was frustrated by the backwardness of the whigs, who proceeded so slowly in the bill, that it could not be brought to maturity before the end of the session. They wanted to keep the score over the heads of their enemies, until they should find a proper opportunity for revenge; and in the mean time, restrain them from opposition, by the terror of impending vengeance. They affected to intimate that the king's design was to raise the prerogative as high as it had been in the preceding reigns; and that be for this purpose pressed an act of indemnity, by virtue of which he might proceed to the settlement of the late transactions. An address of thanks to his majesty was unanimously voted. The tories, however, were not to be dismayed. They made a new division against this design was to raise the prerogative as high as it had been in the preceding reigns; and that be for this purpose pressed an act of indemnity, by virtue of which he might proceed to the settlement of the late transactions. An address of thanks to his majesty was unanimously voted.

§ XIV. It was now judged expedient to pass an act for settling the succession of the crown, according to the former resolution of the convention. A bill for this purpose was brought into the Lower House, with a clause disabling papists from succeeding to the throne: to this the Lords added, "or such as should marry papists," absolving the subject in that case from allegiance. The Bishop of Salisbury, by the king's direction, proposed that the Princess Sophia, Duchess of Hanover, and her posterity, should be nominated in the act of succession, as the next protestant heirs, failing issue of the king, and Anne Princess of Denmark. These amendments gave rise to warm debates in the Lower House, where they were vigorously opposed, not so much to preserve the church from invasion, as to secure to it the benefits of a future parliament. The Lords insisted upon their amendments, and several fruitless conferences were held between the two Houses. At length the bill was dropt for the present, in consequence of an event which in a great measure dispelled the apprehension of a popish successor. This was the delivery of the Princess Anne, who, on the twenty-seventh day of July, brought forth a son, christened by the name of William, and afterwards created Duke of Gloucester.

§ XV. In the midst of these domestic disputes, William did not neglect the affairs of the continent. He retained all his former influence in Holland, as his countrymen had reason to confide in his repeated assurances of invincible affection. The great event which he had procured the treaty of Münster, Osnabrick, Nimygen, and the truce; invaded their country without provocation, and evoked himself an inveterate enemy of the holy Roman empire. They, therefore, besought his imperial majesty to conclude a treaty with them, which offered advantageous terms, and proceed to an open rupture with Louis: in which case, they would consider it as a war of the empire, and support their head in the most effectual manner. The emperor published a dung against the common enemy, taxing him with mani-fond infractions of the treaty of commerce; with having involved the subjects of the republic in the persecution which he had raised against the protestants; with having executed them with a cruel, prominent, and insolent threats; with having plundered and oppressed the Dutch merchants and traders in France; and finally, with having declared war against the States, without any plausible reason assigned. The Elector of Brandenburgh declared himself in opposition against France, and the French king of having laid waste the empire, without any regard to the obligations of religion and humanity, or even to the laws of war; of having countenanced the most barbarous acts of cruelty and oppression; and of having intrigued with the enemies of Christ for the destruction of the empire. The emperor negociated an alliance offensive and defensive with the States-general, binding the contracting parties to co-operate with the whole power against France and her allies. It was stipulated, that neither side should engage in a separate treaty, on any pretence whatsoever; that no peace should be admitted, until the treaties of Westphalia, Obernach, Munster, and the like, should have been the fruit of a negotiation for a peace or truce, the transactions on both sides should be communicated bona fide; and that Spain and England should be invited to accede to the treaties, and to make separate articles. The last condition was agreed to; in case of the Spanish king's dying without issue, the States-general should assist the emperor with all their forces to possess that monarchy; that they should use their friendly endeavours with the princes electors, their allies, towards elevating his son Joseph to the dignity of King of the Romans; and employ their utmost force against France, should she attempt to oppose his elevation.

§ XV. William, who was the soul of this confederacy, found no difficulty in persuading the English to undertake a war against their old enemies and rivals. On the sixteenth day of April, Mr. Hammond made a motion for taking into consideration the state of the kingdom with respect to France, and foreign alliances; and the Commons unanimously resolved, that, in case his majesty should think fit to engage in war with France, they would, in a parliamentary way, enable him to carry it on with vigour. An address was immediately drawn up, and presented to the king, desiring he would seriously consider the destructive methods taken of late years by the French king against the trade, quiet, and interest of the nation, professed and effectual, and supporting the rebels in that kingdom. They did not doubt but the alliances already made, and those that might hereafter be concluded by his majesty, would be sufficient to reduce the French king to such a condition, that it should not be in his power to violate the peace of Christendom, nor prejudice the trade and prosperity of England; in the mean time they assured his majesty he might depend upon the assistance of his parliament, according to the vote which had passed in the House of Commons. This was a welcome address to King William. He assured them that no part of the supplies which they might grant for the prosecution of the war should be misapplied; and, on the second day, an address was immediately drawn up, and presented to the king, desiring he would consider the destructive methods taken of late years by the French king against the trade, quiet, and interest of the nation, professed and effectual, and supporting the rebels in that kingdom. On this occasion, Louis was charged with having ambitiously invaded the territories of the emperor, and denounced war against the allies of England, in violation of the treaties confirmed under the guarantee of the English crown: with having encroached upon the fisheries of Newfoundland, invaded the Caribbean islands, taken forcible possession of New York and Hudson's Bay, made depredations on the English at sea, prohibited the importation of English goods, and persecuted many English subjects on account of religion, contrary to express treaties and the law of nations, and sent an armament to Ireland, in support of the rebels of that kingdom.
